

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

GRAND CHAPTER OF VERMONT.

The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the State of Vermont, assembled at Rutland, on Wednesday the 16th ult. The utmost harmony prevailed among the Companions, convened from all parts of the State, and the transactions of the day might truly be said to be consistent with the principles of an "order" founded on "morality and brotherly love."

An interesting and well adapted discourse was delivered to a large and respectable audience, by the M. E. Companion HADLEY PROCTOR, Grand Chaplain.

The following Companions were duly elected officers of the Grand Chapter, for the ensuing year.

- M. E. Silas Bowen, G. H. P.
- " David Russell, D. G. H. P.
- " John Goldsberry, G. K.
- " Leonard Sargeant, G. S.
- " Benjamin Lord, G. T.
- " Joel Green, G. S.
- E. & Rev. Hadley Proctor, G. C.
- Comp. James Barrett, Jr. G. M.
- " John Purdy, G. V.
- " Silas H. Hodges, G. S.
- " Aaron Barnes, G. S.
- " Abel Paige, G. S.
- " Benjamin Fay, G. C. & T.

The following resolution, introduced by the M. E. Comp. JOEL CLAPP, was unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That this Grand Chapter highly approve the resolution of the American Bible Society, passed at its annual meeting in May, 1829, to supply every family in the United States with a copy of the Holy Bible, within two years—and that the G. Treasurer be directed to forward to the Treasurer of the American Bible Society, one hundred dollars, to be applied to that object.

Attest, JOEL GREEN, G. Sec'y.

In the year 1818, the Grand Lodge of Vermont appropriated one hundred dollars to the Vermont Bible Society; and thirty dollars more to the American Bible Society, to constitute their Grand Chaplain a member for life. Oct. 12, 1819, they adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, that this Grand Lodge consider the translating, printing, and distributing the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment, to be an object of great importance, as tending to promote the happiness of man in this world, and his external felicity in that which is to come." And, to their great credit be it said, the members of the Grand Lodge have never for a moment, lost sight of the spirit of this resolution. We have no data at hand to enable us to give a correct statement of the appropriations that have been made, in accordance with this resolution; but a considerable amount has, at different times, been so appropriated. We could name many instances, where appropriations have been made by other Grand Lodges, and by subordinate Lodges, for the diffusion of the light of the gospel. With what justness our Institution is slandered and traduced by men professing to be servants of God, we leave to the decision of the candid enquirer; and to the consciences of our christian coemices. Some of them at least profess to be christians, and we hope such are not destitute of consciences. A baser charge was never preferred against the Institution, than that it is inimical to the Christian religion.

JOHN C. SPENCER.

The ambition—we will not call it moral turpitude—of this gentleman, has placed him and his proceedings before the public, in a very unenviable light. He stands before the public, says the Batavia Press, stripped of the brief disguise which an official station had drawn around him—common honor and common honesty, as regards the politician, the lawyer, and the man, have been sacrificed at the shrine of personal ambition—and he is now "reaping the reward" of those who "sow to the wind." Writhing under the lash of honest indignation and scorn, so far as character is concerned, he can realize the full force of the sentiment—"blessed be nothing." It will be seen by the following development from the Albany Argus, that the mighty crime of "disclosing the manner in which he obtained evidence before Grand Juries," with which he charges Gov. Throop, was committed by Mr. Spencer himself!

THE CLIMAX.

"I have to complain also, that my official communications to your Excellency, have been divulged, so as to defeat my measures and to bring undeserved reproach upon me. Those communications related to the means of discovering evidence of William Morgan's death; they were not only in their nature strictly confidential, but the success of the measures suggested, depended entirely upon their being unknown to the parties and their friends."—[Mr. Spencer's letter of resignation.

In our comments upon the letter of resignation of Mr. SPENCER, and upon the correspondence between him and Gov. THROOP, put into our hands by Gov. T. at our request, in consequence of Mr. S's unprovoked and aggravated charges against that upright, faithful and capable officer, and by us made public, we gave a full view of all the facts then known to us, and of all the charges made by the Special Counsel, and all the considerations arising from the correspondence, so far as they, at that time, appeared to us to require explanation or comment. In those remarks, we treated the allegation of a disclosure of the correspondence as entirely unimportant, any farther than the effect to be produced upon "measures suggested," might be concerned, and we showed, as we think, conclusively, that the answer of the Governor to the propositions had definitively disposed of all those "measures," and placed them entirely beyond the reach of any embarrassment from any publication of the correspondence which could have been made. Our confidence, however, in the strict integrity of the Executive induced us, in the broadest terms, to negative the idea that he had made any disclosure of the correspondence beyond the safe and faithful discharge of his own official duties, and the express written directions of the Special Counsel.

To our remarks, Mr. S. made a labored reply through the columns of the Ontario Messenger, and in that communication, either expressly or impliedly abandons all the grounds of his original accusations against the Governor, except the single charge that the Governor had "divulged" his "official communications;" and, in the repetition of this charge, he studiously, and with the art of a refined special pleader, separates it from the alleged consequences which originally accompanied it, to wit: the defeat of his measures and the bringing of undeserved reproach upon himself, and without which consequences the charge itself was childish and unmeaning. Speaking of this charge and our remarks, he says, "This was the principal if not the only point calling for an answer."

Finding the Special Counsel driven to this miserable subterfuge to defend himself from the fatal recoil of his own weapon, and noticing in several of the western papers broad suggestions that Mr. S. himself was the channel through which a "counsel of the persons implicated in the offences upon William Morgan," became possessed of the knowledge of his "strictly confidential" "official communications," and of the "measures suggested" by him to procure the testimony of an indicted witness, who had twice sworn himself entirely ignorant of the facts "proposed" to be proved by him, our sense of justice, and a desire to give this whole strange transaction to the light, induced us to address a note to the very respectable gentleman known to the public as the able counsel of the "persons implicated in the offences upon William Morgan;" when, lo! it appears that Mr. Spencer himself has been the revelator of his own "official," of his own "strictly confidential" communications!

Yes, strange and unaccountable as it may be, these "very official" communications to his Excellency Gov. Throop, which have been "divulged so as to defeat the measures" of the Special Counsel, and "to bring undeserved reproach" upon him, have been "divulged" by John C. Spencer himself! These "measures," the success of which "depended entirely upon their being unknown to the parties and their friends," were published by the Special Counsel, and that not to a "counsel of the persons implicated," but to one of the persons themselves—to one of the indicted individuals,—and who, per se, was to be convicted by this very testimony of Adams which "the measures proposed" were to purchase. This person, thus made acquainted with the movements of the Special Counsel, communicated the information to his own legal adviser, and from this source, and from no other, three, at least, of the "counsel of the persons implicated in the offences upon William Morgan," became possessed of a knowledge of this correspondence as early as the month of August last, and before any important trial had been undertaken by Mr. Spencer.

If Mr. S. can escape from the damning conclusion which must follow this disclosure, he will have little to fear hereafter from the effects of his wanton attacks upon personal and official integrity.

Our entire letter and the entire answer follows:—

ALBANY, MAY 30, 1830.

Gentlemen—Mr. John C. Spencer in his letter addressed to Gov. Throop, resigning the office of Special Counsel, and in his reply to our remarks upon that letter, having made certain allusions to the manner in which his official communications were said to have been divulged, allow me to ask your attention to the following queries:—

1. Were you the counsel for the persons implicated in the Morgan affair, at the period alluded to in the letter of the Special Counsel?

2. Did the subject of the correspondence, (the proposition to induce Adams to testify,) become known to you; and when?

3. From whom, and through what channel, did that information become so known to you?

If the above enquiries involve nothing of a confidential nature, and can be answered by you with propriety, your replies to them, respectively, will confer an obligation upon,

Gentlemen, with great respect, your obd't serv't,

E. CROSWELL.

To V. Mathews, D. D. Barnard, and E. Griffin, Esqrs.

JUNE 9th, 1830.

Mr. E. Croswell—Sir: Yours of the 31st ult. has been received, and in reply to your first interrogatory, we say, that we have been for nearly three years the active and advising counsel for the persons implicated in the abduction of William Morgan.

In reply to your second interrogatory, we say, that either in the month of July or August last, we were informed that John C. Spencer, Esq. had applied to his Excellency Gov. Throop for the sum of $2000, to be used by him to induce Elisha Adams to become a witness in behalf of the State on the trial of the indictments then pending against a large number of individuals for the abduction of William Morgan.

In reply to your third interrogatory, we say, that the information above stated, was derived from one of our clients, who was indicted for a participation in the abduction of Morgan. Our client informed us that he obtained THAT INFORMATION FROM JOHN C. SPENCER HIMSELF. We further state, that we have never obtained any information in relation to Mr. Spencer's application to his Excellency for the sum of two thousand dollars, or any other sum, or in relation to any correspondence on that subject, from any other person. Not having had an opportunity of consulting our client since the receipt of your letter, we do not feel at liberty to give his name. If necessary, we presume he will not object to its being made public.

We are very respectfully,
your obt. serv'ts,

VINCENT MATTHEWS,
EBENEZER GRIFFIN.

JUNE 10th 1830.

Sir: To the above letter of Gen. Matthews and Mr. Griffin, I would add, in reply to yours of the 31st of May, that my employment in behalf of the persons charged with a participation in the Morgan abduction has been rather in the capacity of advocate than as advising counsel. I was, however, retained two or three years ago, by one of these persons, as advising and consulting counsel for him; and it was from this person, whom I understand to be the same individual alluded to by Messrs. Matthews and Griffin, that I had information sometime last summer, of the application made by Mr. Spencer to Gov. Throop for money, for the purpose mentioned in their letter. I understood at the time, that this fact had been disclosed to my client by Mr. SPENCER HIMSELF.—This person is the only source of my information on the subject of the application alluded to!

Very respectfully, your obt. serv't.

D. D. BARNARD.

E. Croswell Esq.

THE BONES.—It has been said, that the bones of the dead, found under the old State House, have been satisfactorily proved to have been dead men, caused by masonic murders in the masonic hall above. A certain distinguished Doctor has made it manifest, and an express has gone to New York to convey the information. There was a large spider found on the bones, which looked altogether masonic. Solomon Southwick would have stuck a fork into it. No antimasonic man would ever have suffered such a spider to build a nest any where in his premises.—The Knights Templars have taken their twenty four pounders out of the armory to fight Parson Thacher on the occasion. Look out morganic, and galvanic, and powderatic, for battles. Ye cowards, pull up your inexpressibles and run!—Com.

The following paragraph appears in the last Watertown, Jefferson county, Freeman. It will serve, among other facts, to show the "moral complexion" of the proceedings of the Special Counsel.

"The person alluded to in Mr. Spencer's letter to the acting governor, residing at Sackets Harbor, who he says he had prevailed upon to visit Adams, then at Youngstown, to prevail upon him, as he says, 'to tell the whole truth,' is understood to be Mr. Josiah Bacon, a seceding mason, whose character, if not as notorious as that of Adams, it is because it is not so extensively known."

HONEST CONFESSIONS.

Truth, like the sun, seeks no unnatural course:
All clouds and shadows shun her mighty force.

A plain, blunt, honest man begins his speech;
If they'll but learn, some honest things he'll teach.
But soon each member trembles with surprise;
They never thought PLAIN HONESTY would rise.

"Och! what a botheration's made
'Bout this ere big Convintion!
Surr, bullying hwarreds want do for us;
That is not our intintion.

I'd jist inform ye, by the way,
There's many an Irish lad
Who think these very Bafe-aeters
Are not so very bad.

I thinks, Surr, tarking o' their guns,
Ye've made too big a fuss;
I wudn't mind five hunderr, Surr,
With a good blunderbuss.

Since I first heard of yourr designs,
An that's not very long,
I've taken thought to join ye, Surr,
'Twas for a private wrong.

So now I'll jist expose to ye
Some little private acts;
An if ye'd have them sworn to, Surr,
The Doctorr 'll pen the facts.

There's Andree Jackson, Surr, a sprig
From our swate Emerald Isle;
He'd like to maet with Bafe-aeters,
He said, a little while.

The spalpeen! what a pratty note
He sent te their Big King!
He'd join in their precession too!
He'd do that very thing!

Now, be me faith, I thinks this hwarrid
Is going arll astray.
I niver thought tood come te this
Until the ither day.

I tell ye, Surr, without a lie—
Me bible oath its on—
A hunderr thousand Broilerrrs met
At tomb o' Washington!

There's coudsin Blarney, he was there,
They carll him Pat, swate lad!
As naet a waiterr, be me sowl,
As jontleman e'er had.

Pat got a writerr there, ye sae,
Te send a bit o' line,
Arll about that precession, Surr,
It was so very fine!

With ribands black and red and blue
They got together then;
Pat thought upon his very sowl
That they were riband-men.

He didn't sae a single bit
Of orange in the clan;
But little Emerald sprigs were held
Ee every jontleman.

Pat, Surr, was in the great, big house,
Kipt by the Prisdint:
He thought he'd got naet quarters, Surr—
He'd stay a long while in't.

Bad luck te that ould Prisdint!
He's not ould Ireland's frin;
He turned Pat Blarney out o' doors
An tack anitherr in!

Och, honey! what did Paddy then
Te lose a good characterr?
He jist tuck up a swate new cote
An tried it te his back, Surr.

A bailey then, a thafe o' the hwarrd,
Tuck Paddy by the arm,
An put him in a place, he said,
Te kaep him out o' harrm.

Och, Paddy Blarney! honey dear!
Jist sweer "Bafe-steak's the soort,"
An, be me sowl, they'll clearr ye aff,
When ye go into Coort.²

So Paddy sends me hwarrd, ye sae,
Be raeson o' the same,
Te join the Anti—what ye carll't—
I cannot spake the name.

Be that same token here am I
Te maet ye in this Harll;
There's not a bigger pat-riot, Surr,
For that I challenge arll.

Now if ye've any dirty job
That's like to soil yourr clothes;
Or if, by any sort o' maens
Ye're like to come te blows;

There's not a lad among ye arll
Will prove the better man:
Och, ye may look about the Harll
An pick out who ye can.

I fearr, Surr, that yourr Yankee-man
An Irish Pull has made;
An that the Belfast Millerr, Surr,
Wunt answer for the trade.

That business grinds quite harrd, ye sae
Since those two brothers wrote:³
I fearr ye'll find they're right for arll—
Thy're Irishmen ye'll note!

The nixt time that ye think ye'll want
A bit o' lie or so,
Don't take a Yankee-Jonathan—
His mother-wit wunt go.

Och, honey! 'tis the Irish lad
Id make ye up a tale!
Tho' crossed by carnate divils, Surr,
His story idn't fail!

There's many a reptile here, I find,
A crarrling in yourr ways;
We had them in ould Ireland, Surr,
Before Saint Patrick's days.

But so it was, upon a time—
It's carll'd Saint Patrick's day—
He drove them arll forenent him, Surr,
Inte the Irish Sae.

But wher the Bafe-aeters rose up,
A hunderr years ago,
I've seen it argeed pratty harrd
That reptiles 'gan to grow.

I wudn't on me solemn oath
Sweer that the thing was so;
But if ye'd wush to make it out,
The Doctorr 'll make it go.

I fael great pride that ye've baen pleased
With plain, blunt, Irish wit;
But saeing ye're about te spack
I thinks I'd better quit.

I'd thank ye, Surr, when ye get home,
 Jest write a little note,
 Te let me know the frac result
O' Worcesterr County vote."

1 Vide the Presidents' answer to an invitation to join the procession at Alexandria.

2 It has been erroneously supposed that the signal was corned beef: corned or corn being a corruption of cornu or cornucopia, signifying plenty. Recent disclosures, however, prove that the son of Erin was right; that it was "Beef-steak," and that he made no bull of it. If this be doubted, let it be tried ON A JURY.

ANTIMASONRY.

[We copy the following spirited article from the Republican and Antimasonic opponent; an excellent and ably conducted paper recently established at Lancaster, Penn.]

"The genius of political antimasonry is emphatically evil. The same persecuting, fiendlike spirit characterizes it wherever ere it raises its inquisitorial head. It has but one rule of action, one object in view, and one fatal tendency. Indiscriminate and violent proscription and persecution; power and aggrandizement, and the total subversion of the moral order and constitution of the government. It ruins its victim alike, whether he receives its favors or falls under its blows. Such is political antimasonry. It does not, indeed, exhibit its moral deformity at once, in every place where it may chance to plant its cloven foot or rear its hideous head—that, policy forbids—insidious cunning repudiates; but the time is rapidly approaching when, if it be not prostrated by the virtue and patriotic indignation of an insulted and injured people, it will stalk forth in mid-day, and proclaim in stentorian tones, and with all the impudence and recklessness of conscious and hardened guilt, its own shame and iniquitous purposes.—When it first appeared in the western part of New York, it was as it has hitherto been here, cold, calculating and cautious, but as it grew and waxed stronger by the weakness and credulity of the people, it began by degrees to assume its inherent character, and to exhibit itself to the moral sense of the people in all its loathsome deformity, and political depravity. Although at first it pretended merely to revenge the supposed murder of Morgan, it very soon cast its skin of concealment, and like the serpent invaded a political Eden to produce misery and death, where all else had been harmony and peace, and in a little while we find it so far from revenging the death of one man, attempting the moral and political destruction of thousands. We find it persecuting, proscribing, and robbing of their reputation, and ruining in their business, a particular class of citizens, because they belong to a charitable institution, and not only them but all others who will not join in with it, in its 'holy' crusade against freedom of thought, speech and action. We find it charging the ermined bench of justice, the jury box, and the witness stand, with wicked perjury. The Executive, the Legislature, as well as the Judicial branches of the government, all come under its ban of extermination—all connived at the abduction of Morgan—all are subservient to the purposes of Freemasonry—and all in their turn, lay damning perjury upon their immortal souls!!! It heaps the guilt of treason, suicide and murder upon the memories of the illustrious dead. It invades the domestic sanctuary and sows the seed of dissension among families—setting father against son and brother against brother. It has by violence, broken into the house of God, and where only the pure and holy doctrines of the gospel should have been proclaimed, it has raised its distracting yell. It has forced the ministers of the everlasting gospel to abandon the desk, or to turn their holy vocation into a rack or wheel of political persecution. All this, and far more, has already been witnessed in New-York, and from present appearance, emboldened by partial success, or driven to desperation by the apprehension of disgraceful defeat, it is preparing to enact here. A solemn question, then, we have to ask our fellow-citizens. Will they permit it? They hold in their hands the antidote or preventive. Now is the time to use it: hereafter may be too late. The monster may in time become too powerful for subjugation. When that time arrives, if it ever should, which may Heaven forbid, we may fold our arms and in all the agony of men without hope, exclaim farewell, a long farewell to American liberty!!

RENUNCIATION OF ANTIMASONRY.

When convinced of holding erroneous opinions and wrongful practices, it becomes a solemn duty to renounce such opinions, and abandon such practices. And that the antidote may counteract the bane, it is essential, that their renunciation and abandonment should be as public, as was the fact of their being cherished and pursued. Influenced by these considerations, and by the desire of retrieving whatever of injury his former opinions may have done, the subscriber feels constrained, thus publicly, to renounce his allegiance to Antimasonry. At the commencement of the Antimasonic crusade in this region, he espoused the cause with ardor, believing it to be the cause of truth and justice, and pursued it with zeal, till he became satisfied that its foundations are hollow, and its objects pure selfishness. Instead of quieting animosities, and healing divisions, and furthering the works of benevolence, its tendencies are entirely and uniformly belligerent. Wherever it appears, discord and contention attend upon its every step; and wherever it obtains the ascendancy, incessant and extensive strifes prevail; forcibly expelling peace and quiet, and concord, and happiness; Wherefore, know ye, that I, MOSELEY J. KENDALL, of Belchertown, in the County of Hampshire, do hereby, deliberately renounce forever, Antimasonry, and all connexion with Antimasons as a party, and all fellowship with political disorganizers. I renounce it as the hotbed of violence, discord, and unmanly strife—as the author of immense and various evils, and no good—as the patron of sycophancy, meanness, and hypocrisy—as the prompter of discord, enmities, causeless jealousies, and cruel, and outrageous slanders and abuses—as the crippled hobby of bankrupt politicians, and apostate moralists. I renounce the mass of Antimasons, as deluded and infatuated men—as men, blindly and zealously persecuting their innocent and worthy neighbors for opinion's sake—as men ignorantly believing themselves engaged in God's service, while heaping all possible ills upon the heads of their unoffending brethren—as men, influenced by considerations and hopes, the reason of which, they know not, and into the justice of which they have not inquired—as men, who have incurred a most fearful responsibility; for which they must hereafter give account as men, recklessly accumulating wrath against the day of wrath. I renounce antimasonic leaders as time-serving politicians, unprincipled apostates, and selfish and calculating disorganizers. From their patriotism, and benevolence, and philanthropy—from their conscientious impulses, and deep anxiety to propagate the "truth," and diffuse 'light,' and 'reform,' good Lord deliver me.

My opinion of Masonry has not changed. I still believe it a useless and unnecessary institution, a compound of folly and wickedness, and if left to itself, it would sink by its own incumbent rottenness. The blood of martyrs has ever been the seed of the church, so opposition to masonry will surely perpetuate its follies and add to its disciples.—As a matter of policy then, I regard all antimasonic efforts as unwise and hurtful. The evils of Masonry, great and manifold as they may be, are infinitely less than the evils of antimasonry. Take all the wickedness of which masonry has been guilty through the long course of her existence, and compare it with the evils produced by antimasonry during its short reign, and it would be to them as "the dust of the balance." When or where has masonry arrayed father against son, and brother against brother?—when or where has she encouraged and supported itinerant libellors and slanderers of the worthy and virtuous—when or where has she disturbed the quiet of neighborhoods, infringing upon the sacred privileges of the church, and usurped the rights of conscience and freedom—when or where has she refused to lend her patronage and support to objects of benevolence and patriotism? Antimasonry has done all this, and is still doing it. Wherever it goes, it literally sends not peace, but a sword. I would ask my late anti-masonic brethren to deliberate on their course, to pause, and to consider whether they proceed further in their mad career. They may assist them materially in governing their future conduct, to coolly estimate the good they have achieved, the increased prosperity and quiet of our citizens, the deep-toned piety it has infused into professors, the growing harmony of our churches, and the united zeal of our people in prosecuting benevolent and patriotic enterprises.

MOSELEY J. KENDALL.

FESTIVAL OF ST. JOHN.

[The talented editor of the Providence Literary Subaltern, furnishes the following notice of the celebration in that place on the 24th ult.]

The annual Festival of St. John, was celebrated in this town yesterday, by the Masonic Order, and by a vast concourse of our citizens;—ladies and gentlemen, assembled at the first Congregational Church, to witness the interesting performances of the solemn and impressive occasion.

The day was clear and fine, and at the appointed hour, the procession moved from St. John's Lodge, through a variety of streets and finally arrived at the Roger Williams Hotel, where upwards of seven hundred gentlemen, partook of a sumptuous repast prepared for the occasion, by JOHN WILDER, Esq. The dinner was served up in fine style, and all who partook of it evinced the utmost satisfaction and happiness.

The address which was delivered by the Reverend David Benedict, we did not hear, as the house was so crowded that we could not get in—but commendation, speaks volumes in its favor. All who are conversant, with the talents of the orator, will readily admit its superior eloquence and ample refutation of all the calumnies, that have been heaped on the masonic character.

The number of very respectable gentlemen, who attended the festival, and who gave an earnest, proof of their friendly devotion, to the legitimate cause of Masonry, and virtue, must, by their aspect, have cooled the ardor of that antimasonic faction, whose aim is riot and rebellion, and the positive prostration of all the decencies of civilized life.

On the peculiar occasion, of which we have spoken, and of which we shall continue to speak, the MASONS have done nobly, and have secured to themselves, the approbation and honor of the civilized world. They have not been intimidated by the railings of their malignant opposers; they have not been diverted from their purposes by fear; and in all things, they have behaved like men, and countrymen, in the exercise of their rights, and in the full enjoyment of rational liberty, and independence.

A band of more respectable and honorable men could not be collected. The body, was composed of the heart—the bone, the sinew, and the nerve of Rhode Island—it was formed of men, who will not quail in the hour of danger, and who will not abandon a friend in distress. The procession was composed of men who are our friends, neighbors, and acquaintance, and still we hear a few unprincipled beings, dead to all the principles of civilized society—and lost to honor, denouncing them, as cut throats and murderers, and villains and liars! And, will the more respectable people of Rhode Island, submit to insults, and indignities like these?

The Masonic Institution, will, without any severe effort, survive the blast that has assailed it. It will ride triumphant over the storm, the volcano and the earthquake, for so long as it is the handmaid of virtue, morality, religion, and truth, it cannot be assailed with success. Like the "rock in the ocean," it is firm and steadfast, and though the billow, may roll against its sides, and all the furies of malice, detraction and falsehood, may assail it, it cannot be prostrated by the breath of scandal;—the revilings of party malignity, or the rude assaults of the unprincipled, and the infamously vile.

On Saturday an Irish laborer fell from a building in Vanua street, 35 feet, without being dangerously hurt.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

[We present the following to our readers, with full confidence that it will be read with great satisfaction. It is the address of JAMES G. BROOKS, Esq. to the friends and patrons of the Rochester Craftsman, on becoming associate editor of that excellent paper.]

"For the last three years a fierce crusade has been carried on against the Masonic Institution, and particularly against its members in this section of the State. Freemasons living at a distance have learned with astonishment that their brethren in this quarter have been persecuted, proscribed, ruined in their business and robbed of their reputation, for belonging to an institution which, in all civilized countries, has numbered among its member the greatest, the wisest, the best, and the most exalted of men. They have seen with regret a few artful and designing men sporting with the credulity of the people, abusing their confidence, and using public passion and public prejudice as a ladder for licentious ambition and selfish aggrandisement. They have seen all this with surprise—but not with dismay, for they have beheld among the persecuted a small, but Spartan band, manfully defending their rights, and determined, like the soldiers of France, 'to perish—if it must be—but not to submit.' They have seen that band, although fighting against fearful odds, bend, though they have not yet broken, the rod of the oppressor. The struggle has aroused interest abroad, and in common with thousands, I have long desired to lend my efforts in sustaining an institution which I know to be pure, and which I have seen shamefully aspersed. That desire is about to be accomplished, and if the fabric of masonry must fall by the assaults of fanaticism, delusion and guile; if firm resistance prove to be unavailing against the superiority of numbers and the perseverance of ambition, I am content to be crushed amidst the ruins.

"And why has this exterminating crusade—this war, 'even to the knife,' been waged against the members of the masonic fraternity? Why are they allowed no alternative but destruction or dishonor, no choice but to renounce or be crushed? Has the laws of the land been violated by any mason or masons, then let that law, clothed as it is with might and power, avenge its insulted majesty upon the guilty violator. It is idle to talk about the secret interference of the fraternity to obstruct the course of justice; it is a tale started by the designing and spread by the deluded. It is an insult to every Freemason who has served or may serve on a jury, or on the bench. It charges each and all of them with violating their oaths in the face of man and of heaven. It tells the masonic juror that although he solemnly swears 'well and truly to try, and true judgment to make,' between man and man, yet if one of the parties be a mason, he is bound by his fraternal obligations to seal his own damnation, by laying perjury upon his soul! Will any man, can any man, in his heart believe that Washington and Clinton would have joined, and continued through life with, a society which called upon them to submit to such deep disgrace, such foul dishonor? No—masonry does not require its members to arrest the sword of justice, or to hold a shield over the head of the offender as the blow is descending.

"And yet Freemasons have been driven from the jury box, from the bench, from the stand, and denied the rights of citizens, by the fury of their opponents, who virtually tell them, one and all, that they are unworthy of trust or confidence.—And all this is in a land of freedom!

"For what then are we denounced, and why are we to submit to unmerited slavery, or if we resist, to be hunted like wild beasts from the face of the earth? Is it because the doctrine of our order inculcates the pure and benign principles of religion? Is it because our institution has gone hand in hand with christianity from nation to nation, spreading peace and benevolence abroad? Is it because the charity of our order, like a broad and ever expanding river, has for centuries been increasing its blessings, and fertilizing wherever it flowed? Is it because the masonic eye has sought out the hovel of destitution and disease and despair, and the masonic hand has carried thither the means of relief and restoration? Is it because masonic bounty has given bread to the widow, and she has wept in gratitude as she fed her fatherless child? Is it for this that we must be exterminated? No—not for this!—but because a few ambitious demagogues, desperately bent upon obtaining power, by any means and at all hazards, have succeeded in deluding the many, and have fanned their passions into a fierce and devouring flame, which perchance may yet become ungovernable and consume those who have kindled it.—This is the secret of political antimasonry, and the leaders of the deceived multitude, should they ever succeed in their ultimate views, will laugh to scorn the blind and deluded followers who have raised them into power. How long will the people suffer themselves to be used as the miserable drudges of such men? What have the people to gain by the prostration of a large portion of their fellow citizens, with whom they have lived from childhood in amity and good will, and whose personal worth they have long known and appreciated? What will the people gain by putting on harness and dragging the car of a few selfish and ambitious men? Nothing but the contempt and derision which are the reward of dupes whose services are no longer needed.

"Nor have our opponents contented themselves with the destruction of the temporal prosperity of Freemasons. They have dared to profane the altar of the church and to mingle the fierce waves of human animosity with the pure fountain of heavenly faith. They have dared to connect the transitory excitements of evil passions with the eternal destinies of man. They have insulted the majesty of the Creator within the walls of his own sacred and solemn temple. The apostles of religion, the ministers of the Gospel, the meek and faithful followers of our Saviour, have been driven from the pulpit and debarred the exercise of their holy vocation, because they are members of the MASONIC FRATERNITY! Members of the church have also been forbidden to approach the altar, and denied a participation of the sacrament unless they would renounce Freemasonry!—Not even the grave itself is sacred from the spirit of antimasonic persecution. The sepulchre—before whose awful gate human hatred is supposed to pause and human vengeance to relent—the sepulchre of the unconscious dead, where there is neither the spirit of resistance nor the power of vengeance, has been wantonly, barbarously, inhumanly invaded. Our late Grand Master DE WITT CLINTON, was not yet cold in his grave, the lamentation of a bereaved people had not yet ceased, when calumny aimed her burning arrow at the reputation of the mighty dead, and the foul hand of detraction grasped the laurel of his renown.—He was publicly stigmatised as a suicide, by the antimasonic press—and a suicide, because he sanctioned and was privy to the ABDUCTION of Morgan, and did not dare to meet the consequences of detection.

"And can nothing appease this rapacious spirit of antimasonry? No—it is insatiate as the grave—like the daughter of the horse leech it crieth, 'Give—give—and is never satisfied.' Reason has pleaded in vain—fornearance has been fruitlessly exerted—submission has been recompensed with scorn. In this region of the excitement, many of our brethren have surrendered their charters, in the hope of appeasing their persecutors and restoring the tranquillity of the public. This act of self sacrificing and patriotic devotion has been unavailing—the storm still rages—the bloodhounds of persecution still track the path of the mason, and the man-hunters are still urging them on. The wild and unbridled passions of the misguided people are still excited by the designing few—the evil feelings of frail humanity are lashed into fury, and a spirit has gone abroad, destitute of remorse and bent upon extermination. And all this must be—society must be thrown into confusion and dismay, freemen must be deprived of their constitutional rights, of their liberty as citizens, and of their 'pursuits of happiness'—the church must be profaned and her pastors separated from their flocks—the living must be sacrificed, and the dead must be slandered, in order that a few artful demagogues may monopolize all office of profit and power!

"What then remains? Freemasons must defend their rights or become as Helots in the land.—They must insist upon their privileges as citizens—not by violence nor by warfare, but by steadily watching their persecutors, by detecting and exposing their intrigues and calumnies, by laboring manfully and earnestly to disabuse the public, to remove the film from their eyes that they may see how grossly they have been deceived—by keeping masonry and politics as distant as pole from pole—and by continuing to deserve the protection and confidence of that portion of the community who are neither masons nor antimasons. The wishes of the generous, the good-will of the disinterested, and the hopes of the just will attend them, and whether they triumph or perish, they can say in the hour of success or of disaster, that they have done their duty to themselves, their families, and their country."

Antimasonry is a green-eyed monster—it can see nothing but evil in the deeds of the good.—Virtue, patriotism, and paternal affection, are but so many vices to its bleared vision. It traduces the memory of the dead as well as the living. It has recently thrust its sacrilegious hand into the tomb of WASHINGTON, and would drag from thence the bones of that sainted patriot, that they may mildew in the dampness of its own poisonous atmosphere—and it would blight the fair fame of that man "whose memory is embalmed in the hearts of his countrymen"—because he lived and died a mason!—Erie Observer.

A Row among the anti. Some Antimasons in Pennsylvania have nominated Jonathan Row as a candidate for the assembly of that State. Should he be elected, there will be an antimasonic Row in the legislature.

SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

ON THE PHENOMENA OF VOLCANOES.

BY SIR HUMPHREY DAVY.

In a paper on the decomposition of the earths, published in the Phil. Trans. for 1812, the author offered it as a conjecture, that the metals of the alkalis and earths might exist in the interior of the globe; and on being exposed to the action of air and water, give rise to volcanic fires, and to the production of lavas, by the slow cooling of which basaltic and other crystalline rocks might subsequently be formed. Vesuvius, from local circumstances, presents peculiar advantages for investigating the truth of this hypothesis; and of these the author availed himself during his residence at Naples, in the month of December, 1819, and of January and February, 1820. A small eruption had taken place a few days before he visited the mountain, and a stream of lava was then flowing with considerable activity from an aperture in the mountain a little below the crater, which was throwing up showers of red hot stones every two or three minutes. On its issuing from the mountain, it was perfectly fluid, and nearly white hot: its surface appeared to be in violent agitation from the bursting of numerous bubbles, which emitted clouds of white smoke. There was no appearance of vivid ignition in the lava when it was raised and poured out by an iron ladle. A portion was thrown into a glass bottle, which was then closed with a ground stopper, and, on examining the air in the bottle some time afterwards, it was found not to have lost any of its oxygen. Nitre thrown upon the surface of the lava did not produce such an increase of ignition as would have attended the presence of combustible matter. The gas disengaged from the lava proved on examination to be common air.

When the white vapors were condensed on a cold tin plate, the deposit was found to consist of very pure common salt; and the vapors themselves contained nine per cent of oxygen, the rest being azote, without any notable proportion of carbonic acid or sulphureous acid gases; although the fumes of the latter of these gases were exceedingly pungent in the smoke from the crater of the volcano. On another occasion, the author examined the saline incrustations in the rocks near the ancient bocca of Vesuvius, and found them to consist principally of common salt, with some chloride of iron, a little sulphate of soda, and a still smaller quantity of sulphate or muriate of potassa, with a minute portion of oxide of copper. In one instance, in which the crystals had a purplish tint, a trace of muriate of cobalt was detected. From the observation made by the author at different periods, he concludes that the dense white smoke which rose in immense columns from the stream of lava, and which reflected the morning and evening light of the purest tints of red and orange, was produced by the salts which were sublimed with the steam. It presented a striking contrast to the black smoke arising from the crater, which was loaded with earthly particles, and which in the night, was highly luminous at the moment of the explosion. The phenomena observed by the author affords a sufficient refutation of all the ancient hypotheses, in which volcanic fires were ascribed to such chemical causes as the combustion of mineral coal, or the action of sulphur upon iron; and are perfectly consistent with the supposition of their depending upon the oxidation of the metals of the earths upon an extensive scale, in immense subterranean cavities, to which water or atmospheric air may occasionally have access. The subterranean thunder heard at great distances under Vesuvius, prior to an eruption, indicates the vast extent of these cavities; and the existence of a subterranean communication between the Solfaterra and Vesuvius, is established by the fact that whenever the latter is in an active state, the former is comparatively tranquil. In confirmation of these views, the author remarks, that almost all the volcanoes of considerable magnitude in the old world, are in the vicinity of the sea; and in those where the sea is more distant, as in the volcanoes of South America, the water may be supplied from great subterranean lakes; for Humboldt states that some of them throw up quantities of fish. The author acknowledges, however, that the hypothesis of the nucleus of the globe being composed of matter liquefied by heat, offers a still more simple solution of the phenomena of volcanic fires.—Phil. Trans.

HON. EDWARD EVERETT.

[We extract the following from a work, just published in New-York, entitled "Sketches of Public Characters." It will be read with much interest.]

Mr. Everett you have seen, and therefore I need not describe his person to you; when in Europe he was, as you know, much caressed as a learned man; his course has been singular and prominent. While at Harvard University as a student he was distinguished, though very young; on leaving college he studied divinity and was ordained and settled a youthful prodigy. In elegant literature he had no equal of his age and the world was delighted with his pulpit eloquence; whenever he preached, crowds of the most accomplished of both sexes assembled to hear his splendid sermons; these discourses if they had not so much of the holy unction in them as in some sermons of graver men, still their was a purity of taste and a sweet solemnity that made him delightful to hearers of all creeds. A few years after his ordination he was elected to a professorship in Harvard University. This office he accepted on condition of being allowed to visit Europe and reside a year or two in Germany. He set out on this tour with all the ardor of a young man panting for knowledge and ambition of surpassing all, in his accomplishments. In his absence he visited Rome, France, and England, and tarried for some time at Gottengen, and became enamoured with German literature. He extended his travels to Greece, and there drank inspiration among the relics of ancient taste and greatness. He examined the Parthenon in its ruins with great minuteness, as well as all other things worthy of notice. He returned to his Alma Mater with a mind filled with 'the spoils of time,' and a memory stored with the humanities, the great object of his travels, and commenced his labors as a professor, and at once became the pride of the University and the delight of his pupils.

He did not confine himself to the instruction of college classes, but gave a splendid course of lectures on Architecture, which was numerously attended by the most enlightened persons of both sexes in the metropolis of New England. At this time he was considered the editor of the North American Review, which was well conducted, and took the lead in the periodicals of the country—His portions of the work are distinguished for taste, talent, and learning; there is a variety and raciness about his productions that mark one born and bred among the muses; in fact, he was a scholar by profession, and wore the laurel among all the lettered and polite as an every day ornament. In an evil hour for American literature, the politicians of his District turned their eyes upon him as a member of Congress, and he left the lecture room, perhaps never to return. In Congress he is respected for his learning and talents. When he rises all are anxious to catch every word he has to say—not that his eloquence there is as good as it was in the pulpit, or lecture room, but that the information he gives may be relied on, for he has day and date, chapter and page, for every thing he says, and the purity of his language forms a great contrast to that of many of those around him. He has too much refinement for the rough and tumble of Congress skirmishing. In this body he has frequently been selected as Chairman of Committees to make reports, on important subjects, and these are generally admitted for their clearness of reasoning and appropriateness of style; these reports are said to prove that he is greater in the closet than on the floor of the House; but he is great every where.

Such men are wanted in the American Congress; for loving the country so much as I do, I am constrained to confess that there is no little ignorance in the National assembly, and that learning does not always receive its due honor.—Mr. Everett's eloquence is characterised by taste, sweetness, harmony, delicacy and correctness. It has the Ciceronian flow, ease and purity, and all the great Roman's accuracy and marks of scholarship. He is said to be ambitious, and to dearly love political distinctions. Of this, it is probable, he will soon get cured in the shiftings and changings of party, and in the fullness of his genius, return from the bustle of the hall of Legislation to the groves of the Academy he deserted. If it should so happen, it will be well; for learning should have more knowledge of the world than it generally has, and the world should have more learning than it is disposed to honor and cherish.

THE VOLCANO KLOOTCHEFSKY. At the back of the village (Klutchee) rises the volcano Kloutchefskey, rearing his flaming head a considerable distance above the clouds. This huge mountain, towering to the skies, is a perfect cone, decreasing gradually from its enormous base to the summit. Kloutchefskey may, perhaps, be inferior to Mount Aetna in size, but it certainly surpasses it in beauty. The summit is eternally covered with snow, and from the crater issues a volume of flame and smoke, that streaks the sky for many miles. Sometimes quantities of fine ashes are thrown out, which fall almost imperceptibly, and impregnate the atmosphere, so as to be inhaled in breathing. The inhabitants informed me that they affect the lungs, and produce a tickling cough and a swelling of the glands, similar to that occasioned by the suppression of perspiration.—When a pure flame issues from the crater of Kloutchefskey it is seen at the Tigil and Aleutian coast, at a distance of 300 wersts. I thought the valley of Sherron very beautiful; but the sublime is so happily blended with the beautiful that I gave the preference to Klutchee, and nothing can exceed the grandeur and majesty of Kloutchefskey.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JULY 3, 1830.

TO OUR PATRONS.

WERE the publishers of the MASONIC MIRROR to permit the occasion, of presenting the present number, to pass by, without tendering, to their brethren and patrons, an acknowledgment of the generous encouragement they have received, they would do violence to their own feelings.—

Indeed, the prosperous and flattering position, in which the MIRROR has been placed, partly by our own exertions, yet in a great degree by the favorable exertions and punctuality of our friends, and the friends of the cause, in which we are embarked, demands and elicits, at our hands, a free and unqualified expression of our sincere gratitude and thanks.

The MIRROR was recommenced under the most inauspicious circumstances. A strong panic, wholly unique in its character, had seized on the minds of a large number of our brethren. Many, for whose opinions we have a high regard, were opposed to offering any resistance to the calumnies that were heaped upon the Institution, and upon their own characters. They seemed to be fully under the influence of that benign precept, which says, "whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also." Into such practical operation had this maxim been carried, that it was a matter of serious alarm, lest there might ultimately be a paucity of cheeks, to satisfy the insatiable anger of our opponents! This, in the opinion of our friends, was an insuperable objection to the recommencement of the paper. But, from sympathy, or other cause, it operated differently on our minds. Fully convinced of the expediency and necessity of the course we had predetermined to pursue; neither rhetoric nor argument, founded on timidity, could move us from our purpose. Perhaps it may have been said that, we were obstinate and rash. If we were so, we have now no cause of repentance. Be that as it may, we boldly launched our little bark, amidst the contentious billows of faction. She has rode out the violence of the tempest; and on the subsiding waves of the storm, with favoring gales and full spread canvass, is now, we trust, safely approaching the haven of security.

Confident, as we were, of the ultimate success of our enterprise; we were not so sanguine, as to anticipate so rapid an increase of our patrons, as now appears, from the inspection of our subscription list. Such public favor is an incentive to future exertion, on our part; and a pledge of future success, which we are too grateful to conceal or disregard. A continuance of the favoring smiles and increasing exertions of our brethren, will soon relieve us from trembling anxieties; and place us on a mound of security, where we may defy the assaults of the invader; and from the vantage ground of our castle, with greater ease to ourselves, and certainty of success, fight the battles of the FRATERNITY.

As before remarked, we were convinced of the expediency and necessity of having a suitable medium, through which, our calumniated and persecuted Institution could be defended from the assaults of its unprincipled and violent traducers; through which, its principles might be developed, explained and advocated. We felt assured that, in this way if in any, the unholy excitement, which has severed sacred ligaments of society, and nearly destroyed the milder and nobler feelings of the human heart, could be assuaged and checked in its unrighteous career. And we have the vanity to presume, in coincidence with the expressed opinion of many of our brethren, that we have had some influence in accomplishing this desirable object; that the MIRROR has had a tendency, in some instances, to remove those illfounded prejudices and to hush the aspersions, which have, for a long time, been levelled against the members of our ancient and honorable Institution.—Our exertions, we trust, have emanated from pure principles. Our editorial task has been laborious and highly responsible; and if we have not completely fulfilled our obligations and gratified the reasonable expectations and even desires of our patrons, the failure must be imputed, not to indolence, but to embarrassments, and to inability.

Masons, wherever dispersed, are enlisted in one common cause. They are, emphatically speaking, brethren of the same great family. Sedulously endeavoring to promote the happiness of their species; to meliorate the condition of human life, they are influenced by like causes, and urged onward to the attainment of the great and benevolent end they have in view, by like considerations. Without union of sentiment and concert in action, they would be like the bark, without compass, and with many pilots, tossed to and fro on the billows of the ocean. Their efforts would counteract each other, and become negatory. The object would be lost in the clashing of opinions. It is then of some consequence, that this union and concert should be preserved. And we presume it will not be denied that, Masonic publications have this tendency. Nor will it be doubted that, such works are happily calculated to strengthen the bonds of friendship; and to impart increased vigor to that kindred feeling, which is characteristic of our Institution, and which, in our Lodges, is so often and so forcibly inculcated. They constitute a medium, through which the brotherhood may freely communicate their sentiments and their opinions. They offer an opportunity for interchange of thought; a channel, through which our friends, however distant, may have intercourse. Reciprocity of sentiment produces harmony, friendship and love. An interchange of thought, whether by writing or colloquy, strengthens the ties of affection; insures concert of operation, and consequent success, by the favor of heaven, in all benevolent, wise and laudable enterprises. The venerable and venerated LAFAYETTE has told us that, "the HARMONY and RESPECTABILITY of Masonry, throughout this extensive country, may well be regarded as affording an IMPORTANT PILLAR of SUPPORT and UNION to its free institutions and happy form of government." Let us then, leave no effort untried to maintain this "harmony and respectability." Let a due consideration of its importance be engrafted on the minds of our brethren. Let us develop the principles of our Institution; and urge a strict compliance with their requisitions. Through what medium can this be more effectually accomplished, than through the columns of a periodical paper, pledged to the interests of Masonry? But arguments are not at this time necessary, to convince our brethren of the expediency and importance of publications of this character. As we said a year ago, so say we now again, let Masons do their DUTY: let them disprove the charges, which the ignorant and malicious have preferred against them; expose and hold up to public indignation the dishonesty and wickedness of their authors; spread the principles and objects of their Institution, fully and clearly, before an impartial public; and they may rest assured that a just and righteous judgment will be awarded them. The press is the only medium, through which these things can be effected. It is only through the columns of a public print, that the public ear can be reached. Through this channel alone, can the members of the Masonic Institution expect to be heard in their defence. That such works may be of service, commensurate with the importance of the cause, they must have an extensive circulation. The brotherhood must co-operate to give them this circulation; if they would reap the full benefit and advantage to be derived from them. The public cannot feel that interest in the circulation of Masonic works, that they do in literary or scientific publications. They possess no peculiar interest, to invite the attention and support of the uninitiated. By Masons alone, they must be sustained.

Should it be objected to us, by any, that we have conducted towards our opponents, with too much severity and acrimony: To such we would observe; that we are aware, asperity of remark rarely produces conviction on the mind. It is, therefore, in ordinary cases of controversy, to be studiously avoided. There are times and occasions, however, where its use is justifiable. There are cases, which neither the powers of logic nor the flowers of rhetoric can reach. There are men too, who can be aroused to a sense of their own unworthiness, only by the shafts of satire and the lash of severity. These seldom fail to produce the desired effect, even where reason and evidence would be nugatory. In such cases we have brought them to our aid. We have made it a point, in commenting on men or measures, to adapt our language to the nature and character of the subject under review.—

Where we have thought that reason and evidence would be allowed to exert the influence, to which they are always entitled, we have resorted to them. But where the authority of neither are acknowledged, we have applied the lash. And for having done so, we have no apology to offer. We may regret the existence of occasion, requiring such severity of language; but we contend that its use is justifiable. We have often been personal in our remarks; but we doubt not that, the subjects of our animadversions, should they examine themselves, will gratefully acknowledge that they have received greater lenity at our hands, than their infamous characters and conduct merited. On this score then, neither party has cause for regret. We have likewise had occasion to advert to the proceedings of certain religious convocations, and ministerial mismanagements. In this, we have stripped hypocrisy of its mask; for which the truly devout christian, will feel obliged to us. This too, is a matter of satisfaction to all parties: to the good, that we have shielded them from the impositions of the hypocrite: to the bad, that we have saved them from plunging still deeper into the pit of infamy and wickedness: to ourselves, that we have done our duty.—The political knave, also, has passed under review; and been exhibited, in his naked deformity, to public gaze: an object of public scorn and derision. In this way, we have "done the State some service." So that, in a retrospective glance at our labors, for the year past, we find no cause for regret, on the score of commissions. But we dare not turn the picture. We dare not examine the register of omissions. We fear there are too many. We throw ourselves on the kindness and indulgence of our patrons.

In regard to the future course of the MIRROR, it does not seem necessary that much should be said. If we make no promises, we shall certainly violate none. It will ever be our endeavor to develop and defend the principles of Freemasonry. To the full extent of our abilities, we will shield the Institution from the violent attacks of madmen and knaves; for of such is the antimasonic faction principally composed. The vile managements and the infamous characters of these men, we shall continue to execrate and expose. When we have driven the miscreants into merited obscurity, we will leave them to revel in their own disgrace. That the period is near at hand, when this will be effected, is most unequivocally indicated by the present state of public opinion. The light of TRUTH is beginning to scatter the clouds of ignorance and fanaticism, to purify the atmosphere, and impart to the deluded mind, serenity and vigor. The people are beginning to awake to a knowledge of the wicked impositions which have been practised upon them. And they will rise in their strength and their might, to crush the monster.

No arguments are required to prove that, there is among us a combination of desperate men, whose avowed purpose is the overthrow of the Institution of Freemasonry: men, whose secular existence hangs on the attainment of this unhallowed object. That they have succeeded to a considerable extent, in poisoning the minds of our fellow citizens, and in creating prejudices against the Institution, detrimental to its present interests, is not to be controverted. But that multiplied legions of such fanatics, can disturb the stable foundation of the Masonic fabric, is too preposterous to admit of a moment's serious consideration. As well may they attempt to arrest the flight of time, or quench the great luminary, time's marker and regulator in the heavens; as well may fanaticism attempt to extinguish a spark of immortality; as to crush the Masonic spirit; a spirit so intimately blended and deeply rooted in the best sensibilities of the heart; so admirable in its purposes, so universal in its extent. From the prairies of the far off West, to the rocky hills of New-England, its benevolent influences are felt. The mighty Roman, whose eagle first perched upon the cliffs of our mother Isle, there introduced and promulgated the sacred principles of Freemasonry.—“Where are now the attributes of the ancient mistress of the earth? Her works stamp an immortality upon the name of Rome; her achievements blazon and adorn the page of history; her glory flourishes in the mind of the scholar and the antiquarian. But where is her puissance? Her seven hills indeed still remain, but the spirit that ennobled them is extinct. Her diadem of power has been torn from her brow. Her eagle has been plucked of his plumes.—The Goth and the Vandal have rioted in her high places: Attila has polluted the sanctuary of her glory. The voice of liberty is reverberated no longer in her forum. The destiny of empires has overtaken her. Humanity weeps over her desolation, and history inscribes upon her moral and political ruins, hic fuit Roma.” Amid all these mighty revolutions, the humble system of Freemasonry has flourished in perpetual beauty and vigor; like the Christian religion, its energy has increased and its influence and benefits have expanded, with its years. Need we look for other vindication of the purity, benevolent and beneficent character of Masonic principles, than is afforded by these facts? Let scepticism cavil. The mightiest empires of antiquity, have been swept away in the surges of revolutions; but the Institution of Freemasonry has flourished amid the storms which desolated them. The distresses incident to man, and “the poor abide with us always,” and beneficence and Freemasonry abide with them. Dynasties have been subverted: political tempers have shaken the world to its centre; the rage of national conflicts has prostrated the sublimest systems of human wisdom and the proudest monuments of human art. Amid all this wreck of empires, and this crush of magnificence and power, the march of the humble spirit of Freemasonry has been steady, onward and irresistible. Shall a few fanatics stay its course? Let arguments of ignorance and sophistry be piled up against it, like the Alps upon the Appenines, and one gentle breathing of TRUTH shall sweep them away. Like the mighty rock, which for centuries has withstood the ocean’s rage, and forced the beating surge to recoil from its breast, so this benevolent Institution will breast the malign shafts of religious intolerance and political intrigue, and dash them back, with dismay, upon the assailants. It will stand unmoved and unscathed, amid the storms and fires of faction; and, like the bright luminary of day, finally emerge from the black lowering clouds which for a time, may have obscured its splendor. The time approaches; yea and almost now is; when antimasons themselves, inflamed, hardened, seared and brazened, as they have been, will blush at their own iniquity; and, like the promoters of the Salem delusion of witchcraft, will shrink and shudder at the relation of their own doings. The sun of science is rising; truth triumphs over error; charity and philanthropy are spreading their “healing wings” over the nations; ignorance, falsehood, delusion, bigotry, witchcraft and sorcery, are fleeing away, or “hiding their diminished heads,” in shame; and shrinking from beneath the blaze of light, which already begins to pervade the happy horizon of our country. Darkness, persecution, pestilence and famine shall not overspread our happy land! Republican America shall yet remain republican; and CHARITY and FREEMASONRY shall yet continue, hand in hand, to walk together in love; and every PATRIOT shall cry aloud, “so mote it be!”

NOTE.—We would, at this time, respectfully ask leave to remark, (merely for the gratification of a supposed curiosity on the part of our patrons,) that, if there be one season in the life of newspaper publishers, more peculiarly interesting than another, it is when they present to their patrons and friends, the first number of a new volume, and the bill of a new year. Much is the interest enhanced when both are kindly received.

ANTIMASONIC PAPERS.—The Free Press, at Johnstown; the Watch Tower, at Fort Plain; and the Chronicle at Geneva, New York; the Intelligencer, at Hudson; and the Chronicle, at New-Philadelphia, Ohio; and the Democrat, at Venango, Pa.—all antimasonic—have gone to the shades. The cause is very prosperous!

It has been truly said, that the present time calls loudly for the exertions and vigilance of every honest man in the community. A violent effort is now making to sow the seeds of disaffection and distraction throughout every department of society. A sect has arisen in the political world, hitherto unknown and unparalleled, in the annals of party warfare. Proceeding with all the misguided zeal of a blind enthusiasm, without pretention to any political principle, they evince all the virulence of the worst days of party spirit, joined with an intolerance and proscription, equal in character and in spirit, to those religious fanaticisms that burned with the fagot and tortured with the inquisitorial wheel. “The Huguenots of France, denounced and excommunicated as heretics; proscribed and persecuted for a mere difference of opinion, that none but a casuist could discover; exiled and banished from their country and their firesides, as being disorganizers and enemies to social order, the innocent victims of a persecution, not less dangerous in its tendency, not less intolerant in its character, and not less founded upon the blindness of enthusiasm and the credulity of ignorance, than the present crusade against Masons.” Let every good man in the country; every sincere friend to our free institutions, raise his voice against a faction, whose sweeping system of proscription, distinguishes not between the innocent and the guilty; whose denunciations fall alike on the living and the departed; whose calumnies are heaped, with a profuse hand, on the manes of the conscript fathers of our common country.—Let the voice of justice be raised against the hydra, if not for the living, at least for the veneration and respect we bear to the illustrious dead.

PENNSYLVANIA.—It cannot be otherwise than a matter of great satisfaction to the philanthropist and to the friend of his country, and to her free institutions, to learn that, the people of the great and patriotic State of Pennsylvania, are taking effective measures to check the proscriptive and persecuting demon of antimasasonry, in its unhallowed and ruinous career. The high handed villainies of the leaders of this faction, have aroused the people to a sense of their danger. The papers of that State, contain the proceedings of a large meeting of citizens, who are neither Masons nor Antimasons, held in Menallen township, Adams county; at which a number of resolutions were adopted, condemning, in strong and unequivocal terms, the unrighteous excitement which has raged for some months past, with fiendlike violence, in that section of the State. These resolutions justly impugn the motives of the men engaged in the infamous cause of moral depravity. A convention of all those who are opposed to “persecution and proscription,” is to be holden at the Court House in Gettysburg, on the 31st of August next, to consult upon measures to counteract the sinister views of the profligate and abandoned political jugglers of the State. We have no doubt that the meeting will be well attended, and that efficient measures will be taken to effect the object in view. Similar meetings are to be called in other counties. Now that the people have taken the subject into their own hands, antimasasonry in that State, must soon sink into its native sloughs of moral corruption.

ANTIMASONIC CONVENTIONS.—The Saratoga Sentinel says, the antimasonic district convention, which was to have been held at Caldwell, went over, for want of an attendance of parties. Two from Saratoga county were present, but they could not form a quorum. It always requires four on such occasions: one for chairman, two for secretaries, and one to introduce resolutions. A letter to the editors of the Albany Record, dated Morristown, N. J. says, the attempts to get up an antimasonic State Convention here, will prove abortive. Not half a dozen men of respectability will attend.

It is common for certain antimasons to complain that we charge them with many things, of which they are not guilty. They cannot disprove our charges: they dare not attempt it. We have never charged them with being honest men. When we do, we will admit the justness of their complaints.

It will be seen that the present number of the Mirror appears in a new and enlarged form. The publishers have made many improvements, in consideration of the liberal patronage that has been extended to them.—By this arrangement, they will be enabled to publish a much larger quantity of matter, and, they hope to impart additional interest to the paper. The expenses of the publication will necessarily be considerably enhanced. They rely, with much confidence, on the liberality and exertions of their brethren, in giving to the paper an extended and extensive circulation. We think it would not be very difficult for a majority of our present subscribers to add, at least, one additional name to our subscription list. This they are respectfully invited to attempt. Secretaries of Lodges are respectfully requested to accept the agency of the work.

The Fairfield (Con.) County Republican, speaking of an antimasonic mountebank by the name of Allyn, has the following remark:—“We hope never to see the time when the antimasonic faction shall sway the empire of the land. The disorganizing effects of their system have already been sufficiently felt, and the result of their proceedings has evinced, that if they triumph, it will be the triumph of any thing, and every thing, except morality, virtue, and good order. If the men who are prowling about the country, in the shape of antimasonic lecturers, sundering the dearest ties of society, and traducing the characters of the best citizens, can find no fitter employment, it would be well to teach them a lesson on the treadmill. If the good sense of the community does not put a stop to their unhallowed career, Heaven only knows to what lengths discord will be carried.”

NEW PAPER.—The first number of a new semi-monthly, appeared in this city, on the 15th ult. entitled the “AMATEUR. A Journal of Literature and the Fine Arts.” It is published in the quarto form; each number consisting of sixteen neatly printed pages. The number before us, is embellished with a beautifully designed and handsomely executed title-page, or frontispiece. The matter is mostly original, and of a high order. From the known talents and literary acquirements of its editor, FREDERIC S. HILL, Esq. there can be no doubt that this work will take a high stand—and hold it too—among the most popular periodicals of the day. We wish it success, and recommend it as worthy of liberal patronage. The terms are $3 a year.

Masons, like other men, claim to be protected in the enjoyment of their civil rights. What crime have the Masons of New-England committed, that they should be deprived of the common rights of man? They, at least, were not concerned in the Morgan outrage. What treason have they committed? Where is the head and front of their offending? Shame! shame! Such intolerance does not become the character of American citizens.

CHARLESTOWN.—The second centennial anniversary of the settlement of Charlestown and the landing of Gov. Winthrop, was celebrated on Monday last. An eloquent and appropriate address was delivered by Hon. EDWARD EVERETT. The ceremonies were suitable to the occasion, and unusually interesting. The address will probably issue from the press early next week.

SUICIDE.—The Rev. Mr. Sanborn, infamously notorious for his antimasonic productions committed suicide on Tuesday week, in the town of Painted Post, by hanging himself.

KING OF ENGLAND.—The late English papers state that the health of the King is improving, and that he may, for the present at least, be considered out of danger.

The illhealth of the editor, renders a temporary absence necessary. He craves the indulgence of his readers and patrons.

To our correspondents, we are under many and peculiar obligations; and we improve this occasion to tender them our grateful acknowledgments, and to solicit a continuance of favors.

THE WRITER.

THE BLIND MOTHER.

I saw a mother! in her arms
Her infant child was sleeping;
The mother while the infant slept,
Her guardian watch was keeping.

Around its little tender form
Her snow white arms was flung;
And o'er its little infant head
Her bending tresses hung.

'Sleep sweetly on my darling babe,
My own, my only child!'
And as she spoke the infant woke,
And on its mother smil'd.

'But oh! no fondly answering while
The mother's visage grac'd,
For she was blind and could not see
The infant she embrac'd.

But now he lisped his mother's name,
And now the mother press'd
Her darling, much lov'd baby boy,
Unto her widow'd breast.

But sudden anguish seiz'd her mind,
Her voice was sweetly wild;
'My God,' she cried, 'but grant me sight
One hour! to see my child.

'To look upon its cherub face,
And see its father's there;
But pardon, if the wish be wrong;
A widow'd mother's prayer!'

And as she spoke, her anguish grew
More load and still more wild;
And closer to her aching breast
She clasp'd her orphan child.

MISCELLANY.

FEMALE BEAUTY.—From an essay in the last number of Mrs. Hale's Ladies' Magazine, on Beauty.

To sum up the whole, the charms that are really indispensable to being beloved, may be possessed by every one who is not personally, or mentally, or morally deformed. Let us enumerate them. Firstly—an eye, whether black, blue, or gray, that has the spirit of kindness in its expression.

Secondly—a mouth that is able to say a good deal, and that sincerely. Its teeth, kept as clean as possible, must be an argument of cleanliness in general; it also must be very good-natured to servants, and friends that come in unexpectedly to dinner.

Thirdly—a figure that shall preserve itself, not by neglecting any of its duties, but by good taste, exercise, and a dislike of gross living.—A woman may be fond of almost any pleasures under the sun, except those of tattling, and the table, and ostentation.

Fourthly—the art of being happy at home, and making that home the abode of peace. Where can peace dwell, if there be not piety? These qualities will sway the souls of men, when the shallower perfections enumerated in this article would cease to charm. A good heart is the best beautifier.

THE LATE DR. WOLLASTON.—Small as was Dr. Wollaston's laboratory, and minute as were the means to which he had recourse in making his experiments they proved exceedingly profitable to his purse. His discovery of the malleability of platinum, it has been asserted, alone produced about £30,000. He is also said to have derived great pecuniary advantages from several of his other and even minor discoveries and inventions, which being of a nature likely to make them immediately and generally useful, were certain in a short time to produce a considerable return. It has been doubted by some whether this distinguished man, great as he was in science, and possessing many excellent qualities, would not have been greater had his views been less directed to the acquisition of fortune. But if the following story be true—and there is every reason to believe that it is so—it proves how very distinct a thing is the prudence that acquires wealth, from the iron hearted parsimony which buries it:—Having been applied to by a gentleman, who was involved by unexpected difficulties, to procure some government situation, Dr. Wollaston's reply was, "I have lived to 60 without asking a single favor from men in office, and it is not after that age I shall be induced to do so, even were it to serve a brother. If the enclosed can be of use to you in your present difficulties, pray accept it, for it is much at your service." The enclosed was a check for ten thousand pounds.—Annual Biography.

ANECDOTE.—A story is told of the late Rev. Mr. Sprague, of Dublin, N. H. which sets the remarkable simplicity of the learned parson in a very ludicrous light. Paying a visit to one of his parishioners, he threw the bridle of his horse over the post of a rail fence near the house. During his stay the animal contrived to disengage the bridle from the post and get it under his feet—seeing which, a servant girl drew the reins through one of the mortises and over the top of the post in the form of a noose. The parson took his leave, and going to untie his horse was indiscribably astonished to find the bridle, which he had simply thrown over the post, thus past through one of the holes. "This beats all!" ejaculated he to himself. "I never saw the like of it in all my life before!" To be sure, we read of a camel going through the eye of a needle—but that was in the days of miracles. No, no, I never saw the like of this before!" He examined it anew; he tried to get the bridle out—but it surpassed his ingenuity. "Yes, it must be," said he, "the horse has actually crawled through the post-hole—there's no other way to account for it!" Full of this impression, and despairing of making the animal retrace his steps, he whipped out his knife, and was about cutting the reins, when the same girl, perceiving his quandary, released the horse and explained the mystery. But if the simple parson had been astonished before, he was little less so now, to find his own penetration surpassed by that of a servant girl. "Hey, girl," said he, "I believe you're right—but how in the name of wonder should a girl like you know more than a man of my learning. It's astonishing! astonishing! miraculous! miraculous!"

LATE WINTER IN SPAIN.—So severe has been the effect of the late severe weather upon the animal kingdom, that the household in the Royal palace of Granja have been compelled to discharge regular volleys every morning upon their enemies, the wolves, for the mere purpose of scaring them from the scene for a few hours. In the city of Gaudalaxara, a girl, 17 years of age, was torn to pieces by a hungry bear, in her own house into which he had prowled for food. In Pravia, a town in the Asturias, the inhabitants did not dare to quit their homes after sunset, for the wolves, after lurking about the high ways and devouring travellers, and horses, and whatever come in their way in the shape of food, entered the town in large bodies at night, and wherever they found a house door opened, satiated their ravenous appetites by killing and tearing to pieces men, women, children and animals. In another quarter a bear entered a cow-shed on the 15th of Jan, and devoured a calf. In Biscay, a pasiega, or female peasant on the mountains of St. Andero, was hawking about her little store, with a child bound upon the top of a basket, at her back; not only the child but the unfortunate parent herself, were overtaken by the wolves and eaten up, even an orderly, who was proceeding on horseback from St. Sebastian to Pampeluna, and his horse also, met the same lamentable fate. Many hundreds of human beings, particularly muleteers, have been froze to death in the upper provinces of Andalusia.

A mild tempered woman is a balsam that heals matrimonial sorrows.

Choose a wife, as you would a knife—by her temper.

APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE OF VERMONT,

On the subject of the Antimasonic excitement; by the Lodges of Freemasons in the County of Orange, and the Valley of White River.

INTRODUCTION.

At a meeting of Delegates from the several Lodges in the county of Orange and part of the county of Windsor, convened at Chelsea, on the 16th December A. L. 5829—for the purpose of taking into consideration the excitement on the subject of Freemasonry:—

SAMUEL AUSTIN, was appointed Chairman.

JACOB K. PARISH, Secretary.

It was Resolved, That it is expedient to publish an Address to the People of Vermont, on the subject of the present antimasonic excitement.

Resolved, that WYMAN SPOONER, Hon. D. AZRO BUCK, and DAVID PALMER, M. D. be a committee to prepare an Address, in pursuance of the preceding resolution.

In conformity with the above resolutions, the following Appeal has been prepared and submitted to the several Lodges represented in convention; by whom it has been unanimously accepted, and is now respectfully offered to the People of Vermont.

A considerable diversity of opinion has existed in relation to the propriety of addressing the public on the subject of Masonry. By many it has been held unnecessary to go into the discussion, as the principles of the society are open to the inspection of all; and as its character has long since been decided on, by the unanimous voice of every civilized community on the globe. From the prevalence of these views, masons remained silent for a long time, after the commencement of the antimasonic excitement.—And, while antimasonry had for its apparent object, the detection and punishment of the perpetrators of a flagrant breach of the laws, they had no desire to oppose its efforts. But when that object was accomplished, and when it was perceived that antimasonry had assumed the form of a political party, it seemed necessary that something should be done to exhibit its true character to the public. With this view, a convention was called, in this county, in the spring of 1828, and the propriety of taking some measures to disabuse the public in relation to antimasonry was discussed. It was however judged best by a majority, at the time, to take no measures on the subject, but silently to trust the cause of masonry to the candor and intelligence of the community. We have since had cause to doubt the correctness of that decision. The industry and zeal of the emissaries of antimasonry, have effected more than could have been supposed possible, by those who reposed the least confidence, in the good sense and integrity of our population. Every town, and nearly every school district, has an agent, who is furnished with cheap publications, newspapers, tracts, and almanacs, containing the articles of this new religion. The Jesuits, who aimed at exercising a spiritual dominion over all the nations of the globe, were not more intent on their purpose, than these apostles of malevolence and discord. And the effect their exertions have produced on the public mind, is already such, as cannot be regarded without extreme anxiety, by every friend of his country. And when public opinion, exercises such unrivalled sway as it does in our community, it would seem unwise, longer to delay appealing to its decision, and endeavoring by an impartial statement of our case, to secure its favor. It is comparatively a small matter, that a few, or even many masons however worthy, should be deprived of the honors and emoluments of office. It is the ferocious feeling that is rapidly taking possession of the public mind that is chiefly to be deprecated. And masons are far from being the only objects against whom this ferocity is directed. All who do not at once join the crusade against the society, are denounced with equal bitterness; and thus it falls out, that a great majority of the candid, and intelligent part of the community, have become the objects of antimasonic hatred.

In ancient Athens, the citizen whose integrity and talents rendered him obnoxious to the leaders of the rabble, was banished by the ostracism: and by thus placing ambitious and unprincipled men at the head of affairs, and discouraging the exercise of talents and virtue, that seat of science and refinement became the prize-fighting field of demagogues, and, ultimately, the prey of tyrants. And the spirit of the ostracism is growing up among us. Men of liberal acquirements and tried integrity, are compelled to give place to those of a different character. The possession of integrity, disqualifies the possessor from acting successfully the part of a demagogue, or fomentor of the passions of the rabble.

From the intelligence diffused amongst all classes of our people, we ought to have nothing answering, in any degree, to the besotted rabble of European countries: nor should we, but for the exertions of the profligate and unprincipled, who contrive to turn the intelligence of the people against themselves, by vitiating the sources from whence it flows. The press, the great spring of public opinion in America, is made to send forth polluted streams. If any are inclined to doubt the efficiency of these causes, let them turn their attention to the late election in the city of New York. A female atheist, the concubine of a state prison convict, had been lecturing on infidelity, in several of our cities, and at length fixed her standard in New York, where several newspaper presses were directly engaged in disseminating her doctrines and repeating her blasphemies. And the result was, that six thousand, out of the twenty thousand votes cast in the city, were given for the candidates of the party headed by this lewd woman of Babylon, and one of them was elected. And in the western section of the State, by addressing the same passions, antimasonry has been able to produce nearly the same effects. It matters little by what causes popular excitement is produced. When it is once raised, the people become ready tools, in the hands of the profligate demagogue. And, in our country, much more is to be dreaded from misdirected public opinion, than in the older and differently governed countries of Europe. We have no fast anchored monarchy, tracing its descent from the Conqueror, or Clovis, or Rodolph of Habsburg; no aristocracy, bound by every tie of interest and affection to the throne; and no standing army. We live under a government, not of bayonets, but of—Newspapers. And may we not shudder, when we behold that public opinion to which we must all submit, growing every day more perverted. We are aware that it is the fashion to boast of the intelligence and virtue of our population; and to predict the permanence of our institutions: but the success of the antimasonic enterprise has weakened our faith in these predictions. It has shown that a great mass of our population is capable of being acted on by factious intriguers, and that we may well dread the same catastrophe that has overtaken all other republics.

We have no earthly safety, but in the purity of the morals, and the correctness of the intelligence, of our people. We lie at the mercy of popular opinion. And if this mania of antimasonry, should increase, until a majority of the community become infected, we shall be at the mercy of a monster, whose tender mercies may emphatically be called cruel. Antimasons boldly proclaim that they are engaged in a war of extermination! They seem to have wrought their passions to a pitch, at which they believe it practicable, not only to destroy all our societies, but all the members. To keep up the excitement, agitation and distraction are introduced into churches. And these institutions, that should be wholly devoted to the solemn duties of preparation for a future state, are converted into an arena for political gladiators. A cautious, wily policy is pursued; inflammatory pamphlets, and newspapers, are secretly furnished to the weaker members: secret meetings are held; and when a majority is secured, the members who are masons, are boldly told, to renounce their masonry, or their seat at the table of the Lord. The Sabbath school, the quiet unpretending agent of incalculable good, is blighted, and trodden down, in the track of this fell destroyer. Teachers of the common schools, have been compelled to admit the antimasonic illiterature into their courses of instruction, or be dismissed from their employment! The temperance enterprise, which so honorably distinguishes the present period, has been thwarted, and opposed, when its principles have been advocated by freemasons. Indeed, all the benevolent purposes of the day in which we live, are frustrated, when touched by the withering hand of antimasonry; and charity and religion alike disappear in this whirlpool of death. As a proof of its all absorbing, and hardening influence, it may be mentioned that no revival of religion, is known to have occurred within the sphere of its influence.

And why, we ask, all this intensity of feeling? Why are all other considerations of a religious or political kind overlooked or forgotten in this anxiety on the subject of Masonry? Freemasons have formed a part of every civilized community on the globe, for centuries; and never before, have they excited alarm except in the minds of despots, who have sometimes dreaded lest their intelligence, and virtue, should oppose obstacles to the exercise of their unhallowed will. And has freemasonry changed its character? Or does it appear that the men who compose the fraternity are as a body less upright and virtuous than the rest of the community? Are they less trust-worthy, and estimable after their initiation, than before? Antimasons have avoided the discussion of these questions. They have chosen rather to deal in dark insinuations. But we consider it important that the subject should be discussed before an enlightened community.

A state of strongly excited feeling is the state most eminently favorable to the views of unworthy aspirants for popular favor. In a state of excitement men are less able and less disposed to scrutinize the characters of those who lay claim to their confidence. Hence those who, without talents or virtue, have attempted to climb to the high places of power, have always succeeded best in times of popular commotion. The antimasonic leaders are abundantly apprised of this fact; and the floods of scurrilous invective that have been poured upon the masonic society, would seem to evince that they were aware that it is the passions and not the reason of the community they have to address. We do not deal in gratuitous assertions; and however revolting the task of raking in this kennel, we must submit to the degradation of presenting you with a very few of the thousand samples of antimasonic virulence.

The annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, holden at Portsmouth, during the last season, with the catholicism and affection that are the characteristics of that religious order, cautioned their brethren against the antimasonic excitement, and "especially to avoid the stirring up of strife amongst the people." This, which one would have thought tolerable advice in a christian community, was anathematized in the North Star, published at Danville, in the most pointed terms. It says, (Dec. 29, 1829,) "It is not believed that any of the resolutions go the length in denouncing and rejecting the works of darkness rendered visible, which the cause of religion, &c. required." It likewise complains bitterly of the effect, which it fears those resolutions may have, of preventing free discussion, i. e. antimasonic agitation. "It was a stifling of the plot" which these modern Oates and Dangerfields could not afford to submit to. The affair of the unfortunate Burnham must be fresh in the recollection of most of our people. After succeeding in getting a mutilated copy of the deposition relating to his escape from prison (in which nothing was said of his masonic character) published at Woodstock, where every one knew that he was not a mason, the agitators proceeded to our legislature and there by exhibiting their testimony that he was a mason and by proclaiming that he had escaped from prison through masonic connivance they succeeded in involving the State in an expense of something more $1000 for Lilliputian legislation!! The boby of Timothy Munroe was made to pass for that of William Morgan, and the individual who shaved and disfigured the festring corps is now a member of the New York legislature, to which he has been elected as a reward for his activity as an antimasonic agitator. In an address of the Baptist church of Thetford & Fairlee, Vermont, published in the Luminary of Dec. 23d, 1829, it is said that "that which is most to be abhorred in corrupted Judaism, that which is most blasphemous in Popery, and that which is most revolting in the false prophet, gather upon the institution of freemasonry a triple darkness, and make it alone in itself in its giant wickedness and unheard of deformity, more to be abhorred than any one of the before mentioned abominations." In another number of the same paper it is stated, that masons style one another "Kings of Heaven." And to crown the whole in this same Luminary, of Dec. 23, the anticipation is confidently expressed that "the people will be excited to madness." These facts and extracts are given as a very small portion of the evidence, that the antimasonic leaders are addressing the passions instead of the reason of the people. That they are endeavouring, (to use their own words,) "to excite the people to madness." And it is astonishing that, in this enlightened community, they should expect to succeed by means that would have failed to excite a Parisian mob in the darkest days of the "reign of terror." They manifest the most thorough contempt for the understandings of the people of this community, by dealing out to them falsehoods, more crude and improbable than the grossest tales of witchcraft and sorcery of the dark ages.

"We ask of no man to say that he is not opposed to masonry. Opinions, honestly imbibed we respect, and appreciate the worth of those who may entertain them.—We do not say whether the opinion that masonry is a bad institution, is an error or not. But we do say that the people have gained nothing by antimasonry, as it has been conducted by these men; by men who have no good at heart but their own good, and no wish, but to behold a whole community so much under their control, that their own will shall be law; their own the signal of slavish obedience, and their frown the forerunner of "pains and penalties" to those who exhibit a disposition to be their own masters.—Examiner.

PROSPECT AND RETROSPECT.

'Tis intellect that forms man's highest pride,
And moral pow'r a nation's happiest guide.
On diff'rent minds are diff'rent objects pressed,
With envied honors, or with greatness, blessed;
With bright escutcheon of a warrior's fame,
Or brighter tablet of an honest name.
Him down to Tartarus AMBITION drove,
Who mocked the thunder of Olympian Jove.¹

Unbroken silence reigned the Hall around;
No whispering lip obtrudes its feeble sound;
Each eye is fixed, is spell-bound to the chair,
And breathless expectation settles there.²
What high-wrought fancy pressed that lab'ring breast?
What fear to fail!—what hope to do its best!
The die was cast, to make for weal or woe,
When proud AMBITION shed its ardent glow.
Far in the past a devious pathway lay;³
Th' uncertain future shuns the light of day:
A flick'ring beacon lends its doubtful glare,
And lures the traitor to his own base snare.
The present—aye, the present is his own:
Deserted friends—like visioned spectres grown—
Haunt morbid fancy, in each varied wrong,
And to dishonor hurry him along.
Who honor, faith and former friendship flies,
In just proportion, zeal and promise tries.
Who violates all vows, who keeps not one,
Takes ten to prove that it is wisely done.
Straight he descends from that unhonored chair
And, speaking thus, another places there.

"Sir, when I look around this ancient Hall,
Our native land, this great, terrestrial ball,
My heart's oppressed to see what crimes abound!
I'm shock'd at evils that stalk boldly round!
My tender conscience bids my hand withdraw;
Nor touch, again, the things I've touched before.
Although they've failed to make my merits known,
That's not the reason I've so cautious grown.
Events occur, and in this very place,
To check ambition in its hopeful race.
That Irish gentleman has hurt our cause,
Though the spectators gave him great applause.
His Beef-steak sign I heard of once before:
I never wish to hear it mentioned more.
Some local things were overlooked, I fear:
THE FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY'S quite too near.
That picture near you should be covered o'er;⁴
It mars and damps the business on this floor.
Sir, once or twice, when I was seated nigh,
I thought I saw the flashes of his eye.
If you, however, think it should be seen,
I'll wave my wish to hide it with a screen.
Whatever others say of my new turn,
I hold it true it's ne'er too late to learn.
Sir, worldly wisdom is a costly thing;
Our life's half spent before we find its spring.
The very summit of our social ties
In this circumference of duty lies:
Where private good the public rises o'er,
To serve our fellows thus far, and no more.
Thus, I engage most truly in your plan,
At once to serve myself, and fellow man:
To gather honors in this untried field,
And serve the public for the fruits they yield.
From private gain all public efforts flow,
And balance the account with quid pro quo.
Who takes the highest station, in the throng,
Intends nor private nor a public wrong.
Where profit leads, where fortune points the way,
He's undeserving who affects delay.
Successful treason forms a patriot's pride;
Defeat suspends him at a felon's side.
The noble daring of a Phaeton
Has highest praises of ambition won.

His fiery coursers spurned his feeble rein,
And dashed him downward to the earth again.
Thus, crowns and halts wait on human pride,
With death and glory at ambition's side.
'Tis proper pride, if pride be e'er allowed,
To rule the multitude—to lead the crowd.
The love of pow'r pervades all human kind;
The noblest empire is to rule the mind.
'Tis this alone secures man's highest art:
The master-passion of the human heart.
Man tames the lion; he his wily prey;
They, in their turn, the forest-master play:
On plain, on mountain, river or in sea,
The love of pow'r is nature's first decree.
With this, bold spirits form enlightened rules,
And break the charms of superstition's schools.
Who caused the age of reason to advance?
The bold enthusiasts of enlightened France.
Scoffed at old rules, at modest customs laughed?
A Fanny Wright, or Mary Wolstonecraft.
Breaks each strong link in grave religion's chain?
The patriot Giddings, or the famed Tom Paine.
With such examples, and so much to gain,
Who may not hope high station to obtain?
Should fortune frown, we'll tell, when hope is past,
We tried it boldly, though we failed at last."

1 The terrible punishment of Salmoneus is daily exemplified in the ruin of those who, without requisite virtues or integrity, aspire to the place of higher powers, and are thrown back, in disgrace, into their original obscurity.

2 It was good policy to make the most of him, while he bore "his blushing honors thick upon him," and before they withered at the touch of the free votes of his fellow townsmen.

3 The political sunsets of ambitious, unprincipled men must have been so unfrequent as to make them graceful. Trimmers are held in bad estimation even here.

4 It has been stated, on good authority, that a full-length portrait of Washington hung very near the chair of the presiding officer.

The editor of the Star again and again calls the attention of his readers to the writings of his "reverend correspondent," addressed to the Christian Masons who composed the late meeting at St. Johnsbury. He says these writings "ought to be printed in a pamphlet form," and hopes subscribers to the Star "will be careful to preserve the papers containing them, that they may be handed down to posterity."

I have never read one of the numbers. For ought I know there may be some good things contained in them, or there may not. Be that as it may, there are reasons perfectly satisfactory to myself at least why the "writings" of this "reverend correspondent" deserve not the notice of those who regard the peace of the churches.

If common report be at all correct—if the style of writing be any index, this "reverend correspondent" is the same impious writer, who in the early state of the excitement exhorted the churches and congregations whose ministers were masons, to "treat such ministers as heathen men and publicans"—the same officious meddler who a few months since so severely reprimanded the churches of Caledonia county because they did not excommunicate their masonic members—a superannuated clergyman of a neighboring State, whose time and talents and every effort have been incessantly devoted to the unnatural work of "sowing discord among brethren"—whose sole and often avowed object is to procure such members to be excommunicated from the churches as refuse to submit to the dictation of those who have denounced Freemasonry. This is the man whom the editor of the Star would immortalize; while he sneeringly speaks of the "sinking reputation of the clergy, for taking, most of them, neutral ground."

I would not, without a sufficient warrant, speak irreverently of the "reverend correspondent," who he informs his readers, is no other than "JOHN BAPTIST." But, listening to the exhortation of an apostle, (Rom. xvi. 17, 18,) I cannot—dare not follow this modern Diotrepes through his long and labored essays to divide and distract the churches.—St. Johnsbury Friend.

FESTIVAL OF ST. JOHN.

From the Southbridge Register.
MASONIC FESTIVAL.

The anniversary of the nativity of St. John the Baptist, was celebrated at Dudley, on the 24th ult. under circumstances peculiarly interesting to the Fraternity. The exercises of the occasion were under the direction of the Central Lodge, aided by a great number of Masons present from the Lodges in the vicinity. There were also present a large concourse of spectators, apparently willing to testify their respect for an ancient and much abused Institution, which has for its object to make men more charitable, generous and humane. The exercises at the Meeting house were a prayer by the Rev. Mr. Goodwin, of the Episcopal Church, East Sutton, and an excellent address by the Rev. Mr. Colton, of Monson Academy. It is announced with great pleasure that it will be published.

After the exercises at the Meeting house, a large company of Gentlemen and Ladies consisting of about three hundred, sat down to a dinner served up in a beautiful bower by Wm. Winsor, Esq. Col. Alexander De Witt, presided at the table, and after the cloth had been removed, the following sentiments were announced.

1st. The day we celebrate—May it admonish us to cultivate peace and good will towards men—a maxim so forcibly taught and exemplified by him in honor of whom we commemorate this day.

2d. The Masonic Institution—Like a well Keyed Arch, it gathers strength and compactness, from the intensity of pressure which surrounds it.

3d. Freemasonry and Religion—Both well calculated to render all who live agreeably to the precepts they enjoin, better, happier, and more useful to their fellow men.

4th. Freemasonry—By its aid, science survived the grand wreck of intellect during the dark ages. May its guardianship never be withdrawn.

5th. Our Country—May its altars never be polluted by a practical illustration of a leading Antimasonic principle—"pardon, and future affluence to State convicts, on condition that they commit perjury."

6th. Ancient Masonry—Though frequently assailed by the storms of envy and prejudice—like the Oak it increases strength with age.

7th. Freemasons—May they come forth from the present Antimasonic excitement, like the three who withstood the fiery furnace—without even a bad smell on their garments.

8th. Unity and Discord—May they never meet, until the latter becomes a proselyte to the former.

9th. The Memories of Washington and Warren—Foremost alike in repelling the foes of their Country, and in cultivating the Masonic arts of peace.

10. Seceders—Ephraim is joined to his Idols, let him alone.

11th. Antimasonry—Like the car of juggernaut, it destroys its own votaries.

12th. Our Masonic Brethren throughout the world—Whilst they practice upon the principles of our order, they shall enjoy the highest meed which Earth bestows on virtuous actions—"a self approving conscience."

13th. The Ladies who adorn and honor our festival—May Masons appreciate their worth and deserve their approbation.

A great number of volunteer sentiments were given on the occasion, evincing the good sense and good feelings of the company.

The festival of St. John the Baptist, was celebrated at Randolph Vt. on the 24 ult. by the members of the masonic fraternity in that vicinity. The exercises consisted of a sermon by the REV. JOEL CLAPP: an address by the HON. D. AZRO A. BUCK, with appropriate music. The Chelsea Advocate says the concourse attending this celebration was the most numerous and respectable which has ever been witnessed in this section of country.

on a similar occasion. Near three hundred masons formed in procession, graced and honored by a long and fair train of ladies. On this occasion was assembled men of all stations and employments, and varying in political as in religious sentiment, laying aside, for the time, differences of opinion; dismissing the petty animosities of the day, and harmonizing in friendship and good will. Here were seen the hoary headed patriot of the revolution, whose sufferings and blood contributed to the establishment of the liberties and happiness of his country, statesmen and legislators who have labored for the preservation and perpetuity of our free institutions; learned and pious clergymen and independent, intelligent and respectable men of all classes and pursuits, bearing united testimony of the purity of masonic principles and their belief in the inoffensive character of the masonic institution.

Notwithstanding the tide of persecution against this society, the malevolent efforts of its enemies, stimulated by ambition in arousing prejudices and hostility against its members, and the now attempted proscription of masons, the public mind will awake to a sense of justice, and men, now deluded and deceived by political demagogues and ambitious aspirants for power, will discover with returning reason, and on calm reflection, the unmerited abuse and injustice which has been heaped upon the masonic institution and its members.

TOASTS, drank at the public dinner, given at the Roger Williams Hotel, Providence, R. I. at the celebration of the Festival of St. John the Baptist.

By the G. M. Barney Merry—Freemasonry—It will survive Antimasonry, and Antimasons, for its principles teach us to do as we would be done by, and to love our neighbor as ourselves.

By the Rev. Br. Edes—The Memory of Washington—May the opposers of masonry remember, that neither politics, ambition, or interest, caused him to secede—but that he lived and died a firm Mason.

By the Rev. Dr. Crocker—Freemasonry no conspiracy.

By the Rev. Br. Taft—The memory of the man, who, when living, was the friend of God and man. The memory of Stephen Gano.

By the Rev. Br. Pickering—Antimasons—For the most part the honest dupes of seceders. May the spread of light effect their speedy return to good principles.

By the Rev. Br. Frieze—Freemasonry—Its air is fatal to bigotry and hypocrisy. 'They went out from us, because they were not of us.'

By Past W. G. M. Peter Grinnell.—The day we celebrate—May it produce much good feeling and lasting friendship among the members of the Institution.

By Mr. Moses Richardson.—The memory of one who was first among Masons, the friend of virtue and science—Thomas Smith Webb.

By a Brother—The gripe of a brother—Like the touch of a torpedo, may it always electrify—never numb.

By Brother S. M. Fowler, Editor of the Pawtucket Chronicle. Let us drink to the memory of those, who, in years gone by, joined hands with us in the celebration of this day. 'Our brethren,' I cried, 'where are they?' and echo answered 'where?'

By W. M. William C. Barker.—The Antimasonic builders in Rhode Island—With pure anti-consistency, they commenced their fabric, as they would turn the houses of others, bottom side up—for the first thing they did was to send for a Thatcher.

By Brother John B. Newton—

We have a mark, brothers—mind this and too well:

And be not unfaithful, like our brother Joel;

But rather the fire of Freemasonry fan,

For Judas, himself, was much like this Mann.

By Br. Moses Richardson—Gen. Lafayette.—The Patriot who received degrees of Knighthood in the City of New York, and forty years after introduced his son and his private Secretary to the same Encampment.—Can Lafayette in justice be placed among those who wish to destroy the liberties of this country?

By W. P. M. Joseph S. Cook.—Our Institution—its foundation is too firm to be shaken by the assaults of its enemies.

Freemasonry—The legitimate offspring of science and virtue; opposed to Antimasonry, the child of vice and ignorance.

The anniversary of St. John the Baptist was celebrated in Danube, N. Y. by the members of Mohawk Lodge and Chapter, and visiting Brethren and Companions from the adjacent towns, to the number of nearly one hundred and fifty; attended by an extensive collection of spectators, who chiefly joined in the procession, which moved to the Indian Castle Church soon after 12 o'clock; Companion Holmes presiding as High Priest, and Comps. Baum and Christy acting as Marshalls of the day. The Little Falls Band conducted by Capt. Case, performed well on the occasion, and added life and cheerfulness to the calm serenity of the day.

The Rev. Comp. Hangen failing to attend according to engagement, and several other clergymen being present, the Rev. I. S. Ketcham officiated at the Church, and delivered a hastily prepared but animating and sound address; the remaining ceremonies consisted of the reading of a Psalm, Prayer, the singing of Masonic Odes, Benediction, and the performance of Instrumental Music; the procession then returned to the house of Comp. Lawyer, where the Fraternity and their friends partook of a comfortable collation.

The passing of a vote of thanks to the speaker of the day, (with the request of a copy of his address for publication,) and the singing of the Mason's Farewell, closed the ceremonies—which throughout were conducted with the greatest order, harmony, and social feeling—and the assemblage dispersed to their homes at an early hour.

At the close of the religious exercises, an appropriate Hymn (selected from the Boston Mirror,) was performed with pleasing effect by the Choir.—Peoples Friend.

THE ANDERTON STORY.—The circulation given to the History of the Belfast murder, as narrated by Samuel G. Anderton, the assiduity displayed by the Poston investigating committee in obtaining corroborating testimony, and the triumphant shout on the occasion of its publication, uttered by the votaries of Antimasonry, have given to this fable an importance equal to that of any political fabrication of modern times, not even excepting 'the good enough Morgan.' We have been waiting to see the whole developed, not doubting but that so monstrous and absurd a falsehood must be soon exposed. We have not been disappointed. The affidavit of Mrs. Bell, which we now publish speaks volumes and cannot be read without shuddering at the reckless depravity evinced by those who have gotten up this tale of murder, who trifle with the solemnities of an oath and who seem determined to use any means, however wicked, to attain their ends. Since this statement of Mrs. Pell has appeared, the Poston Masonic Mirror in reference to the subject says "in due time we will prove, that Anderton remained in prison until regularly exchanged and sent home—he did not make his escape from prison as he swears." And after all this shall be done, we venture to assure the Mirror that the men who framed the Anderton statement will still be found high in the ranks of antimasonry, (so long as antimasonry exists) and loudly demanding "more light" or conjuring up another murdered victim, "whiskers and all."

Masonry is political, says the Antimasons and therefore it must be put down. Now what is Antimasonry? If that is not political, why do they have their county and State Convention, and make nominations for town, county, and State officers? The sin they charge upon masonry lies in great bulk at their own door.—Erie Observer.

MISCELLANY.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT. We find the following extract from an essay on this subject signed Howard.

In the year 1803 the yellow fever raged in New York with relentless fury. Every where the citizens fled from the destructive pestilence; the rich resorted to the seats of fashion and pleasure, the poor sought refuge in those shelters provided in the suburbs of the city by the benevolence of our active corporation. Humanity exerted herself in favor of every class of the community—except the debtors.

Among the prisoners who endured the indescribable horrors of this season, there was one named Smith. His wife and two daughters kept a boarding house in Water street. They were too rich to be included in the class that was provided for by the corporation, and too poor to support the expenses of an exile in the country. They were however, preparing to tax the friendship and charity of some of their neighbors for a little loan of money to enable them to move with their boarders to Greenwich, when Mr. Smith was arrested for a small debt and thrown into prison.

This misfortune disconcerted their plan; the neighbors fled—and to increase the miseries of Mrs. Smith, the boarders who had hitherto contributed to her support fled also, and shortly after herself and daughter fell victims to the prevailing epidemic.

And, will you believe it! no entreaty, no bribe within the father's power, could prevail on any one to go to his house to bring him information of the state of his family.

The first and last information this unfortunate father ever received from his family was in the newspaper—they were buried in Potter's Field.

"Man's inhumanity to man,
Makes countless thousands mourn."

The father starved awhile in Jail, till at length goaded by his sufferings, he forged a check on the Manhattan bank—was transferred to Bridewell, and from thence, after trial and conviction, was condemned to the state prison for seven years.—Soured by misfortune and rendered misanthropic by unremitted suffering, he exulted in his crime, and often was heard to advise people rather to be a criminal than a debtor in this country, for that society here furnished the criminal with the conveniences of life, while the debtor was suffered to starve. He at length died the enemy of society, cursing man! And this is one among the millions of instances in which slavery for debt has destroyed families, and ruined the morals of man who under a rational government might have been the defender of liberty, and a disciple of religion.

THE MOTHER WITH HER INFANT. No school system can provide for the two or three first years of childhood. The first physical and mental education must be given by the mother. For at least 1000 days, she has the care, by the aid of the father, of securing the blessing of a sound mind in a sound body. It behoves her to give what the body and the mind need. No physician can preside over the twenty-four hours of every day, to secure the health; no matron and school-master, if they had the mother's tenderness, and the skill which she is peculiarly fitted to acquire, can be in waiting constantly even on the rich, much less upon those who are in the common walks of life. But the mother is in waiting by divine appointment, with a mother's tenderness; and within herself must seek to have more than the physician's skill in the care of the body, and more than the teacher's skill in the development of the mind. She must know how to give the benefit of air and water, how to regulate the food, to direct exercise, to check the early symptoms of disease; when to administer medicine, and when to apply for skill superior to her own. She must know how to awaken her infant observation, to encourage and direct infant reflection, how to set in order and put in motion all the mental and moral powers; so that if the child must, at three years old, be given up to the professional teacher, he may be committed to his care with a sound mind in a sound body. Who will measure the mental improvement and furniture, which a mother needs, as she nurses and instructs over her infant children? Who will tell us of a mental faculty of her own which she may leave uncultivated, or of a subject of science which she may heedlessly leave unknown? Who will point out the place in the track of science and philosophy, where she may heedlessly stop? But when infancy closes, and school-going childhood commences, or school-going infancy, the care of teachers is afforded only a part of the time. Not half of a child's waking hours are spent at school. It is well for children of three or four years old that they are imprisoned only six hours a day. Even on the infant school system, which give them a workshop and play-room, and an apt teacher, still they are absent from their parents but a few hours of the day,—from the proper academy of children; their home. There the mother, aided by her natural helper, has the opportunity to pursue the care which she commenced in infancy; and still to guide and instruct their growing minds. The six hours of the school are no substitute for the care required during ten waking hours at home. The care at home should be such as will transmit the growing plants, to be tended and watered with a mother's care at school; while the care at school should be such as shall return them unhurt and thriving, to be again trained and watered at home by a mother's care. In the progress of a school education, from three or four years old to sixteen; the greater portion of the day must be spent with one or both the parents; of whom it is demanded that they should be able to aid the teacher's efforts, and to carry forward their children into all the paths of useful knowledge; to follow, in regard to their moral and intellectual powers, the directions of the scriptures; teaching when they are sitting in the house, and when they are walking by the way; when they are lying down; and when they are rising up.

BOSTON COMMON.—Perhaps there is not, in our United States, a spot of ground more pleasing to the eye, from its location and surrounding scenery, than Boston Common. On the East, it has an extensive gravel walk inclosed, and on each side of this walk tower the aged and stately elms, which have defied the blasts of a hundred winters, with smaller trees, rising in their green of early youth. On the North, is the noble Church of Park-street, presenting the speaking monitor of the flight of time, and the lofty spire pointing to the broad and azure heavens. In contact with this Church is a range of elegant Mansion houses, forming a block of superior beauty and splendor.—

On the North-west, and on a rising ground of high elevation, stands the magnificent State House, before which is spread a spacious yard, now covered with nature's richest carpet of living green; descending in a westerly direction from this ornamental public building, is a long and wide street, decorated with as splendid dwelling houses as can be found, perhaps, in any of our cities. On the West, is a broad sheet of saline water, rising and falling with the tides of ocean;—and beyond, a landscape of villages and of fruitful country, interspersed with steeples rising from temples where the instructions of the Sabbath are regularly given, and from which the prayers of Zion ascend with her hymns of praise. On the South and East, is a view of well built and thickset houses, where reside a contented and thronged population. And on the South, at the base of the Common, as if to remind us of "the end of all men," is the inclosure for the reception of the dead. Here rest the ashes of numerous beloved relatives of the living, in solemn silence, to be awakened no more, till the last trumpet shall rend the tomb.

EDUCATION IN AMERICA.—It is the universal attention paid to education, and in the number of academical foundations, the Americans exhibit a public spirit with which we are proud to claim kindred. The great body of the people are, as regards the rudiments of knowledge, far in advance of the English. All can read and write; and to give his children an education, is the first concern of every parent. The oldest college in the United States, is Harvard College, at Cambridge, in Massachusetts, founded in 1638, only eighteen years after the first settlement at Plymouth. Yale College was founded in 1700. Besides these, there are in the Union, about fifty Colleges authorized to confer degrees. The number of benevolent and religious institutions in America supported by voluntary contributions, is almost incalculable. Their Bible Societies, Missionary Societies, Prison Discipline Societies, Penitentiaries, Asylums, &c. are the noble results and evidences of a public spirit, an enlightened philanthropy, and a religious zeal, which certainly can find a parallel only in the parent country.

WHISKEY vs. NEWSPAPERS.—"Well Mr. Printer," said a subscriber, reeling towards us, something after the manner of a vessel with a head wind, first upon one track and then another, until he finally brought to all standing, "I want to stop my paper, its plaguy hard times, and I can't afford to take your paper no longer," at the same time biting off a huge quid of tobacco, and observing, "two dollars a year counts up pretty fast."—"Pray, friend," we replied, "how much whiskey do you use in a week?" "I suppose," said he, "a gallon." "And how much tobacco?" "Not much more than half a pound," he answered. "Well, then, there is nearly thirty dollars a year for that which is worse than useless; it destroys your health, brings discord and unhappiness in your family, and renders you a slave to the worst of vices—and still you can afford to drink whiskey, and do not count the cost." He stared, rolled his quid from one cheek to the other, and was off.

The Mechanical effects of Electricity are exhibited in its power of impelling and dispersing light bodies; of perforating, expanding, compressing, tearing, and breaking to pieces, all conducting substances through which it is sufficiently powerful to force its passage.

If a light wheel, having its vanes made of card paper, be made to turn freely upon a centre, it will be put in motion when it is presented to an electrified point. The wheel will always move from the electrified point, whether its electricity is positive or negative. In this experiment the current seems to be produced by the recession of the similarly electrified air in contact with the point, and therefore the circumstance of the wheel turning in the same direction when the electricity is negative, cannot, as Mr. Singer has remarked, be considered as any proof of the existence of a double current of the electric fluid. As an illustration take the following experiment:—

Place upon an insulating stem a light wheel of card paper, properly suspended upon pivots, as represented in our plate; and introduce it between the pointed wires (AB) of the universal discharger, placed exactly opposite to each other, and at the distance of little more than an inch from the upper vanes. Then having connected the wire A with the positive conductor, and the wire B with the negative conductor, of an electrical machine, the little wheel will revolve in the direction AB; and if the wire B is connected with the positive end, and A with the negative end, the motion of the wheel will be from B to A. The transmission of a small charge through the wires, by an insulated jar, will produce the same effect.

The preceding experiment, imagined by Mr. Singer, is considered by him as a proof that there is only one electric fluid, and that it passes from the positive to the negative wire; for, if there were two electric fluids he concludes "that the wheel being equally acted upon by each, will obey neither, and remain stationary."

EFFECTS OF LIGHTNING. Persons apparently dead from lightning have been recovered by repeatedly throwing cold water over the whole body. Many instances are recorded. The Rev. Mr. Steel, of Paris, in the State of New York, has lately in the newspapers mentioned a case of this kind. A lady was with her husband in the house, and the latter was struck with lightning. The lady happily recollected having a few days before read in the newspapers of the efficacy of cold water, and had the presence of mind to make a trial of it; on the effusion of the first bucketful he began to move, and on the repetition of a few more, was restored to sense and health. If during the recovery the pulse is slow and extremities cold, bleed largely at the arm. A Gentleman now living in Johnson county, (R. Gully, Esq.) was a few years ago struck down by lightning, and recovered by exposure to a heavy fall of rain.

The above floating paragraph we copy because we understand that a circumstance recently occurred in this town, which favors the theory therein stated. Mrs. Cannon, whom we mentioned in our last as having been struck down with lightning, owes her life to the providential circumstance of a bucket of water having been thrown upon her by a little boy in the fright and the delirium of the moment, who appears not to have known what he did, or why he did thus. Indeed, for some days he was afraid to tell that he did throw water upon the insensible patient. An instance is also mentioned of a gentleman at the West being struck down with lightning, and with so great force that the electric fluid, on entering his body "tore his coat, vest and shirt into shreds, burnt the hair from one side of his head, crossed his breast, passed down the extremities, and out through his shoes, perforating them with holes as though buck shot had been forced through them; in some places breaking the skin, and scorching it in its whole course, so as to give it the appearance of an extensive burn." And yet it is said this individual is in a fair way for getting well, in consequence of plentiful effusions of cold water upon the breast and head, and copious bleeding. Remedies of this nature should be known and treasured up in the mind by every one.—New Bedford Times.

PHILOSOPHICAL EXPERIMENT. Fresh water may be extracted from salt water by the following simple process; a common hogshead is provided with a false bottom, about three or four inches above the lower head. This false bottom is perforated with a number of holes, and over them a filter of flannel. The barrel is then nearly filled with the finest sand, beat down very hard; a tube, communicating with the space between the two bottoms, is extended to a convenient height above the top of the barrel. The sea water is poured into this tube, and pressing every way, according to its altitudes, it endeavors to force its way through the sand to the top of the barrel, from whence, by this mode of filtration, it is drawn off fresh, and fit for use. Any other filter will do as well as flannel, which will stop the sand, and admit the water. The saline particles being heavier, and perhaps differently formed, meet with obstructions from the sand, and are left behind.

GURNEY'S STEAM-CARRIAGE. We find from a letter of Mr. Herapath in the London Times, dated March, that Mr. Gurney was then in Wales, engaged in making some experiments with his Carriage on a railway in that quarter. Preparations are making to start some of these long expected carriages in the neighborhood of London as soon as he returns. Mr. Herapath is the author of a pamphlet which was noticed a few months since, addressed to the Duke of Wellington, giving a mathematical development of the theory of this steam-carriage. He has lately been engaged in a correspondence respecting its application to common roads.

Generally, he says, whatever roads are good for stage-coaches, are equally good for steam-carriages; but hard level roads are of the first importance. A steamer would take double the load, or the same load double the distance, in the same time, on a level, that it would up a hill of 1 foot rise in 12, and so on, in a rising proportion. In all new roads, therefore, a little increase of distance is better than ascending hills though steam carriages are quite capable of ascending any of the hills or roads. As they hardly wear the road at all, an increase of distance does not involve much repair, as in the case of common roads. A steamer he thinks, might be constructed to run fifty miles an hour, or more, on a common road. He travelled with Gurney, over a large gravelly soil, at an average rate of seventeen miles, and, where there was no interruption, between twenty and thirty; the carriage is more easily stopped and turned, and can be more accurately driven, than any stage-coach. An increase of 17 or 20 per cent. in fuel gives 100 per cent. increase in the velocity.

ACOUSTICS.—This science treats of the nature, the phenomena, and the laws of sound, and the theory of musical concord and harmony. From the experiments which have been made on this subject, we learn, that air is essential to the production of sound; that it arises from vibrations in the air, communicated to it by vibrations of the sounding body; that the vibrations, or aerial pulses, are propagated all around in a spherical undulatory manner; that their density decreases as the squares of the distances from the sounding body increase, &c. Air.—"it is the medium of sounds by means of which knowledge is conveyed to our minds. Its undulations, like so many couriers, run forever backwards and forwards, to convey our thoughts to others, and theirs to us."—Prof. Dick. This principle in philosophy is believed by all who profess any knowledge of the nature and properties of the atmosphere. All lectures upon the subject hold forth the same ideas, and exemplify the truth of the principle, by a variety of experiments with the air pump, &c.—Even the "simple worshippers of nature,"—who condemn as "priestcraft," and ridicule as delusion, the faith of those who believe that events have taken place, and will again take place, out of the ordinary course of nature,—profess most religiously to believe in this doctrine, and their lofty minds will never permit them to believe any thing which is in the least degree contrary thereto—nor even the science of ventriloquism, which is a direct and palpable violation of the laws of nature, as above laid down. It is in vain to deny the fact that the class of jugglers denominated ventriloquists, do, in a very mysterious manner, convey sound from themselves to a comparatively distant object, causing the "vibrations of the air" first to commence with the latter; which is as completely at war with the common and acknowledged laws of nature, as was the "possession of the man among the tombs with a legion of devils." Will not some modern philosopher give us his views or explanation, of this singular phenomenon? We have an opinion upon the subject, but as it might be deemed "a superstition," we refrain from publishing it, until some enemy of "priestcraft" shall attempt to explain away the seeming incongruity in the case.—New Bedford Times.

MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JULY 10, 1830.

JOHN C. SPENCER.

While commenting upon the proceedings of the agents of the government of New York, acting under most extraordinary commissions, for the discovery and conviction of culprits, who have so far disregarded the sacred duties of citizens and contemned salutary laws, as to deprive a fellow freeman of his personal liberty and, as supposed and believed by some, even robbed him of life; we beg of our readers to believe us, when we say that, the whole list of crimes enumerated in the criminal code, whether against liberty or life, are as much abhorred by ourselves, as by the most zealous and infuriated of the antimasons, and no persons would, in their right senses, go farther than ourselves in effecting a discovery and merited punishment of the abductors of Morgan, and of his murderers, if he were murdered. At the same time, let it be understood that "we would not do evil that good may come."—Let the laws be administered, in justice and without partiality, upon all the guilty; but let not the innocent be made to suffer, for the only cause that the guilty cannot be discovered. Let every thing be done decently and in order, conformably with usages and agreeably to the established laws of the land. A minister of justice, who lets his zeal control his understanding, and his passions warp the wise and salutary provisions of the laws, is an unworthy minister; and in a free country, whose boast is a government of laws and not of men, ought not for a moment to be tolerated. With such sentiments in the minds of our readers, and carried with them through the whole of our investigations, we respectfully introduce to their consideration, the citizen named at the head of this article.

John C. Spencer, the noted ex-special counsel, appointed in New York, for the avowed purpose of prosecuting, we will not say persecuting, masons; in the exercise of his ample official functions, is become justly notorious in many particulars. We will enumerate some of them. Firstly, by intemperate zeal and heat in the pursuit of game, first started by a bloodthirsty pack of antimasonic pioneers and coadjutors, who cannot be satisfied with less than the entire immolation of masons and the destruction of Masonry, right or wrong. The greyhound follows the scent of the hounds too closely and inconsiderately, not reflecting that the latter are often at fault.—Secondly, by his quarrel with the Governor of his own State; a quarrel disgraceful only to himself; since the Governor, indignant at his proposal and shocked at his depravity, promptly and patriotically, refused him the indulgence of BRIBING WITNESSES, even to swear against masons, whom it would seem are a sort of outlawed crew, wholly unworthy of the protection of the laws; and he would therefore, forsooth have them all tried, convicted and executed, on the evidence of BRIBED WITNESSES. Thirdly, but not lastly; by permitting the grand jury of Genesee county, N. Y. to find bills of indictment against masons, by a vote of a majority of the jurors, and without the concurrence of the necessary number twelve, contrary to the laws of the land; and that too, when it was the enjoined and appropriate duty of the said counsellor to advise and direct the jury in all matters of law, and more especially in that, the most important matter of all; for it concerned their very authority in the cases. Thus many persons have been indicted, unjustly, oppressively and without cause, who would otherwise have been forthwith discharged. Fourthly, the same Spencer is become yet more notorious, by his oppression; among other things, in forcing the persons, whom he knew to be thus illegally indicted, from the benefit of a discharge on motion to the court, refusing to permit a hearing of the motions, and compelling the accused to recognize for appearance in another court; where we suppose, had not the said Spencer been discharged from his further oppression, the same farces were to be acted over again. We call them farces, because we suppose they were sport to Mr. Spencer; although they were far otherwise to the unfortunate citizens, illegally deprived of their liberties. Fie!

Fie!! Mr. Spencer; you should have left the innocent alone, and attempted only to hang the guilty. We presume your successor will act more discreetly.

Upon the subject of the doings of this special counsel, in addition to what we have before published in the Mirror, we make some extracts from the "Peoples Press," published in Batavia, N. Y. and refer to affidavits of jurors, there published, in proof of what we have stated.

"At the June general sessions of the peace for Genesee county, in the year 1829, Mr. Spencer presented himself before the grand jury which had been summoned for that court, with the view of finding indictments against several persons for having been concerned in the abduction of Wm. Morgan. Witnesses, to the number of fifty or an hundred attended on subpoena, and after three or four days investigation, a bill of indictment was found against four individuals. The persons indicted were recognized to appear at the next Oyer and Terminer—and although it was a matter of surprise that a bill of indictment should have been found after so many investigations had been made, and after the acts and character of almost every mason in this vicinity had been the subject of rigid scrutiny, yet at the time, it was supposed that the indictment had at least, been found according to the forms of law, whether upon sufficient proof or not. A little time, however, disclosed the fact, that the Special Counsel had made an unpardonable mistake, and that the indictment had only been found by eight or nine of the grand jurors, and that the rest of that body had voted against the finding of the bill.

The parties interested, soon after the presentment, proceeded to make enquiries relative to the proof upon which the bill had been found, and as to the means employed to find it; when they soon discovered—to say nothing of the proof—that the finding of the jury was a mere farce, so far as related to the legal effect. Affidavits of eight of the sixteen jurors were obtained, setting forth that the bill of indictment was found by less than twelve of their number, and none of them estimated the number by which it was found at more than nine or ten—and many of them stated in those affidavits, that they did not know, and were not informed, but that a bill found by a majority, although that majority should be less than twelve, would be a good finding in law. The law under which the Special Counsel received his appointment, gave to him very extended, if not inquisitorial powers—and so far as he practised under it, no one has ever, to our knowledge, charged him with having failed to exercise all the power which it in fact conferred. In the instance now under consideration we are safely advised, that he was present with the grand jury during the whole time of the investigation of the testimony, and that he took upon himself the burthen of questioning all the witnesses—and we have been informed that he summed up the testimony to the jury;—but as respects this last matter, we will not be responsible, nor do we mean to make the charge. He possessed every means of knowing all the proceedings of the grand jury, and it seems difficult to separate from him the knowledge that the bill was found by a less number than twelve of the jurors.

Immediately upon the opening of the court, the motion to quash the indictment was made by the counsel for the defendants—but scarcely had the subject been mentioned, when the Special Counsel objected to the further hearing of the motion, avowing that he had removed the indictment into the Supreme Court, by certiorari, and interrupted the progress of the defendants' counsel, by requesting the court to receive the certiorari, which he said would supercede the motion. The defendants' counsel however, contended that it was his right, inasmuch as he had opened the motion to proceed with it—and if the right did not exist, that it was still in the discretion of the court to receive the certiorari or not—that in this case, the court ought not to receive it, on account of the hardship it would impose upon the defendants, in subjecting them to the necessity of appearing in the Supreme court, and of being trained through a new suit, without any assignable cause, and merely to gratify the will of the Special Counsel, when there was no legal indictment for them to answer. Thus the indictment became removed into the Supreme Court, and the defendants were recognized to appear before the court at the May term in New York.

In order that the principles of the antimasonic party may be more generally known, we extract the following paragraph from the Sudbury (Pa.) Beacon, of the 3d ult. addressed to the antimasonic electors.

"Stand ready, armed and caparisoned, and if necessary, even for mortal combat. Three alternatives are placed before you—Bow submission to the yoke of despotism—CIVIL WAR AND BLOODSHED—or beat them at the polls. Which is the best and most consistent in our peaceful and happy country, we leave you to determine."

Has any party, which has ever existed in the United States, before the antimasonic party, publicly threatened a "civil war," if they did not succeed in their designs at the polls? The public will certainly be very much obliged to the Beacon, for putting forth the cloven foot. It is fortunate for the country that the principles of the antimasonic party are so plainly developing themselves. The people will thus be enabled to crush the growing hydra in its infancy.

The St. Johnsbury Herald in speaking of the Vermont antimasonic State Convention, held at Montpelier, on the 23d ult. for the purpose of nominating State officers, says, "we have only to observe that we should think that several of the gentlemen put in nomination, would not be very grateful for the honor done them; especially when they see the names of some others who are presented as candidates for office by the same convention."

A correspondent of the American Traveller, under date of June 26, 1830, communicates the following:—

"The Special Circuit Court which has been sitting here for three weeks, Judge Marcy, presiding, has this day adjourned. Three of the Morgan indictments have been tried, to wit:—Col. Ezekiel Jewett, Solomon C. Wright and Jeremiah Brown, all of whom are acquitted. There were many other indictments pending, but owing to the disappearance of Edward Giddings, who could not be found, the Special Counsel did not choose to bring them on.

Thus probably ends the Morgan affair, so far as relates to judicial proceedings,—but when the excitement will end we cannot tell. The political antimasons are very much outraged at the result of these trials.

The Easton, Pa. Argus, a violent antimasonic newspaper has recently closed its eyes in death. The editor in his valadictory seems to intimate that he has not quite so favorable an opinion of the principles of antimasonry as he had when he commenced the Argus.

We copy the following from the Boston Commentator of Saturday last:—"A RETURN CARD.—A. B.—C. D. &c. &c. having received Cards of Invitation, respectfully present their compliments to JACOB HALL, Chairman of the Committee of arrangements; and decline the honor of an engagement with him for Monday next, at Faneuil Hall, 'at 4 o'clock, P. M. precisely.' Various considerations might be mentioned, having some regard to the terms of the invitation and reference to the orator, Pliny Merrick, Esq. But there is, one reason which will be deemed quite sufficient: they have an engagement on that day, 'at 4 o'clock, precisely,' with respectable company."

The SAME OLD SONG, that my grandmother used to sing, to beguile me to sleep, in the days of my childhood, appears in the "FRANKLIN REPOSITORY," published at Chambersburg, Pa. extracted from the "OHIO STATISTICAL JOURNAL," as ORIGINAL POETRY, communicated for the last named paper, by a soi-disant poet, or poetess, who assumes the signature Amanda. Behold what newspapers are made of, and the intolerable impudence of the tribe inspired by the cacathes scribendi. P.

ANTIMASONRY.—The March number of the American Quarterly Review, contains a sensible, temperate, and liberal article on the recent popular excitements in this country, on the subject of Masonry. We are glad that a work standing so high in public estimation, and conducted with so much candor and ability, has devoted its pages to the exposition of a subject, fraught with so many evils, and productive of so much discord in society. From a narrative of the excitement recently published, the reviewer furnishes a very clear and distinct out-line of the rise and progress of the opposition to masonry, and the remarks interspersed furnish one of the most instructive subjects of contemplation we have ever perused.

It is obvious from the sketch impartially given, that the Antimasonic excitement grew out of the ambitious rivalry of two newspapers in the village of Batavia, in New York, and the flame fanned by the inconsiderate conduct of the masons at that place, the state of public feeling taken into consideration at the time, who held a celebration in that village on the same day an antimasonic meeting was called. From this place where it originated from local considerations, it extended itself through the country, and the scene of its early existence has become comparatively quiet from want of materials wherewith to replenish its fury.—Since its origin at Batavia, antimasonry has not confined its operations to the mere fact of expurgating the community of the odious secret dealings of the fraternity, but it has become a rallying point, around which politicians have gathered, until its strength has become commensurate with its illiberal denunciations.

The reviewer, however, laying aside its temporary political connexion, looks upon it in a wider sphere of action, and to its permanent consequences. That the excitement has been prostituted to worthless purposes, we believe but few will deny; that the community are justified in exposing and denouncing what is detrimental to the best interests of the country, and dangerous in its tendency, all will admit; but the reviewer believes the excitement has furnished strong reasons for supposing there are materials for fanaticism and ignorance to carry on the war of proscription and persecution; to poison the spring of liberty at its source; to make the love of justice and detestation of crime, subservient to the purposes of injustice and oppression, and to bring back the people of the United States to the threshold of intolerance.

In the opposition which has been shown to the institution within the last few years, we have seen other motives than the simple exposition of its character; political ambition has been connected with its operation; religious zeal has tortured its character; personal enmity and individual hatred has not been slow in discovering frailties, and errors, and corruption. In investigating the subject, many good and virtuous men have participated from the purest and best of motives, but that, we fear, has not been the incentive from which all have acted. If there are flagrant evils and the institutions of the country are endangered by masonic influence, it deserves unqualified condemnation; if its principles are founded on the basis of religion, good order and the relief of the suffering and oppressed, it ought to be sustained.

INTELLIGENCE.

Mourning.—The Mount Holly Bachelors Club have agreed to wear black crape garters, in consequence of the Secretary of their association having accidentally committed matrimony.

New Bedford is said to be the most thriving, and for its size, the most wealthy place in the Union. It fattens upon the whaling business—fourteen whale ships recently arrived at that Port in as many days, loaded with the rich product of the ocean.

Heirs of Fulton.—A Virginia paper suggests, as a means for relieving the family of Fulton, that all passengers in Steamboats shall pay one cent each to a fund for this purpose—the amount to be deposited, monthly, in the Branch Bank at New York.

A lady in Philadelphia has been laid under bonds of $500 to keep the peace, for having twice attempted with a knife to stab a young gentleman, whose visits to her had been discontinued.

The following toast was given, not long since, at a public dinner at Nansemond, in honor of Mr Tazewell. It is excellent:—"THE UNION—Heaven forbid that any man should be able to calculate its value!"

The wife of a laboring man residing in Cumberland, Pa. was lately delivered of four fine boys, which, with their mother, are doing well. If this had been in Tennessee, each of the children would have been entitled to 200 acres of land.

Monsieur Tonson come again!—The Portland Courier states, that a Sea Serpent was seen in Boothbay Harbor, Me. a week since, by Mr. Chandler, keeper of the Light House, and several others.

At one time he seemed to be at rest, at another, catching fish. Mr. C. thought him about 100 feet long. He came very near a row boat, the crew of which pelted him with potatoes.

A western paper states, that a scion ingrafted in April last, in the orchard of John Bell, 2d. in the town of New Lisbon, Oswego Co. has blown out, and bears four blossoms, and one apple, which sprung from the new growth of wood. This is mentioned as a circumstance never before known.

The Library of Harvard College, it is stated, contains 30,000 bound volumes, besides many thousand tracts; and an annuity of $5000 has been appropriated for its enlargement.

Only nine deaths occurred in this city during the week ending on Saturday last.

Oxford Post Office, Penobscot county, Me. O. Fuller, P. M. is henceforth to be called "Down-East."

The execution of James Porter, one of the mail robbers lately tried and convicted in the Circuit Court of the U. States at Philadelphia, took place on Friday last, at half past 10 o'clock, in presence of a great concourse of spectators. The sentence of Wilson, the other convict has been commuted by the President to imprisonment for twenty years.

Prince Leopold has had a crown assigned to him, and consequently must have a wife, which will accord him two crowns: inasmuch as "a virtuous woman is a crown to her husband." Rumor has allotted to him various spouses. Some say he will wed a sister of the Duc de Chartres; others, that a daughter of the late Duke of Placenza, a young lady with charms to a large amount, and ready cash to the tune of 11,250,000. Prince Leopold has assumed the travelling title of Count Hinnenburg.

Napoleon's mother died in Italy, April 26, aged 83.

POSTSCRIPT.

We stop the press to announce the verdict of the jury in the case of WRIGHT and BROWN. After being out 36 hours, they returned into court with a verdict of NOT GUILTY. The court has adjourned, and it is not probable our readers will ever be troubled to peruse the reports of any more trials growing out of the abduction of Wm. Morgan, and the investigations of the Lewiston Committee.

N. B. The Closing Scene!—We learn that after the jury had rendered their verdict in the above case and were discharged, one of the constables entered a complaint against a citizen, for attempting to smuggle into the juryroom some bread and cheese and a small bottle of liquor, by sewing them in the lining of a cloak. The citizen was sentenced to 10 days confinement in the county jail. A complaint was then entered by one of the jurymen against the constable, charging him with having urged the jury to convict the defendants, and stating to them that he knew it was the opinion of the judge that they were guilty. The constable was ordered to prison, and the District Attorney directed to procure an indictment against him for perjury.

The court adjourned to the 2d Monday in Jan. 1831.

The Newburyport Herald publishes an estimate of the flour and grain imported into that town in the six months ending June 30, viz. 8, 755 bbls. flour, 81, 775 bushels corn, 5, 186 do. rye, of the value of $87, 469.

The Bank Robber found and the Money recovered.

After several day's fruitless search, and when the general belief was that Fuller had escaped by sea, on Monday morning it was unexpectedly announced that he had been found, and the larger part of the money recovered. The circumstances of the discovery were substantially as follows;

Early on Monday morning last, Mr. Joel Smith, who had been placed by a Deputy Sheriff as a keeper in the house of Fuller, called up Mr. S. Frothingham, the Branch Bank Cashier, and announced to him that if he would go to Fuller's house, the delinquent and a large part of the money could there be found. Mr. F. immediately proceeding there, found Fuller with about $39,000 of the Bank bills he had taken. Fuller quietly gave himself up seemingly much overcome by his situation, and was hence conducted to jail.

He stated that he had been at several places in Boston or its vicinity, and had friends who would have done any thing for him. It seems, however, that he found "the way of the transgressor" so hard, that he preferred to encounter the penalties of the law, rather than run the risks of farther attempts at concealment or escape. He will probably take his trial before the U. S. Circuit Court in October next in this city.

After he had absconded, it was discovered that he had embezzled $17,800 in addition to the money he carried off. This sum having been spent by him together with about $2000 deficient in the money recovered the Bank will in the first instance lose. A considerable portion of it, however, may be covered by his bonds.—Pat.

LAKE ERIE is now navigated by nine fine steamboats, and a large number of schooners. What was the trade on this lake before the last war—say 12 or 18 years ago?—What shall it amount to a few years hence, when the great Ohio canal shall be opened, and even the shores of Lake Superior teem with busy freemen? Michilimackinac, (a post so distant that the news even of the declaration of War against Great Britain did not reach the post for about two months,) is now, as it were, close by us—with in 8 or 10 days travel from the Atlantic cities; and the waters of Michigan are united by navigable communications both with St. Lawrence and the Hudson, and soon will be with those of the Ohio.—Colonial Advocate.

THE WREATH.

THE END OF THE PIOUS MAN.

How soft and downy is the dying bed
Of him, who longs to slumber with the dead;
Whose hopes are fixed on heaven!
No cloud of terror darks his eyes,
Or hides from him the heavenly prize,
For which his soul hath striven.

Beloved by all, he meets his happy doom.
Beloved by all, he sinks into the tomb;
And knows no fear of death.
No tongue is near to sting his fame,
To blast his pure and perfect name,
With dire polluted breath.

Upon his modest tomb, which men hold dear,
Sweet friendship, ling'ring, drops a silent tear.
Religion tells his fate.
The Muses strike the lyre of song!
While memory bears his deeds along,
As patterns for the great.

THE BACHELOR'S COMPLAINT.

They're stepping off, the friends I knew,
They're going one by one;
They're taking wives to tame their lives,
Their jovial days are done.
I can't get one old crony now
To join me in a spree;
They've all grown grave, domestic men—
They look askance at me.

I hate to see them sobered down,
The merry boys and true;
I hate to see them sneering now
At pictures fancy drew.
I care not for their married cheer,
Their puddings and their Soups;
And middle-aged relations round
In formidable groups.

And though their wife perchance may have
A comely sort of face,
And at the table's upper end
Conduct herself with grace;
I hate the prim reserve that reigns;
The caution and the shape;
I hate to see my friend grow vain
Of furniture and plate.

O! give me back the days again
When we have wandered free,
And stole the dew from every flower,
The fruit from every tree.
The friends I loved, they will not come,
They've all deserted me,
They sit at home and toast their toes,
Look stupid and sip tea.

By Jove! they go to bed at ten,
And sup at half past nine—
And seldom do they now exceed
A pint or so of wine!
They play at whist for sixpences,
They very rarely dance;
They never read a word of rhyme
Nor open a romance!

They talk, forsooth! of politics,
Of taxes and the crops;
And with their wives they tag about
For patterns at the shops.
They're skilled in butter, cheese and soap,
And learn'd in butcher's meat,
And know exactly what they pay,
And every thing they eat!

And then they all have children too,
To squall through thick and thin,
And seem right proud to multiply
Small images of sin;
And yet, you may depend upon't,
Ere half their days are told,
Their sons are taller than themselves,
And they are counted old.

Alas! alas! for years gone by,
And for the friends I've lost,
When no warm feelings of the heart
Was chilled by earthly frost;
If these be hymen's valued joys,
I'd have him shun my door,
Unless he'll quench his torch and live
Henceforth a BACHELOR!

YOUTH AND AGE.

'Tell me, what's Love?' said Youth, one day,
To drooping Age, who crost his way:
'It is a sunny hour of play,
For which repentance dear doth pay;
Repentance! Repentance!
And this is Love, as wise men say.'

'Tell me, what's love?' said Youth once more,
Fearful, yet fond, of Age's lore.
'Soft as a passing summer's wind,
Would'st know the blight it leaves behind?
Repentance! Repentance!
And this is love,—when love is o'er.'

'Tell me, what's Love?' said Youth again,
Trusting the bliss, but not the pain.
'Sweet as a May tree's scented air,—
Mark ye what bitter fruit 'twill bear,
Repentance! Repentance!
This, this is Love—sweet Youth, beware!

Just then, young Love himself came by,
And cast on Youth a smiling eye;
Who could resist that glance's ray?
In vain did Age his warning say,
'Repentance! Repentance!
Youth laughing went with Love away.

ODE.

SUNG AT THE DUDLEY CELEBRATION, 24 ULT.

Ye are Gods building saith the word,
Raised by Jehovah's hand;
The sacred Temple of the Lord,
And beauty of the land.

As trees from forests ye were brought,
And by divinest skill,
Fit for the heavenly building wrought,
By your Grand Masters will.

As stones uncouth in quarries lie,
So ye in Sins were found,
Sought out by the all Seeing Eye,
And raised from sinful ground.

As living stones in order stand,
When raised by plumb and line,
Ye are a building wisely plann'd,
In order most divine.

Here Wisdom, Strength, and Beauty join,
With harmony and love,
And here, by truths unerring line,
The workmen justly move.

This is the Temple of our God,
From ages past has stood;
This is the path the worthies trod,
The perfect and the good.

When every emblem found on earth,
Of heavenly things shall die;
May God admit our souls above,
To brighter scenes on high.

A LAPLAND WEDDING. It is death in Lapland to marry a maid without her parents' or friends consent, therefore, if one bear affection to a young maid, upon breaking thereof to her friends, the fashion is that a day is appointed for their friends to meet to behold the two young parties run a race together. The maid is allowed in starting the advantage of a third part in the race, so that it is impossible, except she will of herself, that she should be overtaken. If the maid overrun her suitor, the matter is ended; he must never have her, it being penal for the man to renew the offer of marriage. But if the virgin hath affection for him, though at first running hard to try the truth of his love, she will (without Atalanta's golden balls to aid or retard her speed) pretend some casualty, and a voluntary halt, before she cometh to make an end of the race. Thus none are compelled to marry against their own wills; and this is the cause that in this poor country the married people are richer in their own contentment than in other lands, where so many forced matches make feigned love, and cause real unhappiness.

Zeal without knowledge, is like fire without light.

APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE OF VERMONT,

On the subject of the Antimasonic excitement; by the Lodges of Freemasons in the County of Orange, and the Valley of White River.

It is peculiarly unfortunate that so many members of the Baptist communion should be infected with this mania, as they are believed to have been in every instance heretofore the champions of political and religious toleration. And when we see a society who have preserved the christian doctrines pure in the midst of error and persecution; who at one period of their history have watched the glimmering lamp of Christianity in the secluded valleys of Piedmont; and at another have numbered in their ranks a Ward, a Carey, and a Judson, a Foster, a Fuller, and a Ryland; men, who like Lot, might have stood between the Almighty, and his wrath, when we see the members of such a society, enrolling themselves with the antimasonic faction, we are compelled to acknowledge our fears, that every religious denomination, is destined in its turn, to be infected with the spirit of persecution. And the leaders of this faction direct all their energies to the producing of the same state of feeling, that in a former age consigned Cranmer and Latimer to the fires of Smithfield. And what is the foundation on which antimasonry rests? We boldly challenge the inquiry; and we as boldly assert that it will be found to be nothing less or more than the abduction of Morgan. A few unprincipled men performed a wicked act, for which they have been arrested, and tried, and sentenced, and punished. The masonic society have never, in the slightest degree, participated in the transaction; but from first to last have stamped upon it the impression of their most decided reprehension. And yet, on the conduct of these individuals has been built the strangely composite structure of antimasonry. Examine all the other matters that have been alleged; the revelations of Morgan, and the disclosures of the "holy company" of seceders that have followed him, and we shall find nothing to induce us to alter this opinion. Morgan's "illustrations of Masonry," false and foolish as they were, contained nothing calculated to implicate the moral or political character of the society. They rather gave it a character of lightness and unimportance, but not of criminality; and the testimony of those who have since withdrawn has amounted to nothing but matter of opinion and declamation, till it has been masticated and again thrown out to the public through the filthy channel of the antimasonic press. The number of those who have seceded is triumphantly alleged as a proof of the mischievous character of the society. But suffer us to inquire how many members of the Christian church would probably secede, if the doing so opened the fairest road to preferment and power? In times of lukewarmness and neglect of religion, we have reason to fear that the ranks would be fearfully thinned, if there was a prospect of the success of a party who held that all religion was founded in imposition, and its professors unworthy of the public confidence. And perhaps we might reckon as many, even in this country, who have voluntarily separated themselves from the church, as there are of masonic seceders. In the times of the primitive zeal of the protestant church, King James of England declared "that the possibility of getting places and employments would make more Catholics than all the considerations of a religious nature combined."* If further proof of this fact were required, the French revolution is precisely to our purpose. There, the most enlightened people in Europe, under the influence of a popular excitement, renounced their religion in a mass. A people of whom there is no evidence that they were less pious than their neighbors, guillotined their priests; desecrated their temples, abolished the christian sabbath, and the worship of the Most High, and substituted that of a harlot, under the name of the Goddess of Reason! And yet the evidences of the truth of Christianity are not in the slightest degree invalidated; and there are, no doubt, many, who if necessary, would seal their profession with their blood. The number of seceding masons then furnishes no evidence of the evil tendency of Freemasonry.

Nor does the manner in which these successions have been made speak much for the purity of motive by which their authors have been actuated. We have, as yet, heard of none who have turned their backs upon the society, on first becoming acquainted with its character. Would not some one honest and pious man, during the long period in which this society has existed, have flinched when such impious and abominable oaths were tendered to him, as are said to form a part of our ceremony of initiation?—Would they have waited until they had held offices in the society, and delivered eulogiums upon its character? And above all, would they have agreed unanimously to withhold their renunciations till the present period, when there are antimasonic candidates for governor, and judge, and sheriff, and representative; and when the clergyman must either slander and renounce a society which he knows to be pure and laudable in its character, or leave his "velvet cushion" and the fat living connected with it? These questions cannot be answered in any manner that will not lead reflecting men to shudder at the desert of principle so clearly indicated.

Perhaps the free discussion, so essential to the prosperous existence of republican government, will always nourish political parties in our country: and while these are conducted in the ordinary manner of the attack and defence of public men and public measures, no great evil is to be apprehended. But the peculiarly obnoxious feature of this excitement is, that it enters and violates the sanctity of private life; sets fathers against their sons, and sons against their fathers; people against their ministers, and ministers against their people; and thus dries up, to the extent of its power, all the sources of religious and social enjoyment. And in the midst of all this havoc, its authors insultingly tell us, that it is wholly to be attributed to the influence of Freemasonry!!! To the influence of a society that has always existed in our country, and whose prosperity in every country has been coincident with the prosperity of its civil and religious institutions.

Another serious evil, growing out of this mania, is the debasing effect it has wrought upon our periodical literature. The number of well conducted public journals of a political, literary and religious character, circulated in our State, was exerting a most salutary influence on the literary taste and morals of our people; but if there be a class in this community, who can purchase and read the effusions of the antimasonic presses, loathsome as they are both in a literary and moral point of view, they must mutually react upon each other, producing a lower and a lower state of degradation: and if these causes continue to operate, the time may arrive when a vicious and besotted population will govern the destinies of this country.

Fellow citizens of Vermont, we desire you to pause and examine this subject with impartiality for yourselves.—Look your masonic neighbors and friends in the face. Examine the tenor of their past lives, and judge for yourselves, instead of being guided by those who have embarked their all in the enterprise of embittering and inflaming your minds. If suffered to exercise your own unbiassed judgment, you cannot believe that Washington, and Warren, and Franklin, and the other fathers of the revolution, who were zealous members of our society, would have given it their support, if its principles were as nefarious as its enemies pretend; or that the great body of pious and learned clergymen who still retain their connexion with the institution, would do so, if its doctrines were anti-christian in their tendency. Some members of the clerical profession have seceded; and one of that number was sent for from a neighboring State, to take a leading part in a convention held in your State House, who once left New England under circumstances that would have prevented the return of any man whose forehead was not most impenetrably bronzed. Other individuals have seceded, when they found their salaries depended on their doing so; and one, who has acquired considerable celebrity, is known to have deliberated, and to have consulted his friends, as to the probability of antimasonry becoming popular, before he ventured to embark in its cause. Fellow citizens, we beseech you to weigh the characters of those clergymen and others who have renounced masonry, against that of those who remain steadfast to their masonic professions.

You are told that the members of the masonic society are leagued together to help each other into office; and that an over proportion of the offices of the State have been held by masons. Again we desire you to observe for yourselves, and to take no man's word, for that which you may easily ascertain by exercising your own senses. The complaints of the political influence of masonry have probably produced in this State as great effect as any of the means that have been used; and we cheerfully submit the matter to your decision, in the full confidence that you will find all such complaints entirely without foundation. On the contrary, we apprehend that you will perceive a far greater danger to our political institutions from a different quarter. Our State has heretofore been well governed.—Our best men have usually been called to the highest places of trust and distinction. The standard of morals and intelligence amongst our people has been high, and constantly rising. Our schools are sufficiently numerous and generally well conducted; and an enlightened and liberal clergy have been engaged in diffusing the influence of christianity and letters among all classes of our people.—The social machine was acting with great perfection and the masonic society was regarded as an important part of its apparatus. Its funds were liberally applied to every benevolent object, and its members actively employed in promoting the happiness and prosperity of society. Now, fellow citizens, will you believe that this institution, which you have borne in your bosom for nearly a century; which has prospered in your prosperity and suffered in your adversity, and whose interests are identified with those of the general community: will you believe that this society has all the time harbored the design of subverting your government and trampling on our liberties? And this, too, on the authority of a party who have publicly declared that they "approved of the conduct of the despotic Ferdinand of Spain, and the Autocrat of Russia, in banishing freemasons from their dominions." We will not, fellow citizens, admit the degrading belief that such opinions can ever become general among you. We will not believe that the descendants of those men who, with Allen and Warner and Chittenden at their head, repelled the encroachments of British power and the rival claims of two neighboring States, will now submit to be governed by the emissaries of a desperate faction in one of those States.

Fellow citizens, it has been dinned in your ears that our obligations binds us to screen our brethren from justice, to stand by them right or wrong, and to regard the interests of the society as paramount to those of our State and country. These charges we can only meet with a categorical denial. THEY ARE ALL FALSE.

And here again we desire you to weigh the testimony of all masons, who have not seceded, against those who have. Compare their numbers and their characters, and we abide your decision. The testimony of the illustrious dead, who have died in fellowship with us, must likewise be taken into the account. For no man of principle could ever live or die in peace, with obligations on his soul such as are attributed to our order. But there are no such obligations. Nor have the seceders when interrogated before courts of justice, dared to say that such existed. They are the second hand coinage, the base forgery of antimasonic agitators and newspaper scribblers.

Fellow citizens, we address you as members of a free, an enlightened, and a religious community. And we desire to make a solemn appeal to your veneration for the benevolent and religious institutions by which our State and nation are distinguished. Shall these be torn down and trodden under foot, to gratify a few unprincipled men who have in view only their own aggrandizement? Our forbearance, and the mild and lenient measures we have adopted, have been all in vain. Lodges have discontinued their meetings; individuals have pledged themselves to avoid attending and to stand neutral in the contest: and the effect has been to increase the acrimony and malignity of the leaders of the party. It is not peace that they desire. And every conciliatory measure goes to disappoint their views and increase their exertions. Will you second these exertions? Will you suffer these moral incendiaries to inflame your minds? It is not the cause of freemasonry we are pleading. We are willing that should take its fate. We are willing to leave it to the unbiassed decision of future times whether the society shall even exist. If it is found to be an unnecessary appendage of the social system, we are aware that no exertions of ours could, or even ought to, avert the time of its dissolution for a moment. But, fellow citizens, it is for the peace and character of our State, and for our rights as citizens of a free government, that we plead; and we trust that our appeal will not be in vain with those who have not linked themselves irrevocably with this faction. We confidently hope and believe, that when the fumes of passion and prejudice shall be dissipated, our people will perceive the folly of waging war of extermination against a numerous and respectable portion of the community, merely because they have been initiated into a charitable society, and will not denounce as criminal an institution which they know to be laudable and beneficent in its character. We are told by antimasons, that all our appeals will be in vain, as they have succeeded in convincing the public that we will not speak the truth, when the character of our order is concerned. This gratuitous assertion is as completely at variance with common sense as it is with the well known character of thousands of our members; and we will not insult the understanding of our respectable fellow citizens by supposing for a moment that it can be credited.

To the leaders of the antimasonic faction we have nothing to say. They have chosen their course, and must expect to rise or fall with the tempest they have excited.— Their political consequence depends on the success with which they inflame the public mind; and there is no reason to doubt but they will be sufficiently industrious. We would address their consciences, if the course they have adopted did not furnish evidence that they have ceased to be influenced by that agent. Their fate would be only that of the common exciters of popular commotions who are thrown into notice by one wave of faction, and buried forever by that which succeeds it, were it not that they have assiduously set themselves to sever and destroy all the social and charitable bonds by which society is united. This conduct has earned for them a character of deeper and more indelible infamy than belongs to any other party or class of men that have existed in our country. But to the honor of our State and nation their number is comparatively small. The ranks of the party are filled by the influence of ignorance and prejudice and fear; while the managers who stand behind the curtain and direct the movements on the public stage, are limited to a few disappointed men, who have failed of obtaining the confidence of the public by honorable means, and are now willing to resort to any means to acquire an ephemeral popularity. And a prostituted newspaper press furnishes the medium through which they actuate the antimasonic exhibition. The business of writing, and printing, and publishing, in this country, is greatly overdone; and the land is deluged with the trashy abortions of the laboring press. The market was overstocked, and the literary operatives were upon the point of 'striking,' when the antimasonic excitement opened a new channel for their enterprise, and gave life and activity to 'the trade.' And a contribution is in the way of being levied upon the community, for antimasonic garbage, that would give a bible to every destitute family from the St. Lawrence to the Mississippi.

To our masonic brethren we beg leave to address a warning, that they be not infected with the factitious spirit of the times. Guard yourselves carefully, we beseech you, against this contagion. We are aware that as men, and possessing the ordinary passions of men, you will be but too liable to repel with too much asperity, charges so replete with insolence, and falsehood, as those preferred against you, by the antimasons. But we would recommend above all things, that individual collision should be avoided. We cannot retort upon antimasons in their own language, without the basest degradation; and we are constrained to believe, that in our intercourse with individuals, a dignified silence on this subject, will be our best course. There is no danger that political antimasonry, will ever obtain the control either of our national, or any of the State governments. It may lead the way, in the pollution of the public moral, and thus be one of the causes, of the final subversion of our excellent government. But this incubus will never be allowed to sit astride the vitals of our body politic. We would recommend that the meetings of the society should be punctually attended; as experience has shown, that all attempts at conciliation, by discontinuing our meetings, have only increased the hostility of our enemies.* It is the men, and not the society, they desire to destroy. The contributions for charitable purposes, should by no means be diminished; nor should the exertions of the members, in the cause of popular education, be slackened. The spirit of the age requires increasing efficiency, in the cause of humanity; and the masonic society should continue to take the lead in every philanthropic enterprise.

Finally, we pledge ourselves, to each other and to the public, that we will endeavor, in future to live more in accordance, with the principles of the society of Free and accepted Masons; and we most solemnly affirm in the fear of God, that those principles, so far as they have come to our knowledge are not at variance with the doctrines, and duties, of the christian religion, or with the duties that we owe to the community, or the government, under which we live. We have never taken an obligation, in any manner binding us, to screen a brother from deserved punishment; nor is there any principle, recognized in our society, by which we are authorized to administer any other punishment than admonition and expulsion from the lodge.

*Many of the lodges in western N. York, in the hope of quieting the public mind, gave up their charters and voluntarily discontinued their meetings. The effect was a great increase, instead of diminution of antimasonic virulence.

DISCONTENT.

Who dares incur the fury of a crowd?
Who never to a faction's mandate bowed?
Such manly virtue, of a manly age,
Has its past being on th' historic page.

Again the President resumes his chair,
Oppressed with plaudits of each Member there.
Soon rises, in his place, AN INLAND MAN;
First scrapes a bow, and then his speech began.

"My gracious! what a larned speech
Was that what you haive made!
It was so fine I cannot tell
A word of all you saide.

"Twas pretty kind o' good I guess,
I seed the Doctor wink,
And Parson T——r rub his hands—
It suited 'em I think.

I'd like to know, Sir, what you saide
Of balers and of death:
They gin my neck a cutish pain,
And amost stopped my breath.

If, Squire, you intended it
For them are Broiler-folks,
Jo Miller sursly must ha' taught
Such capalocial jokes.

I wish as how you'd haive a care
Toe make it out quite plain,
That you don't mean our folks, if you
Should tell them things again.

Some thought how you was quizing-like,
And got a little cross.
I told 'em, Sir, it couldn't be,
Because you was our Boss.

Oh! I'm a perfect yankee born,
And know a thing or two!
So I'll jist tell some raal things:
I ough that they are true.

I was a thinkin toe myself,
Yeu see, as I come down,
That we should make a mortal stir.
And cram up this ere town.

But here we set, quite lonesomelie,
From mornin until noon;
I'm glad when it is dinner-time;
I hope it will be soon.

Then, in the arter part o' day,
We haive a few school-boys;
But, Sir, we can't do nothin then,
They make such tarnal noise.

This place is most united cold,
Endangerin our lives:²
We'd better keep our hats on, Sir,
Like Representatives.

If we intend toe tarrie long,
Send for the women-folks—
I saw eight here the other day,³
Wrapped up in great big cloaks.

I count that they were white folks too—
I couldn't see a face—
I'm sure they're not ashamed for toe
Be seen in this ere place.

I hope they aint afeard toe come
And see our speeches made:
They haive more larnin and more grit
Than Emmons's, 'tis saide.

I'm not afeard toe tell you all
That I haive got toe tell;
For if they put it into print
They'll doe it very well.

I don't know how they doe it, Sir:
I once did talk apiece,
And when the writer writ it out,
It was as slick as grease.⁴

You'd better git some more folks here,
By any sort o' way;
For if you don't I rather guess,
I don't intend toe stay.

I van they are too cute for us;
They doe not mind our calls;
For here we set amost all day,
A talkin toe the walls.

We've bin a long time from our hams;
The folks feel great consarn;
They've hearn strange things bout Can-ni-bals,
As I doe partlie larn.

Sir, it was told in our town,
And many spose it true:
They gabbled up a three-yoke-team,
The cart and driver too.⁵

My woman is quite narvous, Sir,
In these ere parlous times,
When people tell all sort o' things,
And put 'em into rhymes.

I've never seen such cause afore
Toe doubt our Libertie;
We ruiate ourselves so fast
It amost makes me cry.

Therefore if we doe wish toe save
This nation from a fall,
We must begin the glorious work
In this ere very Hall.

I sine, if I doe git more time,
Toe tell you somethin fine;
Eut as its amost one o'clock,
I move we go and dine.

He was frequently seen to flourish the tomahawk and scalping knife.—Vide Dexter's Travels.

3 This is really too severe. That the ladies should have so little curiosity is altogether incredible. Elegant men! profound scholars! able statesmen! exemplary moralists!—these to form no attraction!—The thing is impossible.

5 A matter of fact. There is a celebrated work in French, entitled "Les Grands Gourmands," which gives the particulars of this horrid catastrophe. There certainly is something hard of digestion in it. But our business is to state facts, not explain them. A French Chymist, however, is of opinion that the gastronomic capabilities of a right Beef-eater have the peculiar quality of oxydizing to an incredible extent. Our Doctors concur in this opinion.

We have heard, in our intercourse with Antimasons, similar assertions to the following. We believe the one here quoted, can be found in St. Green's Herald.

"A justly offended God never let loose a scourge so dreadful, upon the churches, and the community, as Masonry."

Comment.—"And it came to pass when Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou he that troublest Israel? And he answered I have not troubled Israel; but thou, and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim. 1 Kings, xviii, 17, 18.

DEGREES OF ANTIMASON.

Question. Whence came you?

Answer. From a lodge of the sainted Morgan, at Batavia.

Q. What came you here to do?

A. To learn to overthrow masons and exalt myself.

Q. Then I presume you are an Antimason?

A. I am, try me.

Q. How will you be tried?

A. By the broad-axe and butcher-knife.

Q. Why by them?

A. Because they are useful implements of our profession.

Q. Where were you made an Antimason?

A. In a regularly constituted lodge of Antimasons.

Q. How many constitute a regular lodge?

A. Three or more.

Q. When composed of three, of whom does it consist?

A. Moderator, Secretary and Treasurer.

Q. How were you prepared?

A. By being divested of candor and respect for the truth, hoodwinked with prejudices, and having a cable tow of malice about my neck, in which condition I was conducted to the door of the lodge.

Q. How did you gain admittance?

A. By three distinct knocks.

Q. To what do these knocks allude?

A. To the three jewels of an Antimason, which are perjury, apostacy and malevolence.

Q. How were you received?

A. On the edge of the broad-axe, presented to my throat, which was to teach me, that at the command of my superiors, I should not hesitate to hew, cut, slay and destroy the wicked masons, and exterminate them from the face of the earth.

Q. How were you then disposed of?

A. I was conducted to the centre of the lodge, caused to kneel on my right knee, my left being supported on the head of the broad-axe, my left hand supporting Bernard's Light on Masonry, the butcher-knife and bayonet crossed, both stained with asses' blood, and my right hand firmly grasping the bristles of a swine, in which due form I took the obligation of Antimason.

Q. Please repeat it.

A. I, A—B—, of my own free will and accord, in the worshipful presence of these enlightened and benevolent Antimasons, and this most worshipful lodge, erected to Moloch and dedicated to Judas Iscariot, do hereby and hereon most solemnly and sincerely promise and swear, that I will always hail, forever conceal and never reveal the mysteries of this degree, except to a true and loving Antimason, or within a regularly constituted lodge of such. Furthermore, that I will slander, traduce and abuse Masons, at all times and places, to the extent of my ability. Furthermore, that I will not believe anything a mason may say, if I know it to be true, and that I will believe whatever may be told me by an antimason, if I know it to be false. Furthermore, that I will vote for an Antimason, though his qualifications be infinitely below his masonic competitor. Furthermore that I will encourage seceders, and contribute to their support as much as I can comfortably. Furthermore, that I will spare no exertions to make proselytes, by misrepresentation, lying, perjury, and circulating murder stories. Furthermore, that I will not read any masonic publication, nor let any one else if I can prevent it, lest the truth be known. Furthermore, that I will not give the grand Antimasonic word, Arcanum, except in the way in which I shall receive it, and in a low breath. All this, I promise and swear to perform, binding myself under the no less penalty than to be convicted of common sense, and to be accounted rational and of sound mind and memory, if I should in the least, knowingly violate this my Antimasonic obligation.

Q. What followed?

A. I was then instructed as to the three great lights of Antimasonry, by lessons out of the three less.

Q. What are the three great lights?

A. Perjury, mala fides, and slander.

Q. What are the three less lights?

A. Bernard's Light on Masonry, Morgan's Revelations, and St. Green's Herald.

Q. What is an Antimasonic lodge?

A. A barn, cordwainer's shop, or any private place where eels can be broiled.

Q. To whom are they dedicated?

A. To Judas Iscariot.

Q. Why so?

A. Because he was our first Most Excellent Grand Master.

The lecture having been got through with, the following was read for the edification of the Lodge.

Suicide.—On Wednesday the 28d ult, at Painted Post, says the Tioga Gazette, the Rev. Mr. Sanborn, (a renouncing Mason,) committed suicide, by hanging himself. His family were absent on a visit to a neighbor's, excepting a child, which was left to his charge. On their return, the child was found asleep upon the bed; and Mr. Sanborn missing. Shortly after the lifeless corpse of the deceased was found suspended by a rope from one of the rafters in the garret, his knees touching the floor; and from the position in which he was found, it is supposed he must have suffocated by bearing his neck upon the rope. Mr. S. had been a minister of the gospel for some years, and he has recently manifested symptoms of insanity, to which is attributed the fatal act.

MASONIC.—The Anniversary of St. John the Baptist was celebrated in this place yesterday, by the members of the Masonic fraternity. At 11 o'clock a procession was formed at their Hall, and from thence proceeded to Trinity Church, where a large congregation including the beauty and fashion of the town and vicinity were assembled.—The ceremonies commenced with some introductory remarks and an impressive prayer by the Rev. Dr. Th. P. Hunt, of Raleigh—a masonic hymn was then sung, after which an eloquent and appropriate Oration was delivered by Dr. John W. Potts. At the conclusion of the ceremonies the procession was reorganized and turned to the Hall, where a suitable entertainment was prepared by Mr. W. P. Hadly. The weather was favorable, and the audience at the Church appeared highly gratified. We have heard it suggested, that a copy of the Oration will probably be procured for publication.—*Tarborough, N. MISCELLANY.

MY COUSIN ISABEL.

Isabel was a Poetess—one of those strange, sweet beings, that sometimes meet us here, and seem like stars wandering away to Earth from their own beautiful spheres. I knew her not till she was fifteen, and she was then all I knew or could fancy of loveliness. She was ever a glad creature, and the young blossoms, that shone like stars on the midnight of her tresses, were not more bright and shadowless, than the sweet brow, that arched beneath them. Hers was indeed a spiritual existence. She loved the glorious things of earth as an Angel loves his own Paradise, and her soul would often blend with them, till the fullness of her ecstasy could find utterance but in tears.—Poetry was, to her a familiar dream—a vision of floating loveliness—and she moved abroad in the light of its inspired Divinity. I have strayed by her side on a summer evening, and listened with her to the mysterious pine-lutes of the forest or the deep murmur of the mountain streams, and gazed upon the moonlight as it was tinting the mists, the waves, and the wooded hills, with the bright coloring of dreams, and looked abroad upon the great Ocean heaving perpetually as if it were the throbbing heart of the Universe, and then her thoughts would have utterance, and her language came like the low music of a twilight wave—the breathing forth of the soul of poetry, that had floated into her spirit from the sky, the flowers, the waters, and all the thousand objects, among which she was wandering—and I yielded to the enchantment, till I could have knelt to her in worship as to a glorious vision sent down from a perfect sphere.

Isabel knew little of society. Her home was where she could gaze at will on the lovely and the sublime, the first opening of the blossoms of Spring beneath the budding tree, and the stately step-pings of the Almighty amid the thunder crags and roaring forests of the mountain. When her thoughts strayed beyond these, it was to hold communion, not with the allurements of society, but with the shining stars, the bright and spiritual worlds above her. Her thoughts went upward, like incense gushing from a broken urn.

'Tis wonderful what changes may be wrought by a few fleeting years in a sensitive spirit. I was alone with Isabel in her arbor on a calm evening of her twentieth Spring, and, when she chanted, as usual, a sweet and tender air, I could not but contrast the passionate melancholy of her voice with the tone of joyousness, with which she had so often delighted me in her girlhood. Isabel was sinking into the grave. Passion had not visited her in any of its fiercer forms, but her heart had sunk down from its starry height, and, like an Autumn flower, was casting its life-breath upon the winds. I looked upon her, and her eyes were raised to Heaven, and as the moon-beams came down and slumbered in their depths, she shook aside her long tresses that seemed to have caught their wildness and darkness from the storm, and a gush of tears, such as come when the heart yearns for language, bathed her cheek, and she sobbed long and loud. At length, her tone and look were changed to their wonted calmness. "I have been thinking," said she, "that I am about to die—about to go away from this cold world, where every thing is chilled in its blossoming. It should be so. I was once a happy creature—my thoughts were Eden birds, that fluttered and sung in the bright air of Heaven, but died, when their plumage was touched by the Earth. A child of dreams, I sought the world—but I am wearied—wearied now—and I will break my poor lute and die. Oh, whence are the bright visions, that have shed their broken and momentary gleams upon my spirit, and led me on to seek in vain their beautiful realities amid all the changes of existence! I have often dreamed, that we must have lived in some other and more glorious state of being, and that the mysterious glimpses, that here linger round our souls are the broken remembrances of that better realm. They are brightest in childhood—they picture a rainbow in every tear—and, in our infant thoughtlessness, we imagine them the shadows of the glories, that await us in life, but, as we journey onward; they begin to dissolve away, the music, with which they came over us, swells faintly and more faintly upon the blast, till, at length, we awake, and find, that all is but a cold and bitter mockery!"

In a few days we laid Isabel in her grave. She slumbers in a retired spot, and it has often been my consolation to go and muse alone over her silent resting place. During my late visit, I pencilled an unworthy tribute to the memory of the child of song.

Dear Isabel, again I come to linger and to weep Upon the spot where wild flowers spring to mark thy place of sleep,
And as I kneel beside thy urn, thy spirit from afar
Comes over my memory like the tone, the music of a star.

Thou wert the roselight of a morn—the Idiot of my dreams,
And life, with thee, was like the fall of Summer's quiet streams,
And, if a dark cloud ever came upon my visions fair, Thy love shone o'er the gathering shade, and left the rainbow there.

Thy breezy step is seen no more upon the blue hill's brow,
And Beauty's early light has left my darkened day dreams now—
But my long spirit brightens yet, like that immoral flower,
That sends abroad at eve, the rays it drank at morn's first hour.

Dear minstrel girl—thine was the high, the holy gift of fire,
And beautiful its flashes played around thy glowing lyre,
But it consumed thy heart, for there its centred brightness fell,
And thou art now a thing of dust, my own loved Isabel!

THE STORY OF LADY ELEANOR BUTLER AND MISS PONSONBY.

The romantic history of these two ladies has frequently been before the public in a partial form; but we believe the circumstances connected with it have never been clearly stated. Any traveller cannot pass thro' the beautiful vale of Llangollen without having pointed out to him the valley in which they have dwelt. The following interesting particulars on the subject are from the Brit. Mag.: they evidently are from the pen of a writer who knew both the ladies well. One of them was of the family of Ormand and the other of Besborough. In early life they formed a romantic attachment, as deep as it proved to be lasting, and determined to enjoy their friendship in perfect seclusion. Their history is briefly as follows:

"By a singular coincidence, which struck their imagination, they were both born in Dublin, on the same day, in the same year; and they lost their parents at the same time; so that these orphans seemed intended by the hand of Providence for mutual sympathy. They were brought up together, and, as they grew in years, talked over the similarity of their fates, and easily persuaded themselves that they were designed by Heaven to pass their lives together. They spent much of their time at the Castle of Kilkenny: the seat of the Ormand family, where they were observed to shun the society of others, and always to seek retirement within themselves; and as they were now about eighteen, at a time of life when their settlement in the world might be looked for, it was the anxious wish of their friends that they should mix with company as other young persons of their age and sex. One morning, however, they were missing, and no inquiry could trace them in the neighborhood; but at length they were discovered in disguise on board a merchant's vessel, about to sail from the harbor of Waterford. They were brought back and separated, and every means taken to wean them from this extraordinary, and as it appeared to their friends, most injurious attachment for each other; but it seemed fixed and unalterable, and for some time they were allowed to pursue the bent of their own inclinations.—They again proceeded to a seaport, embarked in a Welsh trader, and were landed among the romantic mountains of North Wales. From thence they proceeded from the coast, through the chain of the valley I have mentioned, at that time all but closed from human intrusion, and nearly impassable, except by goats and mountain ponies. Here they searched in vain for a retired spot in which they could fix their residence. The dreary and desolate region presented no habitation which could afford them even a temporary shelter; and they passed through the last valley of Llangollen, and were about to leave in despair a secluded district, where they had fondly hoped to settle themselves. 'While leaving this last place with heavy hearts,' said Miss Ponsonby, when communicating her history to me, 'we turned round to look a last look at this land of promise; the setting sun was then shining on the romantic ruins of Dinas Bran, and its sloping beams gave to the wooden sides of the glen so lovely an aspect that it seemed to invite our return; so we determined to go back and again search for a residence in the shadow of the mountains.' They could find none for the night but a mean hovel on the naked side of the hill, and in this they sheltered themselves, and the next morning agreed with its poor inmates for their hut. Here they set themselves down and began those improvements on the bleak and barren rocks which now adorn this lovely valley.

"When their absence was known, the nurse of one of them, Mary Carryl, was inconsolable for their loss. She too set out in search of them through the mountains, and after a long and weary pilgrimage, found them in the comfortless cabin.—She determined not to leave them, and was the only attendant that for years supplied them with necessities. Their friends now finding their resolution of abandoning the world unalterable, no longer pressed their return, and they began to improve and beautify their rugged residence; but when they had effected much, it was notified to them by the proprietor of the mountain, that they must leave it. While very disconsolate at this notification, their faithful Mary Carryl disappeared; and it was supposed she was tired of their solitude, and had returned to her own home;—after some time she came back, and throwing paper on the table, 'Now, my dear children,' said she, 'you are settled for life.' The paper was a lease of a large tract of the mountain, which she had obtained from the proprietor, having gone to London and purchased it with her own earnings. From that time the grounds rose in great beauty; and a cottage distinguished for its taste, elegance and seclusion, rose in the bosom of the plantation. The fame of these elegant but eccentric girls now expanded, and several persons of the highest rank sought an introduction; but they persevered in their determination, and for twenty years, I believe, never slept out of their own cottage, nor admitted a stranger into it.

Poor Mary Carryl is long since dead. Over her grave is a tomb, a triangular pyramid, with three faces for inscriptions. The author describes his affecting visit to the church-yard in company with Miss Ponsonby. The second tablet has been filled up. Lady Eleanor Butler died about twelve months ago; and her accomplished and desolate friend is now patiently waiting the moment when she shall be called to join her in a better world; & the triangular monument of Llangollen church-yard will be filled up with the most romantic and interesting story in existence.

SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

METEORIC PHENOMENON CONSIDERED MIRACULOUS.—The British Magazine for April contains an article of great interest under the above title. The object of the writer is to account upon natural principles for recent occurrences which have been considered miraculous. He first relates the statement of the appearance of a cross in the sky, at Migne, in Polotiers. He first relates the atmospheric fluid is homogeneous and of equal density; the rays of light pass without obstruction or alteration in their shape or direction; but when they enter from a rarer into a denser medium, they are refracted or bent out of their course, and this with greater or less effect, according to the different degrees of density in the media or the deviation of the ray from the perpendicular. If the second medium be very dense in proportion, the ray will be both refracted and reflected; and the object from which it proceeds will assume a variety of grotesque and extraordinary shapes, and it will sometimes appear as in a reflection from a concave mirror, dilated in size and changed in situation.—"I shall mention a few striking effects which are known to proceed from this simple cause. The first is the mirage seen in the deserts of Africa.—Mr. Monge, a member of the National Institute, accompanied the French army in Egypt. In the desert between Alexandria and Cairo, the mirage of the blue sky was inverted, and so mingled with the sand below as to give to the desolate and arid wilderness an appearance of the most rich and beautiful country. They saw in all directions green islands, surrounded with extensive lakes of pure transparent water. Nothing could be conceived more lovely and picturesque than the landscape. In the tranquil surface of the lakes, the trees and houses, with which the islands were covered, were strongly reflected with vivid and varied hues, and the party hastened forward to enjoy the cool refreshments of shade and stream, which these populous villages proffered to them. When they arrived, the lake on whose bosom they floated, the trees among whose foliage they were embowered, and the people who stood on the shore inviting their approach, had all vanished—and nothing remained but a uniform and irksome desert of sand and sky, with a few naked huts and ragged Arabs. Had not they been undeceived by their nearer approach, there was not a man in the French army who would not have sworn that the visionary trees and lakes had a real existence in the midst of the desert."

There is much practical wisdom in the following remarks of Dr. Franklin:

All human situations have their inconveniences: we feel those that we find in the present, and we neither feel nor see those that exist in another.—Hence we make frequent and troublesome changes without amendment, and often for the worse.—In my youth I was a passenger in a little sloop, descending the Delaware; there being no wind, we were obliged when the ebb was spent, to cast anchor and wait for the next. The heat of the sun was excessive, the company all strangers to me, and not very agreeable. Near the river side, I saw what I took to be a pleasant green meadow, in the middle of which was a large shady tree, where it struck my fancy I could sit and read, and pass the time agreeably till the tide turned. I therefore prevailed with the captain to put me ashore. Being landed, I found a great part of my meadow was really marsh, in crossing which to come at my tree, I was up to my knees in the mud; and I had not placed myself under its shade five minutes before the mosquitoes, in swarms, found me out, attacked my face and legs, and made my rest impossible, so that I returned to the beach and called for a boat to come and take me on board again, where I was obliged to bear the heat I had strove to quit and also the laugh of the company. Similar cases in the affairs of life have often fallen under my observation.

JOURNEYMEN PRINTERS.

'From high to low in New England, and at the South, they are the same careless, well-informed, good-hearted men—knowing how to act better than they do; nothing at times, yet every thing if occasion requires it; we have seen one and the same individual of the craft a methodist minister at Carolina, a boatman on the western canal, a sheriff in Ohio, a sailing master on board a privateer, a fiddler in New Orleans, a dandy in Broadway, New York, a pressman in a garret printing office, without a settled habitation any where!—'

Having nothing to loose, no calamity can overwhelm them, and caring to gain nothing, no tide of fortune carries them upward from the level where they choose to stand; the least to be envied, yet the happiest dogs in Christendom. Philosophers by practice, and spendthrifts by inclination, they complain not when the stomach cries for bread and they have no bread to give; and in the next hour, if fortune favors them with the means, expend more for unnecessary delicacies that would serve to keep them on wholesome food for a whole week."

Female Beauty.—From an essay in the last number of Mrs. Hale's Ladies Mag., on Beauty.

To sum up the whole, the charms that are really indispensable to being beloved, may be possessed by every one who is not personally, or mentally, or morally deformed. Let us enumerate them.

Firstly—an eye, whether black, blue, or gray, that has the spirit of kindness in its expression.

Secondly—a mouth that is able to say a good deal, and that sincerely. Its teeth kept as clean as possible, must be an argument of cleanliness in general; it also must be very good natured to servants, and friends that come in unexpectedly to dinner.

Thirdly—a figure that shall preserve itself, not by neglecting any of its duties but by good taste, exercise, and a dislike of gross living. A woman may be fond of almost any pleasure under the sun, except those of tattling, and the table, and ostentation.

Fourthly—the art of being happy at home, and making that home the abode of peace. Where can peace dwell, if there be not piety? These qualities will sway the souls of men, when the shallower perfections enumerated in this article would cease to charm. A good heart is the best beautifier.

FEMALE CHARACTERISTIC.—I never met a female, from the flat-nosed and ebony-colored monster of the tropics, to the snow-white and sublime divinity of a Greek isle, without a touch of romance: repulsiveness could not conceal it, age could not change it. I have found it in all times and places; like a spring of fresh waters starting up even from the flint—cheering the cheerless, softening the insensible, renovating the withered—a secret whisper in the ear of every woman alive, that to the last, passion might flutter its rosy pinions round her brow.

DUTIES.—A life of duty is the only cheerful life;—for all joy springs from the affections; and 'tis the great law of Nature, that without good deeds, all good affection dies, and the heart becomes utterly desolate. The external world then loses all its beauty; poetry fades away from the earth; for what is poetry, but the reflection of all pure and sweet, all high and holy thoughts? But where duty is—

"Flowers laugh beneath her in their beds,
And fragrance in her footing treads;—
She doth preserve the stars from wrong,
And the eternal heavens, through her, are fresh and strong."

A receipt for destroying catapillars. Take a long pole and tie a piece of sponge at the end—dip this in spirits of turpentine, and conduct it to the nests—the spirits will penetrate them and affect the vermin to such a degree that in ten minutes they will be completely destroyed. With one gill five trees were lately cleansed.

NEW COMET.—A Hamburg paper of the 4th May, speaking of a recently discovered comet, says—'The new comet has a small, but very brilliant, nucleus, a bright body, and a pale train, about 2 1-2 deg. long. Were it not for the moonlight it could be seen without the help of a glass. It moves very slowly to the North East, and will probably be visible for a considerable time.'

ON HEARING THE CHURCH-BELLS.

A gloom will o'er my senses steal ;
 Oft as I hear yon distant peal ;
 It strikes upon my sadden'd heart,—
Recalls events ;—Dear friends depart !
 In early days, when fancy charm'd ;
 When youth's gay dream my bosom warm'd ;
 Joyous, each sound fell on my ear ;
 Sorrow near sought to mingle there.
 A warning voice ! I heard thee now ;
 Soon, sad, will be thy fall, and low ;
 Soon, to the busy throng, thou'd't tell,
 Of her, who bade this world farewell !
 Her withered hopes, sad thoughts recall ;
 For her, no kindred tear will fall !
 Ingratitude has barb'd the dart,
 Which pierced a trusting feeling heart.
 Yet ONE perhaps ; whose soothing power
Sustain'd her in afflictions hour ;
 May hover near her humble bier,
 And to her memory drop a tear.

CAROLINE.

ON BELLS.

Bells were formerly used by the Romans to designate the times of bathing and for other purposes ; and thence they were naturally applied, by the Christians of Italy to denote the hours of devotion, and to summon the people to church. They were first introduced about the fourth century. The Turks after the taking of Constantinople, prohibited the use of bells, under pretence that, their sound would disturb the repose of departed spirits, which, according to their belief, wander in the air. But in this they are supposed to have been influenced more by political, than religious motives ; lest, the ringing of bells might serve as a signal for revolts.

The uses of bells are summed up in the following distichs, which were frequently inscribed upon them.

Funera flango ;	I tole at funerals ;
Fulgura frango ;	I break the thunderbolts ;
Sabbata pango ;	I announce the Sabbath ;
Excito Centos ;	I rouse the indolent ;
Dissipo ventos ;	I dissipate the winds ;
Paco cruentos."	I appease the cruel !

ANOTHER.

"Luado Deum Verum ; plebem voco ; conjuco clerum ;
 "Defunetos floro ; pestem fugo ; festa decorto."

I praise the true God ; I call the people, and the priest together ; I mourn for the dead ; I drive away pestilence ; I adorn the festivals.

Matthew Paris observes that anciently the use of bells was prohibited in time of mourning ; though at present they make one of the principal ceremonies of mourning.—Mabillon adds that, it was an ancient custom to ring the bells for persons about to expire, to advertise the people to pray for them ; whence our PASSING-BELLS. Sabineau observes that, the custom, of ringing bells at the approach of thunder, is of some antiquity ; but the design was not so much to shake the air, as to call the people to church to pray, that the parish might be preserved.

In the times of Popery, bells were baptized and anointed, oleo chrismatis, (with consecrated oil) ; they were exercised and blessed, by the Bishop ; from a belief that when these ceremonies were performed, they had power to drive the devil out of the air ; to calm tempests ; to extinguish fire ; and to recreate even the dead. The ritual for these ceremonies is contained in the Roman Pontifical ; and it was usual, in their baptism, to give the bells the name of some saint. And the names were sometimes cast upon their edges.

The practice of ringing bells in change, on regular peals, is said to be peculiar to England. Whence Brittain has been termed the Ringling Island. There are or were, in London, several societies of ringers ; particularly one known by the name of the College youths ; of this, Sir Mathew Hall, Lord Chief Justice of the Kings Bench, was a member in his youthful days.

LET THE SOUND ECHO TO THE SENSE.—The following sentence most beautifully exemplifies this precept of Horace ;

Ordinary minds seldom rise above the dull uniform tenor of common sentiments, like those animals that are condemned to creep on the ground, all the days of their lives ; but the most lowless exertions of an original genius, like the flight of an eagle, are towering, though devious ; its path, as the course of a comet, is blazing, though irregular ; and its errors and excellencies are equally inimitable.

AMBITION.

The ambition of a silly fellow will be to have a fine equipage, a fine horse and fine clothes : things which any body that has money, may have as well as he ; for they are all to be bought : but the ambition of a man of sense and honor is, to be distinguished by a character and reputation of knowledge, truth and virtue ; things which are not to be bought, and that can only be acquired by a good head and a good heart.—Chest.

"Ambition is but ashes, and beauty but clay. Manhood, is but a skeleton, and attraction but 'food for worms.' Thus forever will it be with man ! Like a fair ship he must go down, and the waves hide him. Love with its blandishments is but a dream—life but a thing which to day is, and tomorrow is not ! But when I see the moon-beam rest upon the graves of those loved by me in youth, I think of other worlds, where the disappointments of this, will pass like a summer cloud away, and fruition take the place of mortal mockery."

DANTE.—The secret of Dante's struggles thro' life was in the reckless sarcasm of his answer to the Prince of Veronea, who asked him how he could account for the fact, that, in the household of princes, the court fool was in greater favor than the philosopher. 'Similarity of minds, said the fierce genius, 'is, all over the world, the source of friendship.'

A VILLAGE LIGHTED BY NATURAL GAS.—The village of Fredonia, in the western part of New-York, presents this singular phenomenon. The village is forty miles from Buffalo, and about two from Lake Erie : a small but rapid stream called the Canadaway passes through it, and after turning several mills discharges into the lake below ; near the mouth is a small harbor with a light house.—While removing an old mill which stood partly over this stream in Fredonia, three years since, some bubbles were observed to break frequently from the water, and, on trial, were found to be inflammable. A company was formed, and a hole, an inch and a half in diameter, being bored through the rock, a soft faetid limestone, the gas left its natural channel and ascended through this. A gasometer was then constructed, with a small house for its protection, and pipes being laid, the gas is conveyed through the whole village. One hundred lights are fed from it, more or less, at an expense of one dollar and a half yearly for each. The flame is large but not so strong or brilliant as that from gas in our cities : it is however in high favor with the inhabitants. The gasometer collected eighty-eight cubic feet in twelve hours during the day ; but it is stated that more might be procured with a larger apparatus.

A POSER. Taylor, the water poet, who lived in Charles the First's time, gives the following line as reading backwards and forwards the same:—

'Lewd did I live & evil I did dwell ;'

and adds, 'I will give any man five shillings a piece for as many as he can make in English.

THE VERY LAST.—Why, said a cockney, is a cup of tea like marrying a second time ? D'ye give it up ? Because it's re-wiring.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JULY 17, 1830.

TO ALL CANDID ANTIMASONS.

Wonder not, reader, that we address the candid of the antimasonic party ! for whatever you may think, we yet hope that something remains among them, of the ordinary christian virtues ; and possibly even a remnant of candor may continue mercifully to abide in the breasts of some of them. At all events we cannot refrain from this once addressing our opponents ; to give vent to our apprehensions and the feelings of patriotism and benevolence, inspired by the present posture of their affairs.

Antimasons! hear us, and answer us. Look at your deluders ; and tell us candidly ; are you not ashamed to own them for your leaders and associates ? Study their characters, some of them marked by the most disgraceful vices, and stained with blood, and answer us. Are you willing longer to follow such abandoned citizens, or even to travel with them in the same road ? Citizens did we say ! they are unworthy the sacred name of citizens of our free republic. Antimasons of candor ; antimasons, who love your country ; antimasons, who have yet remaining, in your bosoms, a lurking particle of the moral virtues ; we conjure you to "knock at your breasts and ask your consciences;" are you prepared to follow, all lengths, and without compunction, such men as the Greys, De Wolf, Anderton, Greene, Spencer, Sandborn, Rollins, Allen, Giddens, Mann, Bernard, and a host of others, whose very names we refrain, in charity, from repeating. Many of their characters have been elucidated, heretofore, in the Mirror ; and we will now only touch upon some of them. The two Greys, father and son, says the Albany Record, who were recently convicted of murder at Batavia, Genesee county, were members of the notorious Le Roy convention and signed the famous antimasonic declaration of independence.

Dr. Thaddeus K. De Wolf, an active, leading, and very "patriotic" member of the Connecticut antimasonic State convention, has been convicted of attempting to commit a rape on a deaf and dumb girl, and sentenced to fifteen years imprisonment in the State Prison.

Further, Dr. De Wolf committed the beastly and damning sin of which he stands convicted, at Hitchcocksville, Conn. in June, 1828, and anathematized the masonic institution and all "secret" societies, in the antimasonic convention, held at Hartford in February of the present year, at which time he was indicted. That strolling delegate, Henry Dana Ward, figured with Dr. De Wolf at Hartford, as adjunct inquisitor and professor of antimasonic politics and ethics.

On the trial of Eli Bruce, before the Court of General Sessions for the county of Ontario, in August, 1828, Adams was brought up as a witness : and he there again plainly, distinctly, and deliberately testified, that he was ignorant of the fate of Morgan, and knew nothing of the transaction. Mr. SPENCER WAS ACQUAINTED WITH THESE FACTS WHEN, IN MARCH, 1829, HE MADE HIS PROPOSALS TO THE GOVERNOR. We would have this matter clearly and properly understood—When Mr. Spencer, in March, 1829, proposed to Governor Throop to pardon Adams and pay him TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS to swear against the lives or liberty of certain individuals, he KNEW that Adams had twice sworn that he KNEW NOTHING OF THE TRANSACTIONS. This a plain and true statement of the case, and we would put it to the intelligence and common sense of the people, whether such proceedings shall be palliated or excused in this republican land, by technical logic or professional sophistry ?

As we have before said in the Mirror of Bernard, if there be one man under heaven, to whom Pollok's description of the hypocrite applies with greater force than to another, that man is Elder David Bernard. He has literally

"Stole the livery of the court of heaven,
 To serve the devil in.
 In holy phrases transacted villanies
 That common sinners durst not meddle with."

If we may believe him to be what Dr. White represents him, he has violated the laws of heaven; profaned the house of God; degraded the profession he follows; insulted virtue, and outraged all laws, human and divine.

"Most guilty, villainous, dishonest man!
Wolf in the clothing of the gentle lamb!
Dark traitor in Messiah's holy camp!
Leper in saintly garb!—assassin masked
In virtue's robe! vile hypocrite accursed!
I strive in vain to set his evil forth.
The words that should sufficiently accuse,
And execrate such reprobate, had need
Come glowing from the lips of deepest hell."

He has been publicly charged with lying, with deception, duplicity and profranity; yet he dare not meet his accuser in a court of justice; he dare not confront him before a council of his own friends! He is accused of having sown "the seeds of discord in families and societies;" of having attempted to dishonor the female members of his own church! and yet this miscreant, conscious of his own baseness, dare not submit these accusations to legal investigation. He is sensible that such an investigation would damn him to eternal infamy; and a majority of his party are alike sensible that, the sacrifice of his character, however infamous, would lead to an exposition of their own disgraceful and iniquitous transactions; that his budget of lies, his book of masonic disclosures, would be bereft of whatever influence it may at present possess.

We have seen several accounts similar to the following from the Dover Gazette, of the treatment which Mr. Green has received in different sections of New England, while endeavouring to enlighten the minds of the people. It is truly astonishing that so pious, patriotic and useful an animal as Mr. Green evidently is (see Mirror of May 29 and June 12, 1830) cannot be treated with more respect.

A very curious farce has taken place here this evening. A man by the name of Green, from Boston, arrived here yesterday and undertook to lecture on Anti Masonry, in the Court House, and as luck would have it, a number of boys, rushed into the room with their hats full of rotten eggs, and pelted the poor devil to such a degree that he had to quit in the midst of his exercises.

At a Public Meeting held at Bridgewater Ms. on the 5th inst. Simeon Pratt was called to the chair and Lewis Washburn was appointed Secretary. An address to the citizens of Plymouth county on political antimasonry, was delivered, which, by a vote of the meeting, is now in press and will be published early next week; it is an able production and we recommend it to the attention of every candid antimason, in particular.

BAA!—An antimasonic thing, (we will not be so libelous on editors as to say newspaper,) in speaking of some score or two of knaves and brainless dupes, who congregated together on the 5th inst. in this city, for the purpose of making themselves still more ridiculous, as if there had never been a celebration of Independence, before antimasonry was thought of, observes, "The efforts of the masons to draw the people away from this celebration, were extraordinary. Dinners were got up by unusual persons; the uniformed companies were ordered out; a band of music was hired to play from half past 3 o'clock, to 8, P. M. on the public common—Steamboats took excursions in the harbor, &c. &c.!! but notwithstanding all, the Hall was filled by a highly respectable assembly, who listened with breathless attention to the speaker." Fudge.

GIDDENS of Antimasonic Almanac memory, who has been the main stay of the antimasonic party in New York for three years past; we are informed, very suddenly disappeared!!! i. e. taken himself off "between two days" from Lockport during the recent session of the "Morgan court" at that place. It is said he was exceedingly wroth with the appointment of N. Birdley, Esq. as special counsel for the investigation of the Morgan conspiracy, in as much as his liberty to run at large might be questioned by twelve or more of the grand jurors.

A work entitled "Demonology and Witchcraft," by Sir Walter Scott, is announced to appear soon, by the London papers. If the work is a complete history of Demonology and Witchcraft, it must embrace "Salem Witchcraft," Antimasonry, Almanac Gidden's life and adventures, and Anderton's Murder Story.

SELECTED SUMMARY.

The dinner of the Corporation of the city of New York, on the 5th inst. cost $2000. This included the feed for the Board of Aldermen. There was not a whole turtle left in the city on the following day.

Major Andre.—The Rensselaer N. Y. Folio states, that "those who take an interest in the actors in important events of the revolution, will be pleased to learn that David Williams, the sole surviving captor of Major Andre, is still in good health.

Sheet Lead it is thought will soon be used very generally in roofing buildings in the Western States.

We learn from the Canada papers that water was let into the Welland Canal on the 19th ult.

The report of the death of the mother of Napoleon—it is a proud title, whatever the world may say of him—appears to be unfounded.

A beautiful Lunar Rainbow was observed over Baltimore the 30th ult. a little after midnight—a phenomenon of rare occurrence.

The Emperor of Brazil, has at length formally acknowledged the Independence of Mexico, and appointed a Representative to that Government.

The London Morning Chronicle, of the 11th May, says—"Yesterday there were no less than ninety seven persons, male and female, brought to the Union Hall Office, charged with being drunk in the streets; and they composed the first only of one division in the district."—London against the world, then, for the use of alcohol.

The annual cost for maintaining nine sovereigns, in Europe, is said to be about $38,000,000. For Russia, 9,000,000; France, 8,500,000; Austria, 7,500,000; Spain, 2,700,000; Prussia, 2,250,000 Netherlands, 1,300,000 England 5,000,000; Naples, 1,050,000 Portugal, 600,000.

ROASTING NEGROES.—A case of this kind says the Washington Spectator, lately occurred in the neighbourhood of Cedar Spring, Abbeville District, S. C. under auspices and authority of a Magistrate's Court. It was not for the commission of murder, but for an assault, with a design to commit it. It is said that two or three thousand persons attended to witness the spectacle.

The Marshall who has been taking the census in the neighborhood of Pittsburgh, remarks that wherever he finds newspapers lying about a house the inhabitants are civil and communicative, while, where there is no paper taken, the inmates are unwilling to expose their numbers. This result is not at all remarkable, and we have no doubt it is true.

The March of Morality seems to keep pace with the oft-named "March of Intellect." We perceive the following announcement in a Canterbury paper. "Wanted in the office of this paper, two devils of moral character."

STEAM DOCTOR.—Died in Montpelier, Vt. on the 13th inst. a child of Manasses Litch, aged about eight years. The circumstances of its death are peculiarly painful. The child it is said, drank too freely of cider in the morning. Mr. Litch is one of the Thompsonian steam doctors. He tried his skill on the child, and killed it in the course of three or four hours.

CASUALTY.—Mr. Anson Nichols of Sheffield-Ohio, was instantly killed, on Saturday the 19th June by a stroke of lightning descending a tree, under which he had sought shelter during a violent thunder storm.

A quarantine ground has been marked out at St. Johns, New Brunswick.

SOMERSET, (Penn.) June 22.

AWFUL EFFECTS OF LIGHTNING.—A large red oak which stood on the land of Mr. Henry Benford, in sight of our village, was struck by the lightning, on Sunday morning an hour or two before break of day, and shivered into a thousand pieces, some of which were thrown nearly a hundred yards from the stump. So complete was the destruction of the trunk of the tree, that it seems to have been literally swept from under the top and branches, which dropt down on a heap at the root of the tree. Several large pieces, lying 80 or 40 yards off, had evidently glided several yards after striking the ground. More awful effects of lightning we never beheld.

INHABITANTS OF THE WORLD.—Mahe Brun estimates the whole number of the inhabitants of the world at six hundred and forty millions; of which 228,000,000 are Christians; 310,000,000 Pagans; 100,000,000 Mahometans; 4,000,000 Jews. Of the Christians, he estimates that there are 116,000,000 Catholics, 70,000,000 belonging to the Greek Church, and 42,000,000 Protestants.

SHAVING AT SEA.—A verdict of $125 has been recovered in the Supreme Court by a passenger who came to this country two years ago in the brig Hercules, against the Captain of that vessel, for suffering the process of an introduction to Neptune to be performed on the plaintiff by his crew, while crossing the banks of Newfoundland.—The court said, in reference to this immemorable sea usage, that it never could apply to those who paid their passage. *N. A STRANGE VISITER. A Sturgeon eight feet long, threw himself into the cabin of the sloop Eclipse, Capt. Osterlander, while on his passage from Albany to this city on the 28th ult. It came into the window which is three feet from the water, and only eighteen inches wide; and in its course to the main cabin broke through the state room door, overturned the table, and committed sundry other depredations—fortunately no person was in the cabin at the time. The jar occasioned by his fall on the floor, was so great that all on board supposed the vessel had struck something under water.

A bill is in the Upper Canada Parliament, for 'rendering unlawful the barbarous practice of using Latin, or any out-landish phrases in law pleadings.'

EVERY MAN'S FARM IS MORTGAGED.—The State debt is now $13,000,000. Allowing 265,000 inhabitants who pay taxes, it would amount to $49 to every taxable inhabitant!

The interest of the public debt at 5 per cent amounts yearly to $620,000 The interest for every month is $50083—for every week, $12,011 for every day, $1,712—for every minute, 1, 17.

This debt is continually increasing. It would weigh in silver more than 780,000 pounds—or 343 tons. 3000 men could not lift it. Since this debt has been gathering, every member of the Legislature has expended for the State more than twice his weight in silver. It would load 174 waggons with two tons to each load, one team could not transport it from Philadelphia to the seat of government in four years.

Near Hampton, Va. the dwelling of Mrs. Cooper was set on fire at 2 o'clock, morning of 1st instant, and destroyed, with nearly all the contents.

THE WREATH.

NATURE'S FAREWELL.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

The beautiful is vanished and returns not.

Coleridge's Wallenstein.

A youth rode forth from childhood's home,
Through the crowded paths of the world to roam,
And the green leaves whisper'd as he pass'd,
"Wherefore thou dreamer! away so fast?"

"Knew'st thou with what thou art parting here,
Long would'st thou linger in doubt and fear;
Thy heart's free laughter, thy sunny hours,
Thou hast left in our shades with the Spring's wild flow'rs.

"Under the arch by our mingling made,
Thou and thy brother have gaily play'd;
Ye may meet again where ye roved of yore,
But as ye have met there—oh! never more!"

On rode the youth—and the boughs among,
Thus the wild birds o'er his pathway sung;
"Wherefore so fast unto life away?
Thou art leaving forever thy joy in our lay!

"Thou may'st come to the summer woods again,
And thy heart have no echo to greet this strain;
Afar from the foliage its love will dwell,
A change must pass o'er thee—farewell, farewell!"

On rode the youth; and the founts and streams
Thus mingled a voice with his joyous dreams:
"We have been thy playmates through many a day,
Wherefore thus leave us?—oh! yet delay;

"Listen but once to the sound of our mirth;
For thee 'tis a melody passing from earth!
Never again wilt thou find in its flow
The peace it could once on thy heart bestow.

"Thou wilt visit the scenes of thy childhood's glee,
With the breath of the world on thy spirit free;
Passion and sorrow its depths will have stir'd,
And the singing of waters be vainly heard.

"Thou wilt bear in our glad some laugh no part;
What should it do for a burning heart?
Thou wilt bring to the banks of our freshest rill,
Thirst which no fountain on earth may still!

"Farewell!—when thou comest again to thine own,
Thou wilt miss from our music its loveliest tone!
Mournfully true is the tale we tell—
Yet on, fiery dreamer!—farewell, farewell!"

And a something of gloom on his spirit weigh'd,
As he caught the last sounds of his native shade,
But he knew not, till many a bright spell broke,
How deep were the oracles nature spoke!

FORGET ME NOT.

"Forget me not!" in accents mild,
My mother says, "beloved child;
"Forget me not when far away,
Amidst a thoughtless world you stray:
Forget me not when fools would win
Your footsteps to the paths of sin;
Forget me not when urged to wrong,
By passions and temptations strong;
Forget me not when pleasure's snare
Would lead you from the house of prayer.

"Forget me not in feeble age,
But let me then your thoughts engage,
And think, my child, how fondly I
Watch'd o'er your helpless infancy,
Forget me not when death shall close
These eyelids in their last repose!
And evening breezes softly wave
The grass upon thy mother's grave.
Oh! then whate'er thy age and lot
May be, my child! Forget me not."

From the American Farmer.

GOOD OLD TIMES.

I do respect the times of old—the times of beans and pork,
When our old clever honest dads went whistling to their work;

When old cock'd hats and breeches were the fashions of the day,
And good thick-bottom'd shoes were worn, with buckles shinning gay!

The times of old—the times of old—when our good mothers wore

Good homespun stuffs—and kept their muffs and tippets evermore!

When good stout waists were all the rage, and cheeks ne'er painted were,
And borrow'd curls ne'er deck'd the girls with beauty debonnaire!

The times of old—the good old times, when home brew'd beer went round

The merry hearth, where boisterous mirth and apples did abound—

When giggling maids would hang their heads in bashful modesty,

And sprightly lads would eye their dads, and nudge them cosily!

The good old times, when our old dads were fat and hearty too,

With hair combed back most gracefully, and done up in a cue.

I do respect those golden days, when fashion was inclin'd
To make her votaries wear their coats with pocket-holes behind!

Alas; they've passed with time away—those halcyon days are o'er,

And now men doat on green frock-coats, with pocket-holes before!

The women, too, have taken the cue, and wear their chains of gold:

O for the lads, like our old dads, who liv'd in times of old!

ISLE OF ST. HELENS.

[Extract from the "Log Book" of a party recently returned from a Northern Tour.]

Sweet Isle of St. Helens! we ne'er shall forget thee,
Thou emerald gem on the breast of the stream,
Wherever we roam we shall fondly regret thee,
And oft of thy flowers and thy foliage shall dream.

Art and nature, once foes, on thy green bosom meeting,
On the growth of thy beauty together have smiled,
Together have wrought while the garland completing,
To twine round the brow of thy favorite child.

Farewell lovely Isle! in the world's rude collision
We often shall sigh for thy shady retreat,
And thy rock-mingled verdure in memory's vision
Shall haunt us to render e'en bliss incomplete.

EXCLUSIVE LOVE.

Go court the glance of every eye,
Invite the touch of every lip,
Be free to all who flutter by—
I sip not where the many sip:
The blossom of my heart must be
A flower that blooms for one alone;
Divided charms are not for me—
No all its sweets must be my own!

Go—spread thy charms to every sight,
Impart to all thy favors sweet,
I am not like the bee, to light
On flowers where all a welcome meet!
The blossoms of my heart must be
A flower that bloom for one alone;
Divided charms are not for me—
No, all its sweets must be my own!

TO A TEN DOLLAR BILL.

Come rest in my pocket, my last forlorn bill,
The rest are fled from thee, but thou art here still;
And though I am thirsty, yet we cannot part,
Though parched be my throat, thou art dear to my heart.

O what was cash made for, if 'tis not to spend,
To drink when you're thirsty, to borrow or lend;
I know not, I care not, on what bank thou'rt drawn
But I know that I sigh whenever thou'rt gone.

I call'd thee my friend when there was on thy face
Two 00 after 1 with exquisite grace;
I feasted and frolick'd till you've dwindled away
To the ten dollar bill that you see here to day.

A priest of yore took the following text, viz—
"The world, the flesh, and the devil." After entering upon his discourse, he remarked, "I shall take but little notice of the world, pass lightly over the flesh, and hasten as fast as I can to the devil."

A young lady at school, engaged in the study of the word "kiss" was a common or proper noun?

the girl blushing deeply, with hesitancy, answer-

HENRY P. LEWIS, PRINTER.

[The following article is from the pen of the talented Editor of the Literary Subaltern, a paper that, for its original humor, sound reasoning, and inflexible adherence to truth and justice, stands inferior to none in this country. That the Masonic fraternity have been shamefully abused since the unfortunate abduction of the impostor MORGAN, (whose character, even as portrayed by himself and friends, is enough to "damn him to everlasting infamy,") is undeniable by any. But who are they from whom the abuse emanates? A set of scoundrels unworthy of credit or notice—wretches who would sacrifice the reputations of the best men in our country, to attain their own sinister views. Even Ministers of the Gospel have unblushingly come before the world, both in the pulpit and in books, and proclaimed themselves perjurers, and then desired the confidence of the community. And other Ministers, to uphold the tottering fabric of their infamy, have solicited Masons to purjure themselves, to screen their infernal co-laborers from the merited lash of an incensed public. The Editor of the Subaltern has given them a castigation, although he is not a Mason, which deserves the thanks of every friend to truth and order.]—Charleston pa.

Masonry vs. Antimasonry.—The subject of Masonry vs. Antimasonry, is one, that we would gladly have avoided, and we should most assuredly have suffered it to pass us, had we not been convinced within a few days, that to do so, we should betray the trusts we owe to society, to our friends, our God, and our common country. A sense of duty urges us on, and we will now speak boldly, yet candidly, and honestly, on the subject, and come what may, we will endeavor, as far as in us lies, to allay an excitement, which of all others, that ever visited this devoted country, has been thus far the most ominous and disastrous in its aspect and features.

In pursuing this subject, we shall endeavor to spare the feelings of all whose sensibilities are worth sparing; and, to use a somewhat hacknied quotation from Shakespeare, we shall not

"Set down aught in malice."

Previous to the assembling of the Antimasonic Convention in this town, we had determined not to have any thing to do with the conflict; and, had that assemblage never been convened, the words we now write, and the sentiments we now avow, never would have been given to the public. The excitement, we looked upon as a matter of controversy between the Mason and his opponent, and we have thanked God, if our belief had not been disappointed, and we had not discovered, that it was of a widely different nature. But, unhappily, the affair, is of an opposite complexion, and let it but gain an ascendancy, and no small proportion of our most virtuous and respectable population, will be immediately proscribed—their effects and estates forfeited, and in the end, their bodies, may be given to unhallowed immolation, to appease antimasonic vengeance. This prediction, is not the emission of a disordered brain or a sickly fancy—it is based on the acts of the Antimasonic Convention, and is made after mature deliberation, and a just estimate of the conduct of that misguided body. We do not speak at random, and if any one should gainsay our predictions, let him look at the resolutions which were unanimously, and madly adopted, and then say, if our predictions, are the emanations of a disordered brain.

In solemn conclave—if indeed there could be any thing like solemnity, in the doings of a mad assembly—the convention adopted, unanimously the following proscriptive resolution:

"Resolved, That it be recommended by this Convention, to the people of this State, and particularly to our antimasonic brethren, not to support, by their suffrages hereafter, any person or persons, belonging to, or in fellowship with, the masonic fraternity, either for a State or town office."

Here then the war of proscription and extermination is commenced, and in its ravages, and marches, it is not only to assail, proscribe and cut off the masonic fraternity from the circles of society, but it is to attack, and proscribe, all men who have the temerity, to be friendly to their best and warmest friends, if those friends happen to be members of the Masonic Institution! The man who shall dare to believe that a Mason is an honest man, entitled to his respect and good will, is to be denounced as an unworthy member of society, and the people of this State are called upon, to withhold from him their countenance, suffrages, patronage and protection. In the history of the dark and proscriptive acts of the leaders of the French Revolution, there is nothing to be found, that can bear to this the remotest parallel! And has it come to this that a body of men, some of them honest, yet misguided, and some of them but little better than the common depredators on the public highway, shall meet in conclave, and recommend to the good people of this State, the commencement of a proscriptive war against citizens who are guilty of no other crime, than that of honestly expressing their opinions, or of maintaining for their friends an honorable attachment and respect.

But the evil does not end here; the war is to be carried still further;—the father is to array himself against his son, and the son against his father; and the wife is to array herself against her husband. All the near, and dear, and tender relations of life, are to be broken up and violated, to appease antimasonic fanaticism, and the deep damnation of the deed is to go unpunished and unwhipped of justice.

Let the spirit of the proscriptive resolution, which we have noticed, be infused through the public mind, and we shall soon witness a scene of desolation—of butchery, of blood, of carnage, and of rapine, at the bare contemplation of which, the heart sickens, and the soul revolts. Let the spirit of that resolution, be imbibed by the public mind, and carried into operation, and soon shall we witness a state of things, which should call down the fiery indignation of the most HIGH GOD, and fill our cities, towns, villages, and hamlets with desolation, despair, and their concomitant horrors and evils. For if the spirit of that resolution were to predominate, and antimasonic vengeance should prevail, thrice luckless and hapless, will be that wretched man, who shall have been a member of the masonic institution, and equally dreadful will be the fate of him, who dares to entertain for his friend, the smallest portion of veneration or regard. The whole object of the antimasonic party, is political ascendancy, and let them but once attain it, and let their proscriptive views prevail, and no character, age, or sex, opposed to them, will be safe from violation.

The example of the antimasonic parties in Portugal and Spain, and the cruelties that were heaped on the Carbonari of Italy, furnish us proof, of what would be done, by the antimasonic associations of North America. And yet, with an air of pretended sanctity, we are told by them, that their objects are philanthropic, and that their only aim is to destroy an institution, which they believe to be subversive of the true interests of morality, virtue, and religion. Will an intelligent people, with their eyes wide open, be gulled by the emission of such hypocritical cant and nonsense?

And, who let us ask, are the leaders of this undreamed of excitement? As for those who are engaged in it abroad, we cannot answer for them, but for those who are the leaders of it in our immediate vicinity, we can speak, and that too with truth and justice. We do not speak of the whole party; for we do know, that there among them some good men—we speak simply of the leaders and we can tell the reader who they are! The Chairman of the convention, a silly old dotard, who having been spoiled in the earlier part of his life, by having conferred on him offices which he was not capable of sustaining, and for the discharge of which he was never intended by nature or education, chagrined because the people of this State, permitted him to go into dignified retirement, with the vain hope of riding into popular favor, on the back of some hobby horse, has been silly enough to loan his influence and services, to get up an excitement, which if it prevails, will disfranchise and disgrace some of the nearer relatives of his family. Neither the voice of the people, or the sanctity of justice, or the edicts of reason, or the bonds of friendship, can restrain him in his mad career, for his ambition is involved in the issue, and his passion for office and the bauble of distinction, must be gratified, even at the expense of every ennobling principle.

Aided by individuals—who are bankrupt, in fortune and in fame, and who have within the little period of some twelve revolving moons, heard the indignant rap at their doors and implore the return of the means of which they had been deprived by the duplicity and the double dealing of dignified, and most notable, and most honorable speculative desperadoes—this misguided old man, has been led to believe, that he can produce a revolution in this State, which will place him at the head of the judiciary, and again allow him an opportunity, to render the benches of justice, fit objects for ridicule and contempt.

To carry their unhallowed plans into operation, an orthodox clergyman of a neighboring State has been harnessed to the antimasonic car, and in the fulness of his holy zeal he has made exposures and confessions, which are intended to have an effect on the public mind, and to produce an excitement among families, and the most interesting members of society.

That Clergyman, as holy as he may be, and as sanctified as he may appear to those who are engaged in the war of proscription, by his own declaration and public avowal, stands before his country, and in the presence of his God, an abandoned apostate, and a purjured man!—What an effrontery, which has not been excelled by the acts of the most infatuated, he has had the unparalleled audacity to rise in the presence of the public, and there boast that he has perjured himself—that he has assumed the garb of an apostate—forfeited all claims, to the good will of men of principle and honor—and yet the infatuated and deluded mortal, dares to approach the throne of Mercy and of Grace, and with unclean hands, address the Ruler of the Universe, and beseech the only living and true God, to look in mercy on those of his fellow mortals, who have not like him, proved themselves, unworthy of the smallest of the benedictions of the Most High. Like another Judas, he has not only betrayed those with whom he has been associated, and violated all the obligations of life, but he has like that Judas, who betrayed the Saviour of mankind, betrayed—not his Lord,—but he has committed a kindred crime, and betrayed those friends, who, deceived by his duplicity and cant, extend to him the hand of friendship and of kindness. He is guilty of treason to his friends, and to the society to which he was once attached; and the man, who is treacherous to his friend—who violates his oath, and degrades on the sanctity of the laws of God and man, will be a traitor to his country, when his interest or the lust of ignoble fame, may lead him to acts of desperation. If he were not already unworthy of the contempt of all honourable and all good men, we would unite, in bestowing on him, the curse of HAFER.

"Oh, for a tongue to curse the slave,
Whose treason, like a deadly blight
Comes o'er the council of the brave,
And blasts them in the hour of might!
May life's unblessed cup for him
Be drugg'd with treacheries to the brim
With hopes, that but allured to fly,
With joys that vanish while he sips,
Like dead sea fruits that tempt the eye,
But turn to ashes on the lips.

His COUNTRY'S curse, his children's SHAME,
Outcast of virtue, peace and fame,
May he at last with lips of flame,
On the parch'd desert thirsting die—
While lakes that shine in mockery nigh
Are fading off, untouched, untasted,
Like the glorious hopes he blasted!
And when from earth his spirit flies,
Just Prophet let the damn'd one dwell
Full in the sight of Paradise,
Beholding Heaven, and feeling Hell."

But let the sanctified apostate pass, and receive that honor, which he can collect, in the consciousness of having broken and violated oaths which he says he plighted in the presence of Almighty God.

To cap the climax of madness and folly, those who have been engaged in getting up this unhallowed war of proscription, the better to carry their plans into execution, employed a retailer of masonic scandal and gossip, a citizen of the State of New York, to visit this town, to abuse and insult the most respectable, most virtuous, and most worthy portion of our population. With an effrontery, which was peculiar to the vagrant oration, he had the impudence to take his stand in the public forum! and from that then polluted place, did he issue a tirade of abuse and scurrility at the fame of hundreds of our best citizens; whilst he denounced every faithful and honest mason, as a murderer and a traitor, a foe to the human family, and a friend to every kindred crime, which is registered on the black catalogue of infamy. And all this was done by a man, who had the temerity to confess, that he was guilty of perjury and apostacy. Never was this respectable community more infamously outraged; and yet there are hundreds among us, who quietly submitted to the insult, and without uttering a murmur of disapprobation or reproach, listened to a man, whose sentiments, and principles were abhorrent, and whose doctrines had an immediate tendency to violate every tie of humanity, and to break up families, and to dissolve the marriage vow, and distract and disorganize society. That such an insult was quietly submitted to, is a wonderful fact but for the credit of the reputation of this community, we hope it will never be repeated.

We are not MASONS, we know nothing of the secrets of that order, but we do know that the wisest and best men of the nation and of the age are members of that institution;—many of our warmest, and best, and dearest friends belong to the masonic order, and as we know, that they are incapable of the crimes which have been charged upon them, by irresponsible and vagrant outcasts, we will not see them injured or assailed with impunity.—And we would speak to the people of Rhode Island and, ask them, if they will quietly look on, and see our best citizens abused and proscribed! We ask them if they are prepared to see a few individuals, who are actuated by the worst of motives, attempt to destroy the repose of society; we ask them to make an effort to abrogate the conspiracy in its bud! We appeal to all good men, and ask them, in the most solemn manner, if they will not rise in their majesty, and put an end to this conspiracy, which if permitted to proceed to maturity must eventuate in blood, and all the horrors of civil discord.

Let it not be understood, that we charge every antimasonry, with the entertainment of the unhallowed motive which we ascribe to the few. Nothing of the kind is intended: on the contrary, we are prepared to avow, that there are many good and virtuous men who have enlisted under the antimasonic banner. But they are deluded and deceived; they do not understand the designs of the principles of the proscriptive war, and are; as they suppose, engaged in the work of moral reformation! They are involved in the labyrinth of error; and, we beseech them to pause and reflect and ere it is everlastingly too late, to retire from a conflict, which is calculated to shake the republic to its centre. Let them pause, ere they again listen to the voice of anarchy and treason; and whilst they laud to the skies those who boast of their perjury and apostacy, let them remember that the assassin of the virtuous Kotzebue gloried in his villainy, and that Thistlewood, the head of the Cato-street conspiracy, in his last moments, boasted of his treason; and whilst they remember this, let them say if there is any difference between the man who perjures himself to society and him who perjures himself to the laws of our common country.

The subject, is inexhaustible; but, as we have not further time or space to spare, we must leave it for the moment; and in conclusion, can only implore every good citizen to make an effort to put an end to the proscriptive war, which has already been commenced against all who are not disposed to rally around the standard of antimasonry—another name for persecution, and unnatural and civil discord.—But whilst we do this, let us not in turn persecute the opposer, but follow the advice of Cardinal Woolsey, and

"Still in our right hands carry gentle peace
To silence envious tongues."

The Anniversary of St. John was commemorated at Warren by the New Jerusalem Chapter and the five neighboring Lodges. The religious services by the Rev. Mr. Blanchard and the Rev. Mr. Huse, were appropriate and impressive. The address by Col. Amos H. Hodgman, was a clear and correct view of the leading principles of the Society, and gratified a numerous audience. The table of refreshment was spread by Mr. Balch in a handsome and copious style, where one thing was absent, but there was no deficiency. There was no artificial stimulus. The Music by a select Choir, belonging to Warren, accompanied by instruments, received great and well merited applause, the following Ode was among the pieces performed.

CHARITY.

Blest is the man whose liberal heart
Feels all another's care and pain;
To whom the supplicating eye
Has never raised to ask in vain.

Whose breast expands with gen'rous warmth
A sufferer's woe to seek and feel,
And bleeds in pity o'er the wound
His lib'ral spirit cannot heal.

He spreads his kind supporting arms
To every child of pain and grief,
His secret bounty largely flows
And brings unasked a quick relief.

To gentle offices of love
His presence never late or slow
He views thro' mercy's melting eye,
A brother in a ransom'd foe.

He from the bosom of his God
Shall present peace and joy receive,
And when he kneels before the throne
His contrite soul in mercy lives.

Hushed is the whirlwind's force, THE TEMPEST-BLAST!
Sudden it rose, as suddenly it passed.
Though clouds portentous held their fearful way,
They trace the windings of their little day;
And thus imprint, on time's inconstant shore,
That these have passed as others passed before.
The cloud that casts its shadows, bears its flowers,
And draws from earth her bounteous fruits and flowers.
So moral clouds and tempests oft are seen
To dress our moral soil in lovely green.
The plant that withers at the storm's rude course,
The heart that writhes at persecution's force,
Alike revive with life's elastic spring,
When nature's edicts nature's favors bring.
Thus 'tis ordained; and why should man repine?
His deepest woes his highest joys refine.
The fearful rumbling of volcanic fires,
Or note of proud ambition's fierce desires,
Involves a world in elemental strife,
The spring of natural and social life.
The deep-toned thunder in a summer sky,
The startling bolt that flashes on the eye,
The driving blast that shakes each stately dome,
Each makes more dear the humblest joys of home.
The tempest o'er, man muses on the past,
And owns THE POWER that sent that TEMPEST-BLAST.

Ye fearless friends who dared to raise a hand,
To stay the tempest rushing o'er the land;
Who formed a rampart round a suff'ring friend,
And lent your aid, when it was kind to lend;
Whose grateful acts in grateful hearts shall dwell;
To you I bid affectionate farewell!

Poor, weeping widow, dry your glistening tear,
Still shall you find the hand of kindness near;
Nor, helpless orphan, shall your little cry
Be raised in vain while one true heart is nigh.
To you a kind farewell! Still, in your prayer,
There's one who hopes to be remembered there.

Ye virtuous, silent, patient, suff'ring, brave,
Who nobly strove your HUMBLE ARK to save;
Who, while the tempest raged were good and true;
Take ye my hand, and with it my adieu!
Though met in kindness, and though sad to part,
There's a remembrancer in each warm heart.
When seas shall part us, and when years roll by,
Friends will be there—to faucy's faithful eye.
He's doubly blessed whose friendly acts impart
This deep, enduring passion of the heart,
That shares each joy, gathers each burning tear,
Smooths death's cold pillow, follows his sad bier,
Recounts each living virtue o'er and o'er,
And joys to think him happier than before.
Let no base act, no sacrilegious hand,
Invade the quiet of your social band.
Be high resolves and holier desires
The worthy off'rings at your altars' fires.
The tie that binds in friendship's bright'ning chain
May tempt the hand of violence again;
Still be ye silent, patient, suff'ring, brave;
Still hope the ARK OF CHARITY to save.

FROM THE MIDDLEBURY AMERICAN.

Some of my neighbors Mr. Editor, who are hard pushed by the contradictions, insist that a belief in recent assertions of seceding Masons, is not inconsistent with the supposition of their having been formerly very honest in praising the institution. It is said that the early reformers might as well be accused of dishonesty for renouncing the Church of Rome, in the bosom of which they were educated. The comparison is, I think, peculiarly unhappy for those who have introduced it. Because, unlike these recent "reformers," who have for years approved, and even eulogized the institution,—the early Christians did not denounce all religion as iniquitous, for the corruptions and abuses which had sprung up in many churches—and threaten to exterminate it entirely. Nor did they, as do the new 'reformers,' brand with epithets, or attempt to coerce those who honestly differed from them. There is not much likeness in these two sets of reformers; but so far as the cases are parallel, the comparison, is certainly against the indiscriminating crusade by which it is attempted to set the people against the institution.

It is said, also, that we might as well declare a man dishonest or hypocritical, who should embrace the religion of the gospel, after having been a scoffer, &c.—as to reject the testimony of seceders, because of their gross, palpable contradictions. I do not much approve this kind of comparisons: but it seems to me very easy to show the utter fallacy of the reasoning. If the discrepant statements of seceders extended only to abstract questions—to the utility of Freemasonry—recent evidence might very well have entirely reversed their former decisions. But this is not the case. They testify to things of which any man, whether Christian or Infidel, could not need to mistake. They contradict themselves as to the character of sensible things,—in respect to matters of which we should suppose the eye and ear must be certain and immediate judges—matters, in truth of which antimasons tell us the danger and iniquity are apparent at first blush. Where, then, is the analogy in the two cases? Indeed, how can the party act from the promptings of men, who were half a score of years in discerning the iniquity, of which the feeblest antimasonic patriot is made most alarmingly sensible in the space of one hour? How can they stand up in defence of men, (who will be admitted to know more of Freemasonry than themselves,) who have voluntarily, and when under the influence of no excitement, declared the principles of the institution to be innocent and pure, and based on the precepts of the Gospel?

Suppose, sir, that a picture or any sensible representation should be placed for five, ten, or fifteen years before an individual, and he should be frequent and decided in expressions of admiration for it—should declare that it warmed and elicited the kindlier feelings in his bosom—that it shadowed forth the pure morality of the Scriptures,—and at length should suddenly turn and assert that it was contemptible, and disgusting, and blasphemous: Could any community under the sun, be found sufficiently gullible to swallow all this? It does seem to me that alarm in view of an atrocious outrage upon the liberty and, probably, life of a citizen—with the force and violence of an excitement, which in some places threatens to upturn the foundations of society,—are the causes to which it is most charitably to attribute the very strange declarations of certain seceders.

The general charge of immorality against Freemasonry, has great weight—I am astonished that it has so much—with some of my fellow citizens. I do not wish to draw evidence from the characters of great and good men who were Freemasons of other days, nor from the hundreds of well known pious men of the Fraternity now among us,—but I put it to the sober judgment of my fellow citizens whether they believe the venerable Bishops Griswold and Hedding; of the Protestant and Methodist Episcopal Churches, fellowship a Society whose "ceremonies are blasphemous," and which "trifles with the name of the ever blessed Jehovah?" If candidly weighed; would all the denunciations of unstable minds,* and all the warm productions of warmer heads, justify the belief?—

Perhaps I shall be told that as good and great men have testified that it is grossly wicked. Upon a little examination, I apprehend this will not be found to be exactly so. The Hon. Mr. Coldey, in his renunciation, clears the institution from some of the severer charges made against it—attributing the evils which result from it rather to abuses which may be induced from its secret organization, and to the influence of bad members, who have found too ready admission. The Rev. Joel Parker, in his renunciation, says there are many of the charges made against masons which are not true—such as respects the penalties of their obligations, &c. &c. And Elder Daniel Mason, in his renunciation, says that he cannot declare, as some have, that the Institution is immoral. Taking, now, the whole testimony of those who have seemed desirous of saying all manner of evil against Freemasonry—and how does it look? Who that is practised in blowing hot and cold, even, can believe it; Col. Merriek, Rev. Thomas M. Smith, and some nearer home, I shall pass by for the present. The Rev. Joel Mann, whose renunciation is written with much severity, some time since preached, (and of all places the sacred desk is one from which we may expect neither untruths nor assertions which the minister does not well understand,) that the principles of Masonry are like those of our Holy Religion: and Elder Joshua Bradley, also a distinguished seceder, made the following declarations from the pulpit, respecting Masonry, some two or three years since. 'This is the only system in which different denominations agree to meet, instruct each other, and labor for the happiness of themselves, their families and mankind. The present whirlwind (antimasonic) raised into a storm by disordered minds and excited irritability, may beat against our temple and carry away the rubbish which has been gathered around it, while the wise and the foolish slept together, but can never remove the edifice.'

And these are some of the characters, and this is the testimony, fellow citizens, that demand your belief in the wickedness of Masonic principles! This is a sample of the evidence, bleared and blotted with most unseemly contradictions, upon which you are called to condemn the venerable living and illustrious dead! It is not sufficient to believe in the inutility and unprofitable character of Lodges: gross, daring wickedness is insisted upon, which must necessarily implicate the characters of hundreds of devoted Christians, many of our beloved friends, and in not a few instances our own fathers! Does not common sense revolt from this?

* I mean here only those who have gone great lengths in charging wickedness to Freemasonry. The testimony of many candid seceders falls far short of what the antimasonic papers desire to have believed.

PROGRESS OF ANTINASONRY.—Its progress is downward. Its papers are falling in every direction before the frown of an indignant people. "The Eastern Argus," is numbered with the dead. The following are the Editor's "last words;"

"Easton, June 3, 1830.

TO THE PATRONS OF THE 'ARGUS.'

"In consequence of not receiving the patronage I expected, I have disposed of the establishment of the 'Argus.' This I know will surprise a great number of my subscribers—but when they learn that the support that I received was barely sufficient to defray the expenses and that not a few who interested themselves in the cause before the paper appeared, afterwards cared not a copper what became of it—they will at least allow that I have had good reason for this course. I am the more reconciled to this measure when I consider some of the objects antimasonry has in view. Having early espoused the cause of Gen. Jackson, and believing him to be eminently fitted for the exalted station he now holds, it would ill become me to oppose him merely upon the grounds of his being a Mason. My opinion of the Masonic institution is however unchanged; and although I believe it to be a frivolous and unnecessary order in this age of the world, I feel myself unable to go all lengths with those who 'ride on the whirlwind and and direct the storm.' I have been in favour of putting down the institution, but not carrying on an indiscriminate warfare with all who have been members of it—and it was only after I had embarked in the cause, that I found it grasped too much.

With these few remarks, I take leave of the subject.—To those who have given me their support, before I commenced and afterwards, I tender my thanks—towards those who held out inducements which they never wished me to realize, I harbor no enmity.

S. INNES."

FROM THE CAMDEN JOURNAL.

ANTI-MASONRY, IN SOUTH CAROLINA.—We have just seen a stray paper called the 'Palladium,' published in Morristown, N. J. in which the following wise paragraph appears:

"South Carolina and Georgia are beginning to move in the Antimasonic cause; a writer from the former State, says it is rapidly gaining ground and needs only to be understood to become general," and winds up by the still more sapient remark, that Masonry is a "greater curse than Negro Slavery."

We feel little disposed to call this editor a ninny, but it were wondrous easy to prove the correspondent a knave. Antimasonry in South Carolina! How long is it Mr. Editor, since the introduction of steam engines in the moon?—We wonder whether your correspondent knows how thick the ice was over the mouth of the Amazon, per his last advices, or whether the Hottentots have published a new edition of Lord Chesterfield. The fact is, we don't live upon humbug in South Carolina; and the first fellow that should attempt to set up one of those fool traps, ycleped an Antimasonic newspaper among us, would, in the first place be put into a strait jacket; and if water gruel and copious phlebotomy produced no alleviation of his symptoms, he would be forthwith despatched to the lunatic asylum at Columbia. We are not such dunces in this part of the union, as to suppose any body fit to go at large who froths at the mouth like an Antimason. We would look on it as a clear case of insanity and provide for the unfortunate patient accordingly. Antimasonry forsooth! Of all the gullifications with which this unfortunate age of ours has been bamboozled, this silly business of Antimasonry is the most pre-eminently stupid and unprincipled. We look upon the lobelia and red pepper quackery of Sam Thompson as abundantly more respectable. We dare say there may be well meaning Antimasons, but in our opinion more money might be made by collecting white mice at the same price per sapite. The great body of the concern are ambitious and unprincipled demagogues, who are attempting to ride into notoriety upon the hobby ass of a forced excitement. The truth is there cannot by possibility be any thing like honesty in that portion of them denominated 'seceding masons,' according to their own showing, they are driven into the dilemma either of acknowledging their declarations to be the basest impositions, or the grossest and most abominable perjury that ever went without branding and a clipped ear. Their very disclosures acknowledge the violation of the most solemn oaths, and their utter disregard to the highest obligations. The editor of the New Jersey paper may as well dismiss his hopes of making proselytes in South Carolina, and confine his sentimentality altogether to the "curses of Negro Slavery."

A regular communication of Massachusetts Lodge, will be held on Friday evening next.

DEATHS.

On Monday evening, Edward, only son of Edward A. and Eliza T. Raymond aged 16 months.

On Tuesday evening, Mr. Daniel Dunlap, aged 26.

In Dover, Mrs Relief, wife of Mr. Robert Perkins, aged 44.—Mr. Phillip Emery, aged 28.

In South Berwick, Mrs Sophia, wife of John P. Lord, Esq. aged 42.

In New Bedford, Major John Coggeshall, an officer of the revolution, aged 72.

In Marblehead, Capt. Micahel Boden, aged 28.

In Providence, Wm. Mumford, Esq. 91.

MISCELLANY.

FEMALE STRATAGEM.

Of all stratagems resorted to by female ingenuity to obtain a suitable husband, we know of none so extraordinary as that of the French lady, who gave out that her head resembled a 'Death's Head.' Among the numerous lovers, who, in consequence of the immense wealth she was reputed to possess, aspired to the honor of her hand, in spite of the terrors of her face, there were reckoned no less than 519 reformed rakes, and 200 ruined gamblers. She showed to a person who was in her confidence, twenty-five or thirty letters which she had received from Belgium, written by certain well-known characters, who said that they would never revolt, though she should prove to be the most hideous object in the world. They were disposed to flatter, caress, and wed the plague itself, so they could procure abundance of gold. All the letters she left unanswered; but to a few she was generous enough to order her secretary to return thanks. Her friends were permitted to take a copy of the following:—

'Madam.—Report has doubtless painted you less handsomer than you are; but none, at least, will refuse to admit that your physiognomy is expressive. I should have had the honor of presenting myself before you, and declaring my passion, had not pitiless creditors detained me in the Conciergerie. I must beg you will have the goodness to pay me a visit, to receive the proposition I am so anxious to make. Though you may have shown a little of the coquette, in order to set yourself off to the best advantage, that is not the fault of nature; consequently it can make no kind of difference in my intentions. No aspect can be more hideous in the eyes of a prisoner, than his prison. Bring me liberty, and you will appear charming indeed. If you should favor me with a visit, you will see a young man twenty-five years of age, who has among other advantages, a tolerable person, with a mind proper to meet worldly success. He has moreover the honor to declare his ardent vows. FOLLEVILLE.

'P. S.—Be so good as to request the gaoler of the Conciergerie to lend his parlor for the interview.'

The mind of the young lady did not tend to a union, in consequence of the above invitation; yet her heart was not insensible. In the brilliant circle in which she moved, covered constantly with a mask, she distinguished a young man of noble and interesting countenance, whose mind had been well cultivated. He had a fortune which placed him above interested views. The young man, on his part, was so much charmed with the graces and delicate sentiments the young lady with invisible features displayed in her conversation, that he at length declared all his happiness depended on a union. She did not deny the impression he had made on her heart, nor conceal the pleasure she would feel in acceding to his proposal,—but expressed to him, at the same time, the dread that he would repent on beholding her face which she described to be that of death in its most terrific form. She begged him to beware of rashness, and consider well, whether he could bear the disappointment he might incur.

'Well, well,' said the young man, 'accept my hand, and never unmask but to the eye of your husband.' 'I consent,' replied she; 'I shall not survive the appearance of affright and disgust, and perhaps contempt, you may feel after marriage.' 'I will not shrink from the proof; it is your heart, and not your figure, that I love.' 'In eight days,' said the lady, 'you shall be satisfied.' They prepared for the marriage, and notwithstanding the refusal of the generously young man to accept a million in bank bills, she settled all her property on him. 'If you have not courage enough to suffer,' said she, 'for your companion, I shall at least be consoled by the reflection, that I have enriched him whom I love, and he will perhaps drop a tear to my memory.' Returning from the altar, she threw herself on her knees before her spouse and placed her hand on her mask.—What a situation for the husband! His heart palpitated, his face turned pale, the mask fell, and he beheld an angel of beauty! She then exclaimed affectionately, you have not deserved deformity—you merit the love of beauty! The happy couple left Paris the next day for Livonia, where the great property of the lady was situated.

SUICIDE.

The victims of this species of murder have lately multiplied to a frightful extent in our country. More persons have, within the last few months, taken themselves off the stage of life than have ever perished by any similar means, within thrice the same measure of time, at any antecedent period. To trace the causes of all these cases of self-destruction is not in the power of living mortals; but some secrets have been revealed which disclose the real or pretended reasons why some of the victims of self immolation conspired against their own temporal existence. One we hear, has a family consisting of a wife and six children, which he cannot respectably support, and off he travels to the other world, and leaves them to get their own living or starve. Another has swallowed his doses of aqua vitæ until, in a fit of mania a potu, with a razor he divides an artery and bleeds to death. A third has lost his money at play, and being beggared in purse and resources, he pops out his brains and rushes into the other world in a hurry to try his fortunes there. A fourth receives an insult, and shoots half of his head away in revenge. A fifth gets in love, and being disappointed in getting another to love him, gets out of the difficulty as he imagines, by taking opium and gets into eternity—he knows not how. Now all these cases are evidences of human weakness, which we are compelled to pity, and which at the same time we must pointedly condemn. If a man is poor, let him labor to be richer, for going out of the world in a hurry will not make his family wealthier or himself more happy. If insulted, let him bear it like a man. If he loses money at play, or his senses by drink, let him abstain from both, and get his living when he gets his reason, by sober and honest industry. If he be distressed on account of some fair damsel's frown, let him turn his attention to some other bright object that will smile upon him. It is better to live as long and as well as we can, and it is madness and cowardice to run away from life as many do. For,

'When all the blandishments of life are gone,
The coward sneaks to death, the brave live on.'

Suicide is a bad remedy for a bad disease, and is both weak and wicked. If those who have taken themselves off in this way were allowed to return, we fancy they would be more careful how they threw away their lives; and that they would prefer lingering longer here, rather than go to the grave and rot, while their spirit perhaps found no better resting place in the eternal than in the temporal world.—R. I. Patriot.

A SUTTEE.

After my arrival it was reported to me that a suttee was in preparation. I therefore resolved to strive all in my power to dissuade the wretched woman from destruction. The task was attended with more difficulty than I had anticipated, burn she would, and no one should prevent her; these were the words she uttered over and over again. The Brahmins never quitted the woman's side, and I began to despair of success. At length she was left alone for a few minutes, and then I poured out all my arguments against the intended immolation. The terrors of suffocation, the horrors of fire, had no effect; while the enormity and the wickedness of the act was ridiculed, for she had been informed by her priests that the deed was the most praiseworthy, the most virtuous, and consequently the most acceptable to her God; still I persevered, and the woman seemed to waver a little. 'Am I not now looked upon as a goddess,' she said, 'and in consequence above them all?'—Pride was now found predominant, and, for the sake of enjoying an imaginary superiority for a few moments, the deluded creature was willing to reduce her body to ashes, to be scattered before the wind. My plan was now formed; and when the Brahmins waited upon me to inquire whether I intended by force to prevent the burning of the widow, I first inquired what the Shaster said upon the subject. They could not say that the law commanded a widow to burn, but that it declared it to be praiseworthy so to do. Upon this the wily Brahmins, for the preservation of their own lives from remote danger by the procurement of their wives, have upheld the practice. They awaited my decision. I inquired how many Brahmins were necessary to follow the widow to the pile.—They answered, one or two, attended by the widow's relations. 'I shall not prevent her burning,' said I, 'unless she herself declines doing so, no force shall be used against her on my part, nor shall any be suffered on your side, and I intend to be present.' The Brahmins considered the day their own, and led forth the victim, who, finding herself attended by only two Brahmins and one relation, an old woman, (the crowd having by my orders dispersed,) soon began to change her tone. She was no longer the worshipped goddess of the multitude, no longer the queen of the rabble, and in consequence refused to burn, and the priests in anger turned away, leaving the agitated woman at my feet, shedding tears of gratitude, for she felt assured that my interference had rescued her from the flames. How simple than is the prevention. I suffered no drums and trumpets to drown reflection, nor holy beggars to fall down and kiss the hem of the widow's garment.—Asiatic Jour.

CASPER KARLINSKI.

A POLISH ANECDOTE.

In the course of the sanguinary war which was carried on between the Swedes and Poles, in the sixteenth century, respecting the rights of Sigismund III. the King of Poland, to the throne of Sweden, the Swedish usurper prepared to invade Poland with the whole force of his kingdom. Sigismund, unable to make head in the field against the overwhelming superiority of the enemy, contented himself with reinforcing the garrisons of his frontier towns and placing in the chief command a warrior of approved courage and fidelity.

Among others, the King selected Casper Karlinski, as one on whom he could safely rely in the emergencies of his situation. He was a nobleman then advanced in years, and renowned among his countrymen, not so much for his wealth or his rank, as for the dauntless valor he had displayed in the service of his native land. He willingly obeyed the commands of his sovereign, and repaired immediately to the fortress of Oliftzyn, the post assigned to him.

A formidable body soon made their appearance before Oliftzyn, and a threatening summons was sent to Karlinski. His answer was, 'I will obey no orders but those of my king, and will keep the faith I have pledged to him untarnished until death.' The enemy changed the mode of their attack, and made him the most splendid offers—a seat in the senate, the highest rank and boundless possessions, if he would surrender Oliftzyn and join their party. Karlinski treated their bribes even with greater scorn than their threats. The hostile leaders set before him the disproportion of the contending forces—the weakness of his side, and the consequent dangers to which he exposed himself by his obstinacy. Karlinski saw only the peril of his country, and remained equally inflexible. Convinced at last of his unbending integrity, and confident of victory, the enemy made a furious attack upon the castle; but through the strength of the walls, the bravery of the besieged, and still more the skill of their gallant commander, they were repulsed with great slaughter.

The foe was discouraged by this defeat, but still determined on the attempt to gain by a stratagem what negotiation and force had alike failed in procuring for them. Every disposition was therefore made, as if they intended another assault. The gallant Karlinski

—on the heights arrayed

His trusty warriors, few, but undismayed.

And relying on his good cause, and the bravery of his followers, excited as it was by their recent victory, looked fearlessly on the result of the approaching conflict. The adversary approached still nearer and nearer; they were already within gun shot of the castle walls, when the front rank unfolded, and an armed man, leading a woman by the hand with a child in her arms, came forward. The besieged gazed on one another in astonishment at the unexpected appearance; and Karlinski, as if spell-bound, remained looking on it for some time in mute amazement—all on a sudden he uttered a loud cry, and exclaimed, 'Gracious heaven! it is my son! my Sigismund!' and fell motionless on the ramparts.

It was indeed his son, whom the enemy at the instigation of a friend, had surprised with his nurse and carried away; hoping through this expedient to be able to advance to the castle wall without being exposed to the fire of the ramparts.

Their cunning was at first successful. The besieged, from the love of their adored commander, dared not discharge a single cannon, and the Swedes approached undisturbed, almost to the foot of the walls, and prepared to scale them. Karlinski at this moment recovered his senses, but it was only to suffer greater anguish. He saw the danger, but no means of averting it without a sacrifice too dreadful to think of. 'I have lost,' he cried out in a despairing voice, 'seven brave sons have I lost in battle for my country, and is this last sacrifice required of me.' A death like silence ensued, broken only by the cries of the child, whose features could now be distinctly traced, as he was still carried in the advance of the onward moving ranks. Karlinski at last seemed inspired with superhuman strength—he snatched the lighted brand from one of the gunners—'Heavens! (he cried,) I was a Pole before I was a father,' and with his own hand discharged the gun which was to be a signal for a general volley. A tremendous fire was immediately poured from every battlement; it swept away to death Karlinski's infant, and great multitudes of the enemy; the besieged made a vigorous sally. Karlinski was completely victorious.

ILLUSTRIOUS SHOEMAKERS.—Gifford and Drew were both shoemakers; so was Holcroft, whose dramatic works have done him so much honor.—Robert Bloomfield was a shoemaker when he wrote his 'Farmer's Boy.' Doct. William Carey, Professor of Sanscrit and Bengalee, in the college of Fort William, Calcutta, was in early life a shoemaker. So is Mr. John Stothers, the author of the 'Poor Man's Sabbath,' the 'Peasant's Death,' and other poems. Roger Sherman of Connecticut, one of the ablest signers of American Independence, was also a shoemaker. He worked at his trade till he was twenty one years of age, at Newton, near Boston, from whence he migrated to Connecticut; and by assiduity in civil employments arose gradually to be a Judge, a Legislator, and an eminent Statesman. Thus setting at nought the old maxim—Ne sutor ultra crepidam.

A SAILORS EPITAPH.—The child of the ocean; I was cradled in its tumbling billows; the nestling of the tempest; the winters storms howled my lullaby; educated with the sons of Neptune; the gun deck was my school room, and the masts and yards my gymnasium poles, trained to deeds of dreadful daring, my countrys command was the fiat of justice; the bugle and the battle cry were the summons of glory—and victory the height of my ambition but strained by hard service; decayed, and somewhat worn eaten, I have taken my last departure; arrived safe in the last harbor—and moored head and stern for the last time, forever; here I shall remain, under the care of an able ship's husband, till the resurrection gun disturbs my long quiet, and the trumpet of heaven calls all hands to quarters.

AN AEORIGINAL JUSTICE.—The following is handed down as a true copy of a warrant, issued by an Indian Magistrate:—

"You, you big Constable, quick you catchum Jeremiah Officow, strong you holdum, safe you bringum afore me.

THOMAS WABAN, Justice Peace.

When Waban became superannuated, a younger Magistrate was appointed to succeed him. Cherishing that respect for age and long experience, for which the Indians are remarkable, the new officer awaited on the old one for advice. Having stated a variety of cases and received satisfactory answers, he at length proposed the following—'When the Indians get drunk, and quarrel and fight, and act like the devil, what you do den?' 'Hah! tie um all up, and whip um plaintiff, whip um fendant and whip um witness.'

In one of the early editions of Morse's Geography, it is stated that 'Albany contains 2,000 houses and 10,000 inhabitants, all standing with their gable ends to the street.'

SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

HEAT DISCOVERED IN THE MOON'S RAYS.—The following interesting experiment was made by Dr. Howard by means of a differential thermometer of his own invention:—'Having blackened the upper ball of my differential thermometer, I placed it in the focus of a thirteenth inch reflecting mirror, which was opposed to the light of a bright full moon. The liquid began immediately to sink, and in half a minute was depressed 8 degrees, where it became stationary. On placing a screen between the mirror and the moon, it rose again to the same level, and was again depressed on removing the obstacle.' This experiment was repeated several times in the presence of some of Dr. H.'s friends and always with the same result.

DANCING, is a most salutary exercise. By its mechanical effects on the body, it inspires the mind with cheerfulness. The music which accompanies it has effects upon the body as well as upon the mind. It is addressed through the avenue of the ears to the brain, the common centre of life and motion, whence its oscillations are communicated to every part of the system, imparting to each that equable and uniform vigor and action upon which the healthy state of all the functions depends. By the power of music, many remarkable cures, particularly of those disorders which are much connected with the nervous system, are known to have been performed. Dancing should not be used more than once or twice a month; nor should it ever be continued till weariness comes on; nor should the dancer too soon encounter the cold air.—Journal of Health.

CLOTHING.—The only kind of dress that can afford the protection required by the temperature to which high northern climes are liable is woollen. Nor will it be of much avail that woollen be worn, unless so much of it be worn, and if it be so worn, as effectually to keep out the cold. Those who would receive the advantage which the wearing of woollen is capable of affording must wear it next the skin; for it is in this situation only that its health-preserving power can be felt. The great advantages of woollen cloth are briefly these, the readiness with which it allows the escape of the matter of perspiration through its texture; its power of preserving the sensation of warmth to the skin under all circumstances; the difficulty there is in making it thoroughly wet; slowness with which it conducts heat; the softness, lightness, and pliancy of its texture. Cotton cloth, though it differs but little from linen, approaches nearer to the nature of woollen, and, on that account must be esteemed as the next best substance of which clothing may be made. Silk is the next in point of excellence, but is very inferior to cotton in every respect. Linen possesses the contrary of most of the properties enumerated as excellencies in woollen. It retains the matter of perspiration in its texture, and speedily becomes imbued with it; it gives an unpleasant sensation of cold to the skin; it is very readily saturated with moisture, and it conducts heat too rapidly. It is indeed, the worst of all substances in use, being the least qualified to answer the purpose of clothing.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JULY 24, 1830.

SAMUEL G. ANDERTON.

We learn that this "lying valet;" this tool of the unprincipled leaders of a villainous faction, is returned to the city; and is now probably prepared to swear to any new lie, that his masters may think proper to dictate, or deem important to promote the interests of their unholy cause. They will be cautious, however, not to introduce another "Belfast murder." Another fabrication of that character would sink them and their cause, if such a thing be possible, yet deeper in infamy. It has already been proved, to the satisfaction of every honest and unprejudiced mind, that there is not the shadow of truth in any part of the story, so far as it concerns the murder of Miller, to which Samuel G. Anderton has made oath. The administering of the oath was extrajudicial and illegal. Anderton, therefore, escapes the punishment due to the perjured. We do not believe that the man has any sense of moral obligation, or that he believes in a future accountability. If he were not void of every principle of honor; of every moral virtue, he could not have been induced to make solemn oath to a statement so palpably and totally false, as is that, to which his name is attached. Every effort has been made by his antimasonic friends in this city, to sustain his fabulous story. As yet they have not been able to give to it the shadow of probability. It is said by an obscure scurrilous antimasonic print, that Anderton still persists in declaring his statement to be true. This is not the fact. Anderton, uninfluenced and unbiassed by others, would either directly admit its falsity; or so far contradict his former statements, as to amount to such admission. We do not believe that on his arrival at Marblehead, and before his statement was read to him on board the vessel, he could have repeated correctly or substantially, one twentieth part of his own infamous tale. Of this his antimasonic friends seem to have been fully aware; and, as will be seen from the following, they have taken unusual care that, he should not involve them in further difficulty.

To the Editor of the Masonic Mirror.

The story of Samuel G. Anderton, published last March, is probably recollected by most people in Boston, as well as the contrary statements, since published. Said Anderton has been absent on a fishing voyage to the Grand Banks, nearly four months. The writer of this received intelligence last Tuesday, (13th inst) that the vessel in which he sailed, had arrived at Marblehead that morning; and having occasion to attend to the vessel's affairs; such as making her fish, &c. I went immediately to Marblehead. The vessel lay off in the harbor. I procured a boy to set me on board. On going down into the cabin, I was some little surprised to find two strangers, gentlemen to appearance, sitting there; Anderton between them. One of the gentlemen, (Dr. Porter, of Boston,) was reading to Anderton the most prominent parts of his own deposition; and, as he read, commented on the parts which he said were confirmed by a deposition they had procured in Boston, from Mrs. Bell.

Perceiving that the gentleman's object was to put Anderton on his guard, and to fix his story so firmly on his mind that he should not or could not deviate from it, "right or wrong," I observed to Mr. Anderton that I thought he had already told lies enough, and that he had better begin to tell the truth; that on board fishing vessels was an improper place to make or unmake masons, and that I did not wish any more of it there; that he (Anderton) had told me and other gentlemen, equally respectable as any present, that a person who went up to testify to his good character, when he gave his deposition before the 'No. Pub. and J. of the Peace, told that, in regard to his character, which was a d—d lie. Anderton replied that he sometimes drank too much spirit. Upon which Dr. Porter offered to explain what Anderton meant by his observation. I told him that he must not tell me that Anderton did not say so; for he, Porter, knew nothing about it. The other gentleman present, a stranger to me, said he wished to ask Mr. Anderton some questions; if he was not interfering with my business. The Doctor said they would leave the vessel, if I considered them as intruding. I told them I considered the place improper for their business, and that they had better try some other business, than managing such weak and miserable cheats to make out or support any cause; but that I had no objections to his asking any questions he pleased. He then proceeded to ask Anderton, if he recollected the kind of dress Miller had on at the time he was murdered; whether he had on a blue silk vest?—Did not remember. If he recollected any circumstances in regard to his funeral? He did not. He left Belfast early the next morning; and heard nothing more in regard to him or his funeral. The gentleman appearing to be satisfied, I asked him to tell me how it was possible that he could be taken a prisoner of war, carried into Chatham, placed on board the prison-ships, get clear, go to Ireland, return to Chatham, be exchanged as prisoner of war, return in the cartel with the men who were taken prisoners with him, and not be missed by them? To which he made no direct reply. I then asked him the number of days sail from Chatham in England, to Belfast? He said it was five smart days sail. How did you go? In a sloop. What was her name? Did not know. The Captain's name? Did not know. I observed that his answers were as satisfactory as I expected they would be; and that I thought he must alter some few of his dates, in order to make his story hang together; that there were other people who remembered as well the transactions of 1813, as he could. Dr. Porter then asked him if he had ever had any conversation with Joab Hunt of Poston, before his death, in relation to Morgan's book; and observed that he had understood that Hunt said Morgan's book was too true. Anderton said he never had. I told him that I wished him to say distinctly, whether he ever had any conversation with Mr. Hunt, at any time, or under any circumstances, in regard to Masonry, in any shape or nature, as there had been insinuations thrown out, regarding the manner of his death? I further remarked that I was personally and intimately acquainted with some of the members of the Lodge to which he belonged; that they were present at the time of his death, and that I wished him to tell the truth in this case, if he ever intended to tell it again in the course of his life. He then replied, that he never had, in the course of his life time, any talk with Mr. Hunt in regard to Morgan's book, or about Masonry. I asked him if he knew anything about Masonry in the United States? He said he did not; never was in a Lodge in America in his life. Dr. Porter then said every thing went to confirm the murder!—that a Knight Templar was found dead in Milton, about a fortnight after Anderton's disclosure; and that Mrs. Bell's deposition went to confirm Anderton's statement in almost every particular. He however admitted that Masonry had never been productive of any injury to him or to the community in this section of the country. He thought it exercised an undue influence on our elections, and that the votes of the city ought not to be controlled by three or four hundred Masons.

FRIEND TO TRUTH.

The above statement is furnished by a gentleman of character and veracity, and may be relied on as true in every particular. It will be seen that Anderton expressly declares, in the above conversation, that he does not recollect any circumstances in regard to Miller's funeral; that he left Belfast early the next morning; and heard nothing more in regard to him or his funeral. In his affidavit, given the 15th of March last, he solemnly swears—"BEFORE I left Belfast, I heard by common report, that the body was taken up the NEXT DAY, and that a coroner's inquest decided that WILLIAM MILLER was murdered by persons unknown; or something to that effect." Here then are two distinct contradictory lies, direct from the mouth of Anderton.—He has sworn that before he left Belfast, he heard that the body was taken up the next day, thus clearly intimating that he did not leave Belfast until some days after the murder. He now declares that he left "early the next morning." He has also sworn that he "heard by common report," that a "coroner's inquest decid- ed" that "Miller was murdered by persons unknown." He now declares that he heard nothing more in regard to Miller or his funeral! The "Investigating Committee" say that Anderton "naturally possesses a great memory!" If this were true, he would make a better liar. We have promised to prove that Anderton was not in Belfast, at the time time he swears he was there. In due time we will redeem this promise.

This affair, through all its gradations, has been characterized by a degree of moral depravity; a recklessness of consequences, without a parallel in the history of profligacy and wickedness. Lying, duplicity and deception have been the principal agents employed to sustain it.—The original tale was conceived in corruption, and it has been nurtured on the baser passions of the human heart.—It was a lie of the blackest hue; and a thousand lies of the same damning shade, have been uttered in its support.—Subornation of perjury; in a moral, if not in a legal sense; seems to have been regarded as an obstacle of minor consideration—one, in the opinions of certain men, requiring no uncommon effort to surmount. The basest impositions have been practised on the ignorant and the credulous.—The vilest deceptions have been used, by the most unprincipled of men, to give to the infamous fabrication, even the shadow of credibility. Some of the actors in this disgraceful farce, seem to evince a disposition, not merely to hazard their own characters, but to sacrifice the salvation of others, on the attainment of their unhallowed object.—But, thank heaven, though they have succeeded in blasting what little of reputation they might previously have claimed for themselves, they have not been permitted to carry their villainous purposes to the extent they anticipated and desired.

At a recent antimasonic convention, called for the purpose of nominating State officers, in Vermont, the Hon. HEMAN ALLEN was put in nomination for Governor.—Mr. Allen has declined the intended honor. If we recollect right, Mr. A. was nominated the last year for the same office, by the antimasonic party, and then declined. It is very evident that no honorable man will consent to receive the support of such a foul clan, for any office. It is regarded as a disgrace for any gentleman to be held up before the community as an antimasonic candidate for office; nor do we recollect of a single instance wherein a gentleman of integrity and honor, has consented that his name should be given to the people as a candidate for any office, by that party. When the names of such have been used, it has been done without authority, and they have been immediately withdrawn.

When at Hartford the last week, we heard the following anecdote; which we publish as illustrative of the general character of the men engaged in the proscriptive cause of antimasonry.—Mr. B—, owned land bordering on a road considerably out of repair. Mr. C. and others, who were also owners of land adjoining, proposed an assessment on all the proprietors of land, for the purpose of repairing the road. Mr. D. was appointed to collect the amount assessed; and after having received the assessment from all the others, he called on Mr. B. and requested the payment of one dollar, as his proportion. "I can't afford to pay this ere," says Mr. B.—"I'm poor, and it aint but a few months since I paid $25 to support this ere antimasonic paper here; and now to-day I'm called on to pay $20 more, and I can't afford to pay that are assessment!" He did not pay it. Here is a fellow that readily contributes $45 to the support of a scurrilous antimasonic print, to abuse and vilify his neighbors, and scandalize his native place, but will not pay one dollar towards an improvement that would probably enhance the value of his own property ten times that amount! He knew his neighbors would have the road repaired, though he did not contribute one cent. In this way he could spunge them out of a dollar, for the benefit of antimasonry! We give this as a single instance of antimasonic honesty.—We had it from one of the party concerned.

EDWARD GIDDINS.

In our last it was stated that this infidel wretch ran away from Lockport, during the recent session of the court at that place. He was highly displeased with the appointment of VICTORY BIRDSEYE, Esq. as Special Counsel; and was apprehensive that his own liberty might be curtailed, if he remained longer within the jurisdiction of the State. Officers were immediately despatched in pursuit of him. We have not heard the result.

A short time since, the antimasonic prints in this city declared that, Giddins 'was known and acknowledged to be a gentleman of a fair character.' We at that time gave a true sketch of his character. We proved him to be the most infamous wretch that ever escaped the gallows. He has been regarded as the most prominent, and certainly has been the most active antimason in the country. He set himself up for the leader of the party, and has boldly trumpeted, through almanacks and newspapers, the story of his own infamy. If his own tale be true, he is one of the most heartless, cold blooded villains in existence. If Morgan have been murdered, it is our firm belief that Edward Giddins is the wretch who murdered him. Morgan can be traced to the time he was in Giddins' possession, and no farther. Giddins pretends not to know how he was subsequently disposed of. It was probably through fear that he might be compelled to know something more than he pretends, relative to this last particular, or that it might be proved that he knows more than is convenient for him to remember, that induced him to abscond. It has long been a matter of astonishment to every intelligent man in the country, who has watched the progress of the excitement, that Giddins should be permitted to escape the punishment due to his acknowledged crimes. But the recent developments which have taken place relative to the proceedings of the late Special Counsel, fully explain the matter. How best to persecute and brand with infamy the members of the Masonic Institution, seems to have been an enquiry of paramount importance with the managers of antimasonry. It was enough to shield him from punishment, that the greatest villain, the most guilty wretch engaged in the alleged abduction and murder, had become an antimason! Well might an indignant public complain that 'Morgan's ghost walked unavenged among us,' so long as Giddins, with all his guilt upon him, was permitted to stalk forth, with impunity, at noon day, and without even a show of repentance, to publish his deeds to the world, and to profit by his own depravity! A wretch who has been permitted to go 'unwipt of justice,' and to enrich himself by retailing the story of his own infamy—an infamous scoundrel who stands self convicted of crimes that should damn him to infamy and the gallows. We doubt not that the officers of justice will overtake him, and that he will finally receive the reward of his villany.

S. D. GREENE.—The notorious David C. Miller, editor of the Batavia "Republican Advocate," late copartner of William Morgan; and an acknowledged Infidel, has very charitably taken the decrepit character of his friend Greene, into keeping. In his attempts to cover the stains which blacken the moral character of his friend, he has only rendered them more visible. True, he has published a certificate showing that Greene did not "feloniously steal, take and drive away" Robert Leavitt's "sheep," or "Black Buck;" as it appears he was charged with having done. Therefore, whatever credit a man may derive from having it publicly testified that he has not stolen a sheep, Mr. Greene is entitled to. Not a single charge which has heretofore been preferred against Greene, has been disproved. And as enough has already been said, to put honest people on their guard against his hypocritical schemes, and to nullify whatever influence his false professions may heretofore have given him, we do not consider ourselves called on, at this time, to pursue the subject.

ALABAMA.—A correspondent informs us that although a desperate attempt has been made by a few discarded politicians, to introduce and sustain the antimasonic hydra in some sections of the State of Alabama, the cause of Masonry was never more prosperous. 'At the celebration of St. John's day in 1829, the antis prophesied that we should never be able again, (in their own language) to muster such a company. But, to their great disappointment, at our last celebration, we mustered three times the number that we ever had at any previous celebration. Our Lodges were never more flourishing, nor our brethren in better spirits. The people are with us; and antimasonry cannot resist the force of public opinion.'

SIBYLLINE LEAVES.—It will be seen that the present number completes the series of papers, which have enriched the pages of the Mirror for sometime past, under the title of 'Sibylline Leaves.' We would recommend the writers 'VALEDICTORY' to the attention of our readers; and at the same time we would assure them, (and we are enabled to do so from personal knowledge of the author,) that the sentiments therein contained, are not the sentiments of cold formality: they emanate from a heart glowing with love for our venerable Institution: they come from one of the warmest and best friends & advocates of the principles of Freemasonry: one of the earliest and ablest defenders of our calumniated and persecuted Order. This is not said by way of compliment to the author; for, being wholly unknown to our readers, and too far advanced in life to become an aspirant for literary fame, he can neither be elated by our praise nor depressed by our censure. But we say it, that our readers may know that the Leaves are from the pen of a brother of experience, who is firmly devoted to the interests of the Institution. Coming from such a source, and possessing merit of no ordinary cast, they claim the consideration of the brotherhood. We took an early opportunity to bespeak for them an attentive perusal; and we have no hesitation in saying that, the anticipations of all who have given them such perusal, have been more than realized. We regard them, collectively considered, as not inferior to any equal number of satirical poems, that have fallen under our observation. Entertaining this favorable opinion of them, we are desirous that they should appear in a more durable and convenient form. To this end, we propose to publish them in a separate volume. They will probably make about 150 or 200 pages. They will be printed on good paper and new type, neatly half bound, at $3.00 a dozen—if a sufficient number of copies be subscribed for to defray the expenses of printing. As the price is fixed at the cost, the publishers cannot be at the trouble and expense of disposing of them by the single copy. No subscription can, therefore, be received for a less number than six. We invite the attention of our brethren to this proposition.

WARM WEATHER.—The mercury in the thermometers in this city, for the last seven days, has ranged from 90 to 98! So long a continuance of hot weather is not recollected by the most aged of our citizens. Fine weather for editors! Start an idea, and it melts before you can get it on paper!—Thursday.

PAPER MACHINERY.—A Mr. Haddock, of Hartford, Conn. has invented and patented a machine for the manufacture of paper in sheets, upon the dipping process. This machine is said to be superior to others, inasmuch as "that it can make laid as well as wove paper, as it undergoes all the movements of vatman and coucher, and makes six sheets cap paper at a dip; and it is said to be a saving of a thousand dollars a year—it doing the work of two vats in twelve hours, besides making an article sure to meet a market."

During the late trials at Lockport, one man was sentenced to ten day's imprisonment in the jail of that county, for endeavoring to convey clandestinely, a bottle of ardent spirits, together with a quantity of crackers and cheese, into the jury room, about eleven o'clock at night; and a constable was fined ten dollars for endeavoring to influence the jury to render a verdict of guilty, in the case of Wright and Brown.

The editor of the Middlebury, Vt. American, in speaking of the recent antimasonic convention held in that State, has the following sensible remark:—'We don't expect that the Convention were particularly desirous of consulting our views; if they had been, we should have advised them to dismiss and send home, those members that profess to be Ministers of the Gospel. To us it seems a gross departure from duty, for men who have been set apart to publish the peaceful religion of the Cross—for men who confess that they have need of more devotion and more faithfulness to their charge, so that at the Last Great Day the blood of souls be not found upon their skirts,—to be not only urging forward a political party, but to be found enrolling their names for political preferment. And we are free to say, that while clergymen greatly lessen their reputation and usefulness by standing in such an attitude, the Convention is not one whit the more entitled to a freeman's confidence, because of the connection of these Reverend gentlemen with it.'

ANTIMASONRY.—This is a subject with which we have had little to do or to say—considering that some good men were deluded by it, but satisfied that it was only a new hobby of our old political enemies, and that it would fall to pieces by its own weight.

Some persons little known had a meeting last week in this city, and the following is one of the resolutions adopted, which throws off the cloak at once.

Resolved, That it is nothing more than a necessary measure of self-defence that Antimasons should combine their political influence to wrest from the masonic monopolists the avenues to the various civil and political offices in the Union, and the administration of the affairs of the states, and the nation, in all their departments; in order that places of honor and trust might be distributed, not to uphold a dangerous selfish Society, but to promote the common welfare, and to subserve the best interests of the whole people."—N. Y. Enq.

SALEM MURDER.—The Patriot of Wednesday, furnishes the following particulars of the preparations making for the trial of the murderers of Mr. White:—"The Grand Jury were yesterday impanelled under an impressive charge from Chief Justice Parker. He especially alluded to the crime, which was to come under their consideration, relative to an assassination which had occurred in the middle of the peaceable town, in which the court was then assembled. He said that the fact had become public and notorious, and that the heart of a sleeping citizen had been pierced—his sleep converted to death—this fact had caused a vibration to the feelings of the whole community. He cautioned the Grand Jurors not to be awayed by public sentiment on the occasion, but to act impartially between the Commonwealth and whatever might be accused on the occasion. In relation to the law, it was laid down, that it was not necessary for a person to be present at the commission of a murder—if he was knowing to the intent, was aiding and assisting at the time, by watching against a surprise, each alike was a murderer.

It was not necessary that the person should be on the spot. The ancient law of accessories before the fact was very embarrassing. Whether the statue had done away the common law in this particular would be well considered by the court; but the principle seemed to be laid down that those aiding and abetting were principals, if they knew that the act was to be done and assisted in the doing thereof.

The charge was bold, impartial and free, mingling mercy and justice in the chalice administered to the lips of supposed criminals. He especially cautioned the Jurors against preconceived opinions, and warned them to act according to the "law and evidence" before them, and to take no other as their guide.

Prayers were sent to the Throne of Grace by the Rev. Mr. Cleveland, in an impressive manner, peculiarly adapted to the interesting occasion then before the court."

The trial will probably commence early in the ensuing week.

THE WREATH.

AULD LANG SYNE.

SHALL Independence be forgot
And never brought to mine?
Shall Independence be forgot,
When auld lang syne?
To auld lang syne, my fri'ns,
To auld lang syne,
We'll pour a generous bumper still
To auld lang syne.

No! long as Freedom's glory wreath
With Plenty's crown shall twine,
Our sons shall hail with joyous breath
The deeds o' lang syne.
To, &c.

Broad o'er our hills, in golden light,
The sacred dawn shall shine,
And thousand voices loud unite
In praise o' lang syne.
To, &c.

Though faint and few the warrior sires
Who ranged in battle line,
Their hearts shall kindle still their fires
With thoughts o' lang syne.
To, &c.

Then never be this day forgot,
A shout of nine times nine.
Ring with the last and loudest shot
To auld lang syne.
To, &c.

THE QUILTING.

The day is set the ladies met,
And at the frame are seated;
In order plac'd they work in haste,
To get the quilt compleated,
While fingers fly their tongues they ply,
And animate their labors,
By counting beaux, discussing clothes,
Or talking of their neighbors.

"Dear, what a pretty frock you've on!"
"I'm very glad you like it,"
"I'm told that Miss Micomicon
Don't speak to Mr. Micate,"
"I saw Miss Bell the other day,
Young Green's new gig adorning!"
"What keeps your sister Ann away?"
"She went to town this morning."

"Tis time to roll!"—"my needle's broke,"
"So Martin's stock is selling,"
"Louisa's wedding gown's bespoke,"
"Lend me your scissors, Ellen,"
"That match will never come about,"
"Now don't fly in a passion,"
"Hair puffs they say are going out,"
"Yes curls are all the fashion."

The quilt is done, the tea begun—
The beaux are all collecting;
The table's clear'd the music heard—
His partner each selecting.
The merry band, in order stand.
The dance begins with vigor—
And rapid feet the measure beat,
And trip the mazy figure.

Unheeded fly the minutes, by,
Old time himself seems dancing,
Till night's dull eye, is op'd to spy
The steps of morn advancing,
Then closely stow'd to each abode,
The carriages go tilting;
And many a dream has for its theme,
The pleasures of the quilting.

TIME'S CHANGES.

ISAW her once—so freshly fair
That like a blossom just unfolding,
She open'd to Life's cloudless air,
And Nature joy'd to view its moulding;
Her smile, it haunts my memory yet—
Her cheek's fine hue divinely glowing—
Her rosebud mouth—her eyes of jet—
Around on all her light bestowing;
Oh! who could look on such a form,
So nobly free, so softly tender,
And darkly dream that earthly storm
Should dim such sweet, delicious splendor?
For in her mien, and in her face,
And in her young steps fairy lightness,
Nought could the raptur'd gazer trace
But Beauty's glow and pleasure's brightness.

I saw her twice—an altered charm—
But still of magic richest, rarest,
Than girlhood's tallisman less warm,
Though yet of earthly sights the fairest:
Upon her breast she held a child,
The very image of its mother;
Which ever to her smiling smiled,
They seemed to live but in each other:
But matron cares or lurking woe,
Her thoughtless, sinless look had banish'd,
And from her cheek the rosy glow
Of girlhood's balmy morn had vanish'd;
Within her eyes, upon her brow,
Lay something softer, fonder, deeper,
As if in dreams some vision'd woe
Had broke the Elysium of the sleeper.

I saw her thrice—Fate's dark decree
In widow's garment had array'd her;
Yet beautiful she seem'd to be,
As even my reveries portray'd her;
The glow the glance had pass'd away
The sunshine and the sparkling glitter;
Still, though I noted pale decay,
The retrospect was scarcely bitter;
For in their place a calmness dwelt,
Serene, subduing, soothing, holy;
In feeling which the bosom felt
That every louder mirth is folly—
A pensiveness, which is not grief—
A stillness, as of sunset streaming—
A fairy glow on flower and leaf,
Till earth looks like a landscape dreaming.

A last time—and unmoved she lay,
Beyond Life's dim, uncertain river,
A glorious mould of fading clay,
From whence the spark had fled forever.
I gazed—my breast was like to burst—
And, as I thought of years departed,
The years wherein I saw her first,
When she, a girl, was lightsome hearted:
And, when I mus'd on latter days,
As mov'd she in the matron duty,
A happy mother, in the blaze
Of ripen'd hope and sunny beauty—
I felt the chill—I turned aside—
Bleak Desolation's cloud came o'er me—
And Being seem'd a troubled tide,
Whose wrecks in darkness swam before me!

THE WEDDING.

Tears on this blessed morning!—Tears, sweet love!
It ought not thus to be. Why, my light heart
Is like the gladsome, long-imprisoned bird
Cleaving its way through the blue, liquid arch,
With liberty's free song. Those dropping pearls
Waste but thy bosom's wealth. 'Twas wise to keep Such treasures for the long arrears which grief
Holdeth with man, when pitiless time doth crush

The boasted blossoms of his summer prime.
—Lo! I will turn magician, and compute
What moves thee thus. Up from a parent's hearth
The sports of infancy, the nurse's smile,
The tale, the dance, the warbled hymn at eve,
The nightly blessing, and the lingering clasp
Of thy young fairy sister's snowy arms,—
Rise, in the bright parting vestment, to detain
Thy innocent soul in durance. Yet, my love,
Cast my heart's gold into the furnace-flame,
And if it pass not there, unchanging pure,
I'll be a bankrupt to all hope,—and Heaven
Shall shut its gate on me. Come, dearest, come,—
The hallow'd vow must tremble on thy lip,—
And at God's blessed altar shalt thou kneel
So meek and beautiful, that men will deem
Some angel there doth pray. Then shall thou be
The dovelet of my lone, domestic bower,
Breathing sweet music, while thy gentle heart
Shall learn such deep and deathless tenderness
That all thy pictures of remember'd joy
Shall be as faded things. So be at rest,
And let thy rose-bud lip smile as 'twas wont
With eloquent delight.

CHINESE ADVERTISEMENT.—"Chang Chaoulai who issues this thanksgiving advertisement, lives outside the south gate, in Great Tranquillity Lane, where he has opened an incense smoking musquito shop. On the eve of the 12th inst. two of his fellow workmen, in the shop, Nesabung and Atik, employed a stupefying drug, which by its fumes sunk all the partners in a deep sleep, during which they robbed the shop of all the money, clothes, &c.
which they could carry away. Next morning when the partners awoke, no trace was to be found of these two men. If any good people know where they are, and will give information, a thank offering in flowery red paper of four dollars will be presented. If both the booty and the two men be seized, and delivered over at my little shop, ten dollars will be presented. Decidedly I will not eat my words. This advertisement is true."

FABLE FROM THE POLISH OF GASZYSKI.—Near a dew drop, there fell a tear upon a tomb; whither an unhappy female, beautiful as an angel, repaired every morning to weep for her lover. As the sun's golden disk rose higher in heaven, his rays fell on the tear and the dew drop, but glanced with double brilliancy on the pearl shook from the tresses of Aurora. The liquid jewel proud of its lustre, addressed its neighbor: "How darest thou appear thus solitary and lustreless? The modest tear made no answer; but the zephyr that just then was wantoning near them, paused in its flight, brushed down with its wings the glittering dew drop, and folding the humble tear of affection in its embrace, carried it up to heaven.

LADIES CELEBRATION.—The late anniversary of Independence, was celebrated by the Ladies of this village.
in a novel and interesting manner. During the afternoon of the day, from eighty to an hundred ladies assembled in the orchard of Mr. Town, forming a refreshing shade, where tables were tastefully arranged, loaded with luxuries and delicacies, prepared gratuitously by the fair patriot. Tea was served up in splendid style, of which the whole company partook—comprising with the gentlemen about one hundred and fifty. After tea several figures were danced upon the green, when the party retired to the house of Mr. Town, where the festivity of the evening was continued with music and dancing. The elegance and taste displayed in the arrangement of the tables—the ruralness of the display—the event commemorated—the pleasant association of youth and age, equally enjoying innocent and unrestrained hilarity—all combined to render the scene appropriate for the occasion.—Batavia Press.

ANTIMASONRY IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The Anti-republicans, at their late jollifications in this city, (says the Lancaster Pa. Republican,) perpetrated a considerable number of toasts, and some of them at least six-horse power, queer and strong. We shall here, for the amusement, not to say the disgust, of our readers, notice a few of the volunteers.

"By Theo. Fenn.—George Washington: The immortal memory of the first Antimason in the United States; a name engraved upon the broad surface of an empire; his monument the happiness of millions; let every freeman echo, 'beware of secret societies.'"

This fellow, Fenn, is the pretended Editor of the Antimasonic Herald, formerly a wooden nutmeg merchant, imported from the land of onions, by Red Shirt, for the purpose of enlightening, as he says, the "stupid Pennsylvania Dutch," upon political subjects. We have said this much of Fenn, that our readers may know how to account for the character of his toast. George Washington the first Antimason in the United States!!! What a base libel upon his memory. That man an Antimason, who belonged to the institution of masonry for nearly forty years; who was a zealous and distinguished mason up to the hour of his death; who, upon every occasion, spoke in terms of the highest praise of the institution, and who, in the year 1797, in a reply to an address from the Grand Master of the fraternity of Ancient York Masons, of Charleston, South Carolina, spoke thus: "I recognise with pleasure, my relation to the brethren of your society. Your sentiments on the establishment and exercise of our equal government, are worthy of an association whose principles lead to purity of morals and beneficence of action." And yet, George Washington, in the opinion of Theo. Fenn, was the first antimason in the United States. Would that there were thousands and tens of thousands of such Antimasons. Let it be recollected that Fenn, week after week, in his paper, and orally, day after day, in company with his friend Jarvis F. Hanks, charged masons, upon initiation, with taking "horrid and blasphemous oaths," and let it be recollected too, that he has admitted (and it cannot be denied) that Washington had once been a mason. According then to his own doctrine, where does he place General Washington? In the slough of perjury!!! And yet this is Antimasonry—it is from the lips of one of their oracles. Shall a man, a party be tolerated who hold such sentiments, who promulgate upon the 4th of July, such doctrines, and who slander, basely slander, the memory of that man, whom, above every other, the American people should revere, and to whom they are so infinitely indebted. It is even so. "Echo—beware of secret associations." This is the conclusion of Fenn's toast. It will be recollected that in every Antimasonic paper in Pennsylvania, this sentiment has been, for effect, attributed to General Washington, was to be found, as the Anti's alleged, in his Farewell Address, and had a direct and unequivocal allusion to the Institution of Freemasonry.—Although it has gone the rounds of the Antimasonic papers, we believe it first appeared in the Herald. Fenn, therefore, is fairly entitled to the credit of the forgery; for let it be borne in mind that no such language, and no such sentiment, can be found, not only in the Farewell Address, but in no paper or work of General Washington.—We have not been surprised at such tricks to sustain Antimasonry, for it is founded in falsehood and deception, and they must sustain it, and proper and fit agents must be employed to do such work. But enough of Fenn and his toast.

"By President Shreiner.—With profound reverence, let every freeman remember the heroes of the 4th of July, 1776."

Not so bad, Martin; but just let us ask you a single question: Who were the most conspicuous among those heroes, whom, with so much reverence, you desire to remember. Were they not members of that institution to which, according to your own declarations, or those of your party, with whom you feasted and concurred, no honest man, no christian or patriot could belong? And in "whose secret walls," "treason, perjury, kidnapping, arson and murder," are hatched? They were, and you know it. Do you suppose, then, that you will receive credit for sincerity when you offer such a toast? If you do, you are not a sincere Antimason. You must either be an insincere Antimason, or a hypocrite in giving such a toast. Good-bye, Martin.

"By Vice President Reed.—George Wolf: His whole conduct is distinguished by imbecility and ignorance; the puppet of Masonry and a faction; the advancement and prosperity of this State demand his deposition two years hence."

Why, Peter, you talk like a book. You almost equal "Young Norvel." You must have taken the papers, particularly the Inquirer, to have so quickly learned that Gov. Wolf is weak and ignorant. We all admit that you are an excellent judge of talents and learning! Don't wait two years, Peter, before you depose Governor Wolf. It is quite entirely too long. Ritner will dry up in the mean time; and then that little Register office, you know is pretty lucrative. If you don't watch well, Whiteside, will manage to have all the wills of the people in the county, registered before you get hold of the wax.

"By Vice President Risdel.—The eleventh of September next: May it be the downfall of Masonry."

Why on the eleventh of September next, Mr. Vice President? Och, now; we know, you are going to take it to Philadelphia, and there demolish it in the United States Convention. Why didn't you take it to Bush-hill and hang it along with poor Porter. But Mr. Vice, a word in your ear. The object of your hate, not Masonry, but Democracy, will not die quite so soon as the eleventh of September. It will survive long enough for you to go back where you come from, and there supply yourself with a few more notions unfriendly to a republican form of government, and return here with them, for the use of yourself and antimasonic friends.

"By George Daly.—Lancaster county in 1829, Antimasonry triumphant over Masonry."

Come, George, why but you said, Antimasonry triumphant over reason, common sense, and democracy.—That would have been nearer the mark. It is not the first time that fanaticism triumphed over reason, passion over principle and vice over virtue; but they never could sustain their triumphs; and in a little while fanaticism, passion and vice, were all driven, discomfited, back from whence they came, by the irresistible genius of reason, principle and virtue. So it will be with your antimasonry; and you, unfortunate wight, will never be elected coroner of Lancaster county. Good morning, Mr. Daly.

Adam Bare.—This gentleman also gave a toast, which, in plain English, means—The people of Lancaster county: May they elect me Sheriff, in October next.

Adam has been a little unlucky heretofore. He runs well for a single heat, but he can't repeat. He has never taken a purse yet, though he has often contended for it, and we are little apprehensive that at the fall races he will be distanced. There is the little Lampeter nag, who is pretty swift afoot, and he will be well rode; and the old Cocalico horse is said to be great bottom; and there are also some pretty good nags in and about our city. But Adam, however, generally stumbles upon the Leacock hills. Good morning, Mr. Bare.

"By Jacob Snyder.—Our venerable Ex-Presidents: Living monuments of our happy institutions," &c.

Pretty good, Mr. Snyder, but how many of them were masons? We only ask for information. How many of them, we repeat, were members of the masonic fraternity? that bloody institution—that fruitful nest of iniquity? It would be well enough to understand that matter fully before you give such a toast as you did. Why didn't you ask the author of it to explain it to you, before you adopted it as your own. Perhaps it was late in the day. A whisper to you—you are an honest man, but if you trust yourself to the keeping of Patch, Water Cracker, or Nutmeg, you will forfeit the character you sustain. Good-bye, Mr. Snyder.

"By George F. Walters.—Masonry: A permanent edifice, when composed of stone and water."

Verily, George is really "dy'd in the wool." What, George, is Antimasonry, when composed of mud and dirt? A nod for you, Mr. W.

"By David Zook.—The Antimasonic papers: Diamonds in the crown Masonry; let them be preserved."

"Nigger what makes you grin so? Cause glad, to see my fadder." Davy must have been among the toads hunting jewels. A wink for you, Mr. Zook.

"By Thomas H. Burrows.—Our late Representatives at Harrisburgh: They have not done enough for the party—send them back."

Why, Tom, what do you mean? Hav'nt your representatives done enough for you? We think that they have out their own throats and yours too, and is'nt that enough?—And as for sending them back, they are, in all conscience, far enough back already!!! They managed to defeat the Columbia Rail-road bill, and that has sent them back far enough, unless you send them among the Indians. Tom, you are a kind of a, sort of a, nobleman, aint you? Suppose we send you to Harrisburgh? Would'nt you make a good representative in a republican legislature? Methinks you would. You have been petty well schooled, in all the larning of the day. Come, Tom, don't be bashful.—Lord Darby is'nt bashful. Your honor, Mr. Burrows.

"By John Latshaw.—The Hon. Harmar Denny:—The first antimason in Congress from Pennsylvania," &c.

The honourable John Latshaw: His honourable career in Baltimore and Pittsburgh. This is our toast—Do you take Mr. Latshaw?

"By John Bear, alias Bruin.—Secret Societies," &c.

Bruin, what do you mean by secret societies? Do you mean the secret conclaves of yourself, Jachin and Boaz, and, and, and,—but you understand. Are they dangerous to a republican government? Oh! no—fooks, if they can do no good, seldom do no harm.

"By Lawyer Henry G. Long!!!—New Holland Un-awed by the nobility of our county, they raised the standard of Liberty and Justice in opposition to Kings and High Priests."

Lawyer Henry G. whom do you term the nobility of our country? Do you mean the geese? Your acquaintance with a goose should have made you better acquainted with the principles, &c. of that family, and you ought to have a little more respect for your friends than to curse their nobility. What a lovely pair Pete and Henry are, for one family! Come, Hal, let's feel your head—why it's soft as a squash."—Go thy way, fool.

We intended to notice more of these celebrated and patriotic toasts, but we got tired of them, and we suppose our readers are also. So, with their authors, for the present at least, we shall let them pass, sub silentio.

SECEDERS—alias SEDUCERS.

Among the innumerable circumstances in the moral world which mark the wisdom of the creator, none strikes us more forcibly than the evidence which we see in every chapter in history, and on every page of human life, of the abhorrence of his creatures of an apostate. It is an instinctive principle deeply interwoven in our natures, and of which we can no more divest ourselves than of a consciousness of existence. The profligate may indeed use the apostate as a tool to accomplish unworthy purposes, but the moment that is done they cast him away and wash their hands from defilement. They spurn him from them. They trample him beneath their feet. Divested of all those hopes of shining gain, and glowing appendages to place and preferment which excited his ambitious cupidity, he is left to drag out a miserable existence, made so by his own treachery. He stands an isolated being, avoided by all men as if the very atmosphere around him was pestilential. Left to his own reflection, he already feels the gnawing of that worm which must forever prey upon his conscience; and when at last he goes bending beneath the weight of scorn, down to the grave, even the sexton as he covers him from the view of man, feels a sense of degradation, and we almost imagine nature herself assumes a look of complacency at the removal of a loathsome excrescence. Two notorious examples illustrate our positions: a Judas and an Arnold. The one hanged himself in despair, amidst the derision of his new friends; the other lived a few years of disgrace, abandoned by all, and died neglected.

There are, however at the present day, many instances of the same nature, the corrupt subjects of them already experiencing the same results. See the whole list of leading apostate Masons. It is made up of such men as were the most enthusiastic Masons while the institution was popular, men who joined it under mistaken expectation that it was calculated to forward their selfish, political, and ambitious views. They found themselves mistaken, and when the excitement first commenced they turned recreant, threw themselves into the midst of it as better calculated to advance their private interests, and gave it a political turn.

They expected immediately to ride into office and preferment. They piled fuel on the fire, they fanned it into a flame, and for a short day sported amidst the warmth and light. But as the insects which chirp and flutter gaily through the summer, stiffen and die at the approach of autumn; so now that class of men blench away from the withering scorn of the whole people: yes, even their chosen friends discard and detest them. Let those who will, look into the states of New York and Massachusetts, and see the just fate of this whole list. We now recollect of but one exception, and that is a political priest in Massachusetts, who some months ago was elected to office.—His day will speedily come.

There is another class of renegade Masons, not leaders, but followers.—Men who are good enough Masons, outwardly, until the persecuting rage of the present excitement alarmed their fears. They are like vegetables which flourish and grow with vigor during the soft showers and mildness of the vernal season, but when the droughts and scorching rays of summer come upon them, they wither, droop and die. While the church was prosperous, the clergy of France preached the Christian religion with energy and fervor, they saw every thing beautiful, harmonious and true in it; but when the persecution of the revolution poured in upon them, numbers of them denied their faith, and gave their voice for the abolition of the Sabbath, and in solemn processions paraded the streets of Paris, and publicly declared "there is no God, and death is an eternal sleep!" This class of timid men, whether Christians or Masons, are objects of pity than contempt; but neither their conduct, rather the nor the conduct of the former class, prove any thing against the creed, or the order which they disavow. It only proves that they themselves are unworthy.

Pittsburgh, July, 3d 1830.

The Antimasons have been thrown into extreme confusion, by the loss of a most respectable candidate for the assembly, William Kerr. This gentleman, in the first instance, received from the antimasons a voluntary nomination, they not having ascertained his sentiments, as to the proscription of the day. He was subsequently nominated by the democratic party—the following correspondence took place.

Pittsburgh, June 10, 1830.

TO WILLIAM KERR, Esq.

Dear Sir:—The subscribers, democratic republicans, opposed to political antimasonry, desire to ascertain whether you are in favour of proscribing masons from the enjoyment of political privileges, and whether you believe such proscription consistent with republican principles. Your friends and fellow citizens,

JAMES FULTON,
JAMES DUFF,
LEONARD S. JOHNS,
GEO. W. BUCHANAN,
CHARLES VON BONHORST,
HUGH STRAIN,
JAMES ANDERSON.

WM. KERR, Esq. St. Clair township.

St. Clair township June, 12, 1830.

GENTLEMEN,—In answer to your favor on the 10 inst. I state freely, that although I am not a mason, I am not a political antimason, and do not approve of the spirit that proscribes any portion of my fellow citizens from the enjoyment of equal rights and privileges.

I am, and ever have been a democratic republican, and should my friends think proper to elect me as such I am willing to serve them.

With respect, gentlemen, I am yours &c.

WM. KERR.

TO JAMES FULTON, &c.

Upon the publication of this letter, the Antis re-assembled their convention, and as they express it, in their paper of this date, "hoisted him out of their ranks." The head and front of his offence, being that he did not approve of proscription, and dared even in these worst of times, to proclaim himself "a democratic republican;" these things should be spread abroad among the people of Pennsylvania, for their information. They are the facts and the best comment upon the liberality of antimasonry.

To what wicked, malicious, and uncharitable charges and allegations will antimasonry, as politically practised, not lead. Notwithstanding the many falsehoods we have seen propagated by some of the leaders of that party, we have not observed any thing so wicked and uncharitable as the following: It is nothing less than a charge of PERJURY against the beloved WASHINGTON—the father of his country, whose memory every genuine American delights to honour. It is copied by the editor of the "Indiana Free Press," from the "Hartford!!! Intelligencer." Here it is, That WASHINGTON was a mason, tells nothing in favour of the institution. That Arnold was a mason, tells nothing against it. But that the incorruptible WASHINGTON had to VIOLATE his master masons OATH, in order to counteract treason and save his country, tells much against it. Were ever such wicked absurdities attempted to be palmed upon an intelligent community by any party or set of men, other than the leading antimasonic desperadoes. They first tell you, that Washington was "incorruptible" yet he "violated his oath." Could any "incorruptible" man adhere to an institution which com-compelled him to perjure himself, in order to discharge his duty to his country. Yet such is their inconsistency. To candid and dispassionate persons of every party, we say, can you believe that such men as Washington & Jackson, would commit wilful perjury in the manner in which this article, copied by the immaculate Judge Taylor, asserts? Can you place any confidence in a party, or in a set of men who will thus wantonly tarnish the fair fame and character of your beloved Washington. What, Washington perjured? Such an insinuation ought to excite the indignation of every American no matter to what party he belongs; and the traitor who makes it, and he who circulates it, are alike guilty and ought, as they will, receive the hearty contempt of an intelligent, and patriotic community.—Penn. Reporter.

From the Union-Village N. Y. Courant.

MR. EDITOR—I have been a spectator of the movements in the great antimasonic campaign ever since the first enlistment of the troops; and I must acknowledge, that never was unholy war carried on with more ardent zeal, and persevering industry; never was so much exertion thrown away on so unworthy a cause; never did mankind exhibit to the world a more eminent instance of folly and fanaticism than is blazoned forth in this crusade against masonry; and never was human depravity and recklessness more strongly set forth, than in the means used for the obtainment of the object in view. The foundations of society have been sapped—christian communities have been divided—the bond of their union in Christ nullified—and the peace and harmony of neighborhoods and families destroyed: the sacred silence of the grave has been disturbed by the din of war; nor has the holy sanctuary of conjugal happiness escaped violation; nay, even the consciences of individuals have been trifled with, and they have been unconsciously wheedled into a breach of the ninth commandment, and made to bear false witness against their neighbor, by antimasonic knavery.

Anderton's affidavit is yet in the recollection of all; nor is the base deception, practiced on Agnes Bell, by the antimasonic investigating committee of Boston, forgotten; neither is it likely to be, so long as antimasonic impudence continues to keep the recollection of it alive, by acting similar scenes.

Whether the Antimasonic Champion was jealous of the infamous celebrity of the Boston committee, and was desirous to add an additional wreath to its own laurels, or not, is not certainly known, but it is well known that week before last, it presented its readers with the 'certificates [not affidavits] of two Irishmen, (James Downey and Alexander Allen,) resident in Argyle, which are intended to corroborate Anderton's statement. Now whatever these certificates may be worth, it is pretty well known that they were obtained by the management of a certain runner for that paper, who, in the plenitude of his flaming zeal, would "compass sea and land," to obtain even the shadow of such testimony, as might be likely, in the most remote degree, to promote the unhallowed interests of his party. The editors of the Champion seem to think it a strong recommendation for the truth and veracity, that those gentlemen can 'write their names in a fair legible hand.' What an admirable criterion of character! Are they not aware that men have been sent to the State Prison for forgery, who could write a better hand than either of them? But perhaps the Champion considers good penmanship, an evidence of good character in an Irishman; if so, I feel a peculiar pleasure in waiving any objection that might arise in my mind upon this point.

But, allowing "Messrs. Downey and Allen" all credit for 'truth and veracity,' what does these certificates prove? Nothing more than, that they remember to have heard, some seventeen years ago, that a man named Miller, was found dead in Limekiln Dock, in Belfast—that he was said to have attended a masonic lodge on the evening previous—and that it was supposed he was 'murdered by some of the dock ruffians,' (not masons,) 'on his way home from the lodge.' They no more proved that Miller (if murdered at all) was murdered by masons, than they prove the truth of Symmes' doctrine of concentric spheres; or the existence of an inhabited country in the interior of the earth. The same hand evidently drew up both the 'certificates,' and was careful to insert in both the phrase 'considerable excitement,' for what purpose is as well known to me as to himself. Now Messrs. Downey and Allen; the writer of their certificates; the editors of the Champion; and all whom it may concern, are hereby informed, that I, the writer of this, resided in Enniskillen, in the county of Fermanagh, during 1813, and for more than two years subsequent to that time—that my time was not occupied either in 'bleaching linen,' or 'making yearly trips to England'—that my opportunities for becoming acquainted with public sentiment were such, that a 'considerable excitement' respecting such outrages as murder, robbery, burglary, or indeed any other extraordinary occurrence, could not easily have escaped my notice. And I here declare that, although I had free access not only to the 'Erebe Packet,' printed at Enniskillen, to Mr. Lawless' paper, printed at Belfast, to the Cavan Herald, the Limerick Chronicle, and various others, including all the Dublin papers, I never saw in any of them any account of such an affair, as the murder of Miller is said to be. Every person at all acquainted with even the modern history of Ireland, is well aware that, with the exception of acts of killing by highwaymen and burglars, the murders committed in that unfortunate country, have all resulted from British misrule. Murders were not uncommon in that country at that time alluded to, and it is not at all impossible, that a man named Miller may have lost his life by violent means at that period, and that his death may have been inserted among the items of domestic intelligence, or even 'wonderful accidents;' but that it created any 'considerable excitement,' is positively untrue—the assertion to that effect is unquestionably without foundation in fact. In whatever part of the county of Monaghan, Downey and Allen lived, they must have been at least some sixty or seventy miles from Belfast. Enniskillen cannot be much more—while it has the advantage of being one of the most populous and flourishing inland towns in the North of Ireland, holding communication with all parts of the kingdom; and here I had ample opportunity to obtain a knowledge of all occurrences of public interest. I would but my knowledge of penmanship, (which according to the rule set up by the Champion includes my character for "truth and veracity,") against the small remnant of respectability possessed by that journal, (which is giving 'the long odds,') that Downey cannot tell the name of Mr. Forbes' 'Belfast paper,' from which he 'learned' that Miller was murdered; and that he and Allen will not add that to their 'certificates,' and swear to the whole before a justice of the peace. Allen certifies that two years previous to the alleged murder of Miller, in his return from one of his 'yearly trips,' he landed 'in Limekiln Dock,'—thus proving beyond doubt what nobody ever denied, viz. the existence of such a dock; and from this the editors of the Champion, who have as little regard for Irishmen, as they evidently have for TRUTH, draw the very sage conclusion that "nobody doubts the murder of Miller" by masons, and on masonic principles. Such is their reasoning; and every one must acknowledge, that it is of a piece with the logicians who use it, and the cause which it is intended to support. If Messrs. Downey and Allen will mind their own business, and if the 'knave' will attend to his, I shall not be likely to trouble them again; if not they may expect, as often as they offend, to hear from THEODORE.

From the Freedom's Sentinel.

We have every reason to believe that the course we have taken respecting the conduct of a noisy, desperate, and discontented band of beings, who are looking for the loaves and fishes of office, through the agency of antimasonry, is in unison with the feelings of the great body of our citizens. Those who are antimasons from principle, are usually fonder firm in the evils which may, and, as they believe, have resulted from secret societies; but they are not heard sending forth sweeping denunciation upon the great body of masons, without regard to their characters.

Why are some of our most virtuous men vilified and slandered as murderers, or as associates of murderers, merely because they are masons, whom it is well known that many of our most highly-talented and purest men belong to that society, and that they would revolt at the commission of crime, or the violation of the laws of the country. We are free to say that we believe it has been done from no honorable motive. We care not what epithet has been, or may be bestowed upon us, for opinions' sake, or perhaps we might more correctly say, because we have taken the liberty to express our opinions; but we sincerely believe that many of the managers of the present excitement (any other name will be used if gentlemen desire) are antimasons, because they can devise no other means for convincing the people of their sterling, devoted patriotism, and their superior qualifications for certain places. It is said that David Crockett owed his success, in the election of congressional representative, to the skill and bodily strength he exhibited in extracting a stump from its mother earth. At the same moment his opponent was exhibiting his mental faculties, by addressing the mob. But the enlightened voters, thinking the exploit of the half-alligator Davy the most statesmanlike, gave him the decided preference. Similar in some respects, though not in all, are the exploits of some STERLING WORTHIES in our State. These unheeding patriots, despairing of rising into power, by the common consent of a free people, have eagerly taken hold of the stump; but alack and alas! it is believed the poor devils are unequal to the task! They cannot extract it. They have made a great outcry about masons and all who are not openly at war with masons, under the solemn conviction that THIS noble sacrifice of private feelings and social intercourse with their fellow men would satisfactorily prove to the dear people, whom they affectionately loved, that their very souls were engaged in measures, on the accomplishment of which depended the salvation of our venerated institutions. "This masonry must be put down, by—," says one of the staunch advocates of self; and this cannot be done, they give us to understand, without they are first put into the 'high places' instead of the cut-throats who now fill all the public offices. These manoeuvres, however, are believed to be unsuccessful. The people, it is understood, will listen not to them. They pronounce them impostors, hypocrites, office-seekers! Thus it will be seen, the people have become Jacks! No wonder, then, that the stump cleaves to the earth.

Will any man, who professes to cherish a spirit of candor; who feels a sincere attachment to the continued friendship of his fellow men, say that we proceed with too much severity, or that we should more tenderly regard the feelings of our opponents? Let him look at facts; let him become thoroughly acquainted with the men, on whom his charity is bestowed; let him scrutinize their whole conduct, and seriously inquire into their motives; and his investigations will assuredly result in a satisfactory reply.—We trust we shall never be found wanting in charity, or in the manifestation of all the better feelings of the human heart, when objects present themselves, on which they may be bestowed, without setting at defiance every principle of justice, if not of moral honesty. But we have seen and felt enough of the spirit of exclusion in the men of whom we have spoken, to convince us that they are actuated by the worst of motives; that their aim is to rise into power upon the ruins of better men. Under these circumstances, they have no right to expect that they can provoke sympathy at our hands. We confess their situation is truly critical, and certainly not to be envied; and know of but one mode of retreat. Let them bow down their heads and ask the forgiveness of their impartial Judge, and a virtuous, but insulted people. Casting off the pride of their hearts, let them repent and reform.

JACKS.—It has now long been the fashion with some people to designate all who are neither masons nor antimasons, as well as the more candid antimasons, by the title of Jacks. So far as this honorable distinction is extended to us, we have no complaint to make. We can assure them that we consider it a high mark of honor, when compared with any name which would tend to bring us to a level with themselves. Should they however, at any time, desire to apply this name to themselves, they will please give us timely notice, that we may search for another. We are very particular to keep good company.—Thus much we have said, that no one may be mistaken as to our real title. At present we are a JACK—or in other words, neither a mason nor antimason. Gentlemen may bestow this title upon us with as much earnestness as they please. Call us any thing but the contemptible slave of an unprincipled faction—any thing but the tool of knaves, and the companion of fools.—ib

EDWARD GIDDINS.—The following is an extract of a letter, written by Giddins, while at Fort Niagara, and addressed to a Mr. Morrison. The infidel sentiments it contains, were thought by the Court of Ontario, to be sufficient evidence to authorise the rejection of the author as a witness:

"Under the head of orthodoxy you relate an anecdote, which I am sorry to say, is but too faithful a picture of the intolerance of christianity in general, but of Calvinism in particular; it is now, however the raging mania of the times, and must have its day, but the world is fast advancing in knowledge, and driving before it superstition, bigotry and intolerance! and establishing in their places universal benevolence and liberal principles. Reason will yet gain her rights, and man no longer duped by priestcraft and manacled by imaginary fears, emanating from the superstitious dogmas imbibed in youth: the time is approaching when universal charity, benevolence and philanthropy, will prevail, when man will know how to pursue the dictates of reason, and when he will subscribe to no creed but that of nature; that her laws are immutable, and never can be violated; and that a knowledge of them is at the same time the knowledge of the Deity."—Again. "A full and complete knowledge of our situation in the scale of being, will convince us that God has the same care of man as of an insect, of an insect as of a tree: that with him there can be no difference or distinction between beauty and deformity, virtue and vice, perfection and imperfection." You will perceive from the above, that my views are not in accordance with the Bible, for that book represents the Deity as revengeful, vindictive, and inconsistent, performing an act to-day and repenting of it to-morrow." These then are the religious sentiments of Mr. Edward Giddings.—[P] That God looks upon vice and virtue with equal complacency. [Q] What a sentiment!! What kind of a man must he be, who deliberately proclaims it. "Let no such man be trusted, for he is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils." And this gentleman is the Achilles of Antimasonry, and Solomon Southwick is his friend and co-worker in the holy cause.—Solomon says of him, "that he is as honest a man as ever God made." From this we may form a tolerable correct opinion of Solomon's principles—he is the Ajax of Antimasonry. They are doubtless par nobile fratum.

For the Masonic Mirror.

MR. EDITOR—In your paper of June 19th, it was stated in relation to the 'report of the committee of St. Alban's Lodge' that two out of the eleven persons to whom that report was recommitted for revision and alteration, were not present at the subsequent meeting of the committee and of the Lodge at the time when the report was accepted. As some enquiry has been made for the names of the absent members of the committee, it is but an act of justice to state that Deacon Claudius D. Hayward and Capt. Asa Ware were the persons who were absent and never saw the report as it was finally accepted until after it had been put to the press. The responsibility, therefore, should rest with the other nine and with the members of the Lodge who acted in the acceptance of the report.

THE POWER OF FASHION.

[Example of these high in office and power, will affect more, in checking the prevalence of vicious habits in the community than laws and punishments. We extract the following shrewd and very sensible illustrations of the influence of fashion and example, upon the morals of the people, from a small tract published by a benevolent Quaker, residing at Canton Mass. well known for his exertions for the happiness of his fellow citizens and the liberal benevolence of his character.

How to keep the lower ranks of mankind in order.

I think the difficulty lies in keeping the leading ranks of mankind straight, and in good order; for they always set the fashions, and we silly working people, always follow, whether it be right or wrong, foolish or wise. But to make the thing a little more plain, I will tell you a story which took place in C. the day before I set out from home.

I went to E's store in C. with a gallon bottle, to buy a gallon of rum, and said friend E. more rum. I want a gallon of rum to treat my forgerman C. C. and customers. There I saw Parson R. setting on a seat. Now Parson, said I, what makes you great folks keep up such a pernicious fashion of drinking rum, and palm it upon us little folks, who abhor it? you will not let us buy or sell, without we have the mark of the beast. Who will buy my iron if I will not treat them? They will go across the way to K. who will treat them, and if a mason give him a grip, and a cud of tobacco, and a sly cuff on the shoulder, and trade with him, although his iron is no better than mine. Ah, said the Parson it grows out of the evil propensities of the human heart. 'Man is prone to wickedness, as the spark flies upwards.' No Parson, I do not think so, for I never loved it myself. It is true I have drank some, perhaps half a dozen times, when I was a boy, about fifteen years of age, when I was in company with my companions, on holy days. Not because I loved it, but to be social and agreeable to my companions, and to be in fashion with them. But these practices always caused me the sick head-ache the next day, and I left off drinking rum, and have not drank any, from that day to this. I smoked and chewed tobacco, but they both made me sick, which determined me to leave them off, and be one of the unfashionables, and to get along as well as I could. Well said the Parson, the Temperance Societies will soon put a stop to it; they have almost stopped it in F. No, said I, Parson, I think you make it worse; something like pouring oil on a fire to quench it. Look into the road; there is half a dozen teamsters. If you will go into D.'s store and hide yourself behind an old hog's head, so the boys cannot see the black coat, you will be apt to hear the boys make such remarks as I often hear. Come D., give me some rum, for our minister says, we shall not drink rum, and I scorn to have a master. I will drink, out of spite. I was at Salem last week, to our quaker Meeting; and after meeting, I had an invitation to dine with my friend S., and among other conversation, he said, what doth thee think of Temperance Societies?—Will they stop drunkenness in the land? No, said I, for people of small capacities think their motives are impure; that they form such Societies, to get themselves into notice. This remark puts me in mind of my neighbor across the way; he is about forty-five years old, a carpenter by trade, and a very hard working man; he drinks considerable rum, and says he is better able to work in consequence of it; but I do not think he ever meant to be a drunkard, for he is a religious man, and belongs to a church in S., and his minister put himself at the head of a Temperance Society, and kept him from drinking rum all summer; but in the fall, the minister's house got on fire, and my neighbor went to help put it out. It was so late, that they concluded to carry the goods out of the house. In the cellar, they found a number of kegs, with the best of rum, brandy and wine, and other spirits, the country afforded. My neighbor came home very angry, and said he had been deceived, and cheated by him, whom he looked up to as an oracle of truth. Now, said he, I will drink what I please, and gave himself up to intemperance, which gave his family much trouble.

Now, Parson, you know that the custom and manners of the leading class have a more controlling influence over public manners and morals, than the statues of legislators. If you and your brethren, the clergy, wish well to mankind, it seems to me that you have only to change the fashion, as the Prince of Wales changed the great shoe-buckle fashion, about thirty two years ago. He went to his buckle-maker for a pair of diamond buckles, fit for a prince to wear to a great party. I suppose they might have cost forty or fifty guineas. The buckle-maker refused to trust him, and he tied his shoes with ribbons, and went to his party. The bucks about the court, seeing the prince with shoe-strings, laid aside their great buckles, and the fashion was completely changed, and the buckle-maker undone.

It appears to me, that so long as we have drinking as a fashion, we must have drunkenness as a vice. Let all the Clergy, and all the respectable people in every town, change the fashion, and tell the boys that it is now as much out of fashion for a young man to drink a dram, or smoke a cigar, as it would be to dress up to go a courting, in an old-fashioned minister's wig, three-cornered hat, and great shoe-buckles. Do you think there would be one fashionable young man that would drink a dram, or smoke a cigar, or a girl that would have her ears bored? Then there will be the old drunkard. Let them go behind the door and drink; they will be out of fashion, and will die off before long.

Now, parson, can you tell me what power a child has over himself, to decide what country he should be born in; what religion, and what language, customs and habits, should be taught him. If he was born amongst the Dutch, he would naturally learn to talk Dutch, drink sour buttermilk, and go to the Dutch church. If he was born in France, he would learn French, drink wine, and go to the catholic church. If he was born in England, he would learn English, go to church, and drink porter. I never could learn to love porter, because it was bitter, like motherwort tea.

I was brought up when it was the fashion to eat been-porridge, and learned to love it, when I was a little boy; and I make my wife cook me some every now and then, when it is cold weather, because I love it now as well as ever I did, and don't you think there is an evil propensity in the human heart, in loving bean porridge? If there is, I will plead guilty, and leave it.

Now parson what are you about? Instead of exchanging this genteel rum fashion, and chaining down the strong man Rum, this giant sin at war with every creed, with the iron chain of fashion, you seem to be joining the indolent class, who live without labor, to build up the empire of folly; and you all seem willing to make use of the sorcery and superstition of false fashion, false honor, and false religion, to get a living out of us silly working people, as you are jeeringly pleased to call us, and it seemeth to me that you use all three of these famous ingredients something as the Scotchman did his monkey, when he learnt it to bite every one but the keeper.

Now, parson, you tell us that drinking rum grows out of the evil propensities of the human heart, and that man is prone to wickedness, 'as the sparks fly upward.'

Let us take another look at this subject, and see if it does not grow out of the most noble, the most generous, and gentlemanly feelings of the human heart. What is the fashion—the unproved usages of society? How must we receive and treat our best friends, when they come to see us?

Our best spirits, and best decanters, must be set before them, and this is hardly good enough to give them a right down hearty welcome. We are apt to wish we had something better, to make him believe we are glad to see him. Our children stand about the house, and observe what passes amongst the old folks, and after a few years have rolled round, our boys grow up to be young men, and go into company on holy days, full of good humor, each one trying to excel his fellow in every thing fashionable, honorable, and praiseworthy.

Well, John, how shall we behave like men to-day, and honorable men too? Why father, and all the rest of the great folks, when they are glad to see each other, always have something that is good to drink. We will have something. So the boys go to the tavern, and call for the best rooms, and sit down to drink a few bottles of wine, or bowls of punch, or what seemeth good to them, with as much social felicity, as churchmen do at communion, and it seems to me that this is the way we educate them to be drunkards—we make it fashionable. We make it honorable, and who can resist it! I have often thought of the Seati-cook squaw, when I lived in Connecticut. Several of them came into our house, and my wife gave them a mug of pleasant cider, and after they had drank what they wanted, one of them filled her mouth with cider, and spirted into her papoose's mouth, saying, 'learn him to love it while he is little, because it is good.'

Supposing President Jackson should take it into his head, while he is at work for the good of the people in making reform, to change the rum fashion, by furnishing other refreshments than strong drink at his levee; this would chain down the strong man Rum, by the strong iron chain of Fashion. If the President, heads of departments, and members of Congress should once set the example, would it not go through the nation like an electric shock?

He would acquire greater renown than he did on the 8th of January 1815, by defeating Gibbs and Packenham. If the most hardened and profligate man in Europe could change the great shoe buckle fashion in two great nations at one dashing blunder, what may we expect of the example of our respected and beloved patriotic President and Cabinet, with their numerous friends?

If the Rum fashion could be changed, and a few other bad fashions done away, and good ones put in their places, and the nation be governed by the maxims and fashions of Dr. Franklin, would it not add to their prosperity more than one million of dollars daily.

Cries one, but your schemes will injure a very numerous and a most respectable class of people!

There will be at least one hundred thousand respectable dealers in strong drink, who get, one way or other, 1,000 dollars each.	$100,000,000
There will be about 10,000 lawyers, that will loose their fees in the rum quarrels, and collecting debts.	$8,000,000
Doctors would loose at least one half of their practice.	$10,000,000
1200 deaths caused by rum, 3000 paupers, and 100,000 drunkards,	$27,000,000
Usurers could not get more than 3 per cent per Ann.	$20,000,000
To drink water would produce courage, exertion and activity, which would produce, in working farms, building houses and barns, making roads and factories, and other improvements, equal to	$80,000,000
	$120,000,000
Total,	$365,000,000

SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

BURNING BRICK. In Silliman's Journal of Science for April, is an article on the advantages of mixing anthracite coal with the materials used in making bricks. According to this article the expense of brick making may be reduced fifty per cent by the use of coal. In England the law requires that 750 bushels of coal ashes and cinders shall be mixed with so much of the principal materials as will make one hundred thousand bricks; and in consequence the bricks are harder and more thoroughly burnt. It occurred to a brick maker on the North River, that anthracite coal dust would answer as good a purpose as the ashes, if not a better one. He therefore made several experiments which completely succeeded. His method now is, to prepare the clay in the usual manner, but before moulding to spread a large layer of it about six inches thick, and upon it scatter a layer of coal dust; then put on another layer of clay and another of coal dust, and so alternately. The ingredients are then to be thoroughly mixed and the bricks to be moulded and laid up as usual. The presence of the coal, which ignites and assists in the burning, renders necessary a much less quantity of wood, and causes the bricks to be well burnt in the centre. In kilns which required forty five cords of wood to make the brick, and ten or twelve days to complete the burning; by the use of coal dust, the quantity of wood necessary is only fifteen cords, and the time required, five days. The quantity which should be introduced into the materials for a hundred thousand bricks, is less than half a ton; but this depends considerably upon the quality of the earth made use of. If too much be employed, the bricks will vitrify and be ruined; so that it appears safest to use not a great deal until the workman is able to judge with considerable accuracy of its effects. The coal, before being used, should be passed through a wire screen or sieve, the opening of which should be less than half an inch, to insure the combustion of all the pieces.

Coal dust is cheap, as it is fit for but few purposes. At the Rhode Island coal mines it is said to be an actual incumbrance to the proprietors.—Hence the expense of obtaining it would be little or nothing above the cost of transportation.

ROSEMARY.

Rosemary grows abundantly, and without cultivation, in Spain, Italy, Provence, and Languedoc. In the latter place it grew so abundantly about the 16th century, that the inhabitants burnt scarcely any other fuel, and the perfume of this plant is said to have been smelt nearly twenty miles at sea.

Every reader of taste will recollect Henry Kirke White's beautiful lines on this plant, which can be well introduced here.

'Sweet scented flower! who art wont to bloom
On January's front severe,
And o'er the wintry desert drear
To waft thy waste perfume:
Come, thou shalt form my nosegay now,
And I will bind thee round my brow;
And, as I twine thy mournful wreath,
I'll weave a melancholy song,
And sweet the strain shall be, and long,
The melody of death.

Come, funeral flower! who loveth to dwell
With the pale corpse in lonely tomb,
And throw across the desert gloom
A sweet decaying smell:
Come, press my lips, and lie with me
Beneath the lowly alder tree;
And we will sleep a pleasant sleep,
And not a care shall dare intrude,
To break the marble solitude,
So peaceful and so deep.

And hark! the wind-god as he flies,
Moans hollow in the forest trees,
And sailing on the gusty breeze
Mysterious music dies.
Sweet flower that requiem wild is mine;
It warns me to the lonely shrine,
The cold turf altar of the dead:
My grave shall be in yon lone spot,
Where as I lie by all forgot
A dying fragrance thou wilt o'er my ashes shed.'

Without entering into any extravagant opinions of the ancients respecting odours, we cannot avoid thinking that the effect which different smells and perfumes have on the mind, as well as the health, is not at present sufficiently attended to.

Most people acknowledge to have felt the refreshing odour of tea and coffee before tasting them; and in heated rooms the fragrance of a cut lemon, or a recently sliced cucumber, has been observed to give general refreshment.

The sprigs of rosemary were formerly stuck into beef whilst roasting, and they are said to have communicated to it an excellent relish. The leaves were also boiled in milk pottage, to give it an aromatic flavor; and before simples were so much out of use, the apothecaries made a distilled water, a conserve, and an electuary from this plant, which also produces by distillation an essential oil, which was much esteemed for all affections of the brain. A decoction of the leaves in wine was used externally to strengthen the nerves, as well as the joints and weak parts of paralytic members.

Arnaldus de Villa Nova states, that he has often seen cancers, gangrenes, and fistulas dried up and perfectly cured, though they would yield to no other medicine, by frequently washing them with an infusion of rosemary in spirit of wine.

ATHENS.

Placed in the centre of a dry and healthy plain, which is protected on the north and east by mountains, and open to the sea on the south, the climate, with the exception of a few weeks of rain and storms early in the year, and of intense heat in the height of Summer, may be called a perpetual spring; the skies are often for days together without a cloud; the trees, being all evergreen, banish the idea of winter; and the turf at Christmas is covered with anemones in full bloom.—The surrounding scenery, if not of the grandest, is of the most beautiful character, characterized by an air of tranquility and repose. The mountains slope gently down, and melt almost imperceptibly into the plain; the sea, broken by promontories and islands, exhibits the placid surface of a lake; the ground, though it cannot boast of any rich verdure, harmonizes in color with the pale green of the woods and the clear blue of the atmosphere; and the majestic remains of antiquity combine happily with the landscape, and present themselves at every step in a new picturesque point of view. He who has once stood on the hill of Museum, and has seen the long range of Mount Hymettus, tinged with the purple hue of the heath and wild thyme, the cone shaped Anchesmus rising gracefully from the plain, and the airy summit of Pentelicus beyond it; the solitary columns of the temple of Jupiter the golden-tinted Parthenon, and the rocky hill of the Areopagus; the vast olive grove changing its hue perpetually from the brightest to the darkest green as the light-clouds flit over it; the pine covered slopes of Mount Parnes, the distant Summits of Parnassus, the Boropolis of Corinth, and the mountains of the Peloponnesus; the port of the Piræus, and the Gulf of Salamis, with its indented shores—will never forget the impression produced on assemblage of objects as unique perhaps with regard to natural beauty as to classical interests.

SINGING CONDUCTIVE TO GOOD HEALTH. Many parents in encouraging the development of musical talents in their children, have no other view than to add to the number of their fashionable accomplishments and afford them a means of innocent solace and amusement. It was the opinion of Dr. Rush, however, that singing is to young ladies, who by the customs of society are debarred from many other kinds of salubrious exercise, not only to be cultivated as an accomplishment, but as a means of preserving health. He particularly insists that vocal music should never be neglected in the education of a young lady; and states, that besides its salutary operation in enabling her to soothe the cares of domestic life, and quiet sorrow by the united assistance of the sound and sentiment of a properly chosen song, it has a still more direct and important effect. 'I here introduce a fact,' remarks Dr. Rush, 'which has been suggested to me by my profession, and that is, that the exercise of the organs of the breast by singing, contributes very much to defend them from diseases to which the climate and other causes expose them. The Germans are seldom afflicted with consumptions, nor have I ever known but one instance of spitting blood among them. This, I believe, is in part occasioned by the strength which their lungs acquire by exercising them frequently in vocal music, for this constitutes the essential branch of their education.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JULY 31, 1830.

"Fools will be fools, do what you will,
And rascals will be rascals still."

There never was a truer sentiment penned, by poet or philosopher; and the author, whoever he be, need not want for living exemplifications of its truth, so long as he can find two political antimasons in the world. We assume it as an incontrovertible truth, that a political antimason must be either a fool or a knave. If he be simply an antimason, he may be an honest man; that is, he may be honest in his opinions. But if he be a political office-seeker, (and of such the party is mostly composed,) he is striving to prostrate the characters of a portion of his fellow-citizens, that he may rise to infamous notoriety on their ruins. He cares not a fig whether the Masonic Institution stands or falls. He seizes on the mania, and excites the fears and prejudices of the ignorant and credulous; he vilifies his best friends and scandalizes the purest characters in the country; he debases his own dignity as a man, and enacts the part of hypocrisy and villany, that he may attain his object. This man is a villain. The fool is him who plays second to the villain: the tool of knaves; the mere automaton, without mind or decision of character.—This class is much the largest. They are honest, because they do not know enough to be knaves. Not having the capacity to rule, they are content to serve. They are the servile followers of men, who,

"At glory grasp and sink in infamy."

A more forcible illustration of the recklessness and moral depravity of these men, cannot be desired, than is furnished by the fact, that the most disgraceful and villainous charge that was ever preferred against any high functionary of the government, or that was ever published, has been brought against the President of the United States, by an antimasonic maniac, living in Philadelphia. He has deliberately and maliciously charged the Chief Magistrate of the Union, with the high crime of PERJURY! And this charge, villainous as it is, has been circulated by the antimasonic vehicles of scandal, through all parts of the country: they have all voluntarily become particeps criminis. The charge is that, President JACKSON has pardoned WILSON, the mail robber, because he was a FREE-MASON!!! Who can coolly and dispassionately set down to refute such a base libel upon the whole people of the United States—upon the virtue and common sense of the country? The blood of every genuine American—of every friend to the reputation of his country—must boil with indignation at the author and propagators of such defamation. In the language of a cotemporary—we cannot apply rose water to a corroded cancer:—therefore, we declare this one of the most villainous slanders, and its author either a fool, or one of the greatest scoundrels in the United States. Had this polluted publication been confined to the city where it originated, we would not have disgraced our pen to have written aught against it. But the blood-hounds, near and far, have taken the scent, and we see it reiterated in every antimasonic thing in the country. Were a community, or a society, as chaste and as pure as human nature is susceptible of being, neither would escape the foul-mouthed aspersions of the contemptible faction which is now vainly endeavoring to gain the political ascendancy in this country. Look at the ringleaders!

"Upon their eye-balls, murderous tyranny Sits in grim majesty to fright the world."

We are sincerely of the belief, and we do not hesitate to express it, that there are among the prime-movers of political antimasonry, wretches who would traitorously betray their country for the sake of office and power; who would sell the liberties of their countrymen, and blast the fair fame of their kindred, that they might rise from disgrace to infamy! They cannot recede. They have chosen to clothe themselves with the mantle of disgrace, and that they must forever wear. Whatever progress they make, must be infamous. And although we would not obstruct their career; yet we shall not permit them to deceive and induce others to accompany them on the road to infamy. They must go alone. We wish them all possible despatch.

Were it of any consequence, we would prove that Wilson was not a Mason; but it is not. The following from the Westmoreland Pen. Republican, furnishes the particulars of another case, of similar character. The robber in this instance, however, was apprehended by Masons.

The editor of the "Greensburg Gazette," in his last, says that Weirich, the Mail robber, was a bright mason. As it is not likely that, at this particular time, the editor would willingly state a falsehood, (perhaps I ought rather to say it would be particularly unbecoming him to do so,) we suppose that he has some good authority for the assertion. Indeed, it seems to be fully understood that a regular system of pimping and espionage, was authorised and enjoined by the Harrisburg Antimasonic Convention. We suppose the secret machinery which they have in operation to convey intelligence and secure unity of action, has furnished Mr. Black with the intelligence that Weirich was a mason. We grant too, that the logic which would convict all masons of disgrace and robbery from that incident, is just as good as that which would make them all murderers, because some infatuated wretches put William Morgan to death. It is certainly praise-worthy in so good a man as Mr. Black, to endeavor to bring disgrace on a whole sect, on account of the unworthy conduct of one member. But ought he not to have informed his readers that the mail robber was detected, pursued and arrested by masons? So just and fair a man as Elder Black, ought to have told the whole truth. Surely he did not know that Mr. Eichbaum, whom the citizens of Pittsburgh, in public meeting thanked for his zeal, fidelity, despatch, and public spirit, in detecting Weirich, was a brother mason. Surely he did not know that Mr. Morgan, of Washington, whose services in detecting Weirich were so valuable, was also a brother mason. I have heard it stated in the streets, that these men, Eichbaum and Morgan, were generally known as masons, by assisting at public ceremonies; and as the Harrisburg Convention appointed committees in each county to spy out all masons, especially those who hold offices, I think it somewhat surprising that Elder Black, considering his inquisitive turn, and his sharp peering look, as for news, did not find it out. But now we demand from him, because we have a right to demand that an editor of a newspaper shall be honest and candid, and tell the truth, whether he obey our call or not—we demand of him to tell the whole truth; so that if it does appear that a mason was guilty, it will appear also that those who detected and pursued the criminal were masons. Now it is doubtless a fact, antimasons have been guilty of great crimes, yet that of itself, ought not to disgrace the whole sect: it ought not to touch any with its contagion, except those who countenanced the criminal and concealed his crimes. If any mason countenanced, protected, or shielded either Weirich or Morgan, let him be anathema maranatha; let the law take hold of him. The Cashier of the Westmoreland Bank, although he did not rob the mail, yet he robbed the widow and the orphan; the old, the blind and the decrepid. He did this systematically for years, and he was the father of antimasonry. But that does not prove that antimasons are all dishonest. It proves however, that there may be rogues among them as well as among masons. Now who concealed and countenanced Morrow's crimes for years? Was it the Masonic 'craft,' as Mr. Black calls them, or was it any other craft? Mr. Morrow may have assembled his friends, when exposure threatened him, and addressed them as Demetrius addressed certain of the Ephesians of old: "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth." The thing was certainly a long time smothered, but how or wherefore needs not be said at present.

THE TRIALS.—In consequence of the sudden demise of Chief Justice PARKER, the Supreme Court at Salem, adjourned from Monday last to Tuesday next—when the trials will be resumed.

SPIRIT OF ANTIMASONRY.

In our last we gave the valedictory of the editor of the Easton, Pen. Argus; in which he renounced antimasonry, as "grasping too much." The Argus was commenced under the patronage of the antimasonic party in Easton; and the editor zealously supported that cause; so long as he could conscientiously do so. But when he ascertained the genuine views of the men, whose tool he had unwittingly become; when he discovered that the great aim of antimasonry was the proscription of one portion of the community, that another, composed of degraded politicians and designing knaves, might rise to office and to power; that his services, as editor of a public journal, could not be made acceptable to the antimasonic party, without a total prostration of principle, without compromising his character as an honest man; he abandoned the infamous cause, and stopped his publication. We are happy now to have it in our power to state that the paper has been revived; and that it wears a more healthful countenance. The editor announces the renovation and change in the following language:—

"When a public Journal changes its character, and repudiates the principles which it professed, the same indulgence may be claimed for it which has in all ages been extended to public men, who, when the light of experience shewed them their error, candidly acknowledged their delusion, and bravely resolved to make amends by a firm adherence to sound and salutary principles—in a word, we claim no more for this paper than those are entitled to, who, finding themselves in error, are too honest to persist in wrong, contrary to experience and conviction.

Having been, as we still are, adverse to Masonry, it cannot be a matter of surprise, that the importunities and specious arguments of the antimasonic party led us into their ranks; we then believed that their principles were honest, and their object the improvement of society; but a few months' experience has drawn aside the veil, and evinced to us most clearly, that the principal aim and objects of Political antimasonry, are utterly at variance with the rights of our fellow citizens, and totally subversive of the plain and broad principles of the constitution.

The leading principles and broad rule of action, as developed by political antimasonry, admit neither of distinction nor qualification. The virtuous and the vicious are alike blended, and a name consigns them to one common destruction. Not only is the disfranchisement of a large and respectable portion of the citizens of this commonwealth, contemplated, but the moral links that bind man to man are to be severed. The sacred obligations of the jury box, and the independence of the bench, are to be invaded: thus unhinging all confidence, and poisoning the very fountains of truth and justice. Ought the establishment of a precedent for indiscriminate intolerance and proscription, such as this, to be countenanced or supported? If so, sectarian or sectional names will be the next subjects of injustice. The Germans and the Irish may in their turn become the victims of political proscription; and where is the pledge of safety for Moravians, Lutherans, Presbyterians or Methodists? May they not each be selected for the most unrighteous persecution?

These appalling apprehensions, induced by a clearer view of the motives and aims of political antimasonry, have in our sight become so revolting, that it were sinning against all light and reason to give support or countenance to a party, that would tarnish the bright escutcheon of Pennsylvania, and render her motto, "Virtue, Liberty, and Independence" but an empty sound.

It were not enough that we should oppose generally the society of masons, but we must strike at those particularly, whose virtuous conduct in life has been the means of elevating them to places of honor and distinction—not because they are masons, but because their political prostration is desirable, and the hue and cry against them may suit the purposes of aspiring demagogues, who would climb to power by any means, however dishonorable. When we were called upon to pursue this course, and when the curtain was drawn aside, the managers unmasked, and the dagger presented with which we were to aid in the im-lation of the Democratic Party, our trembling hand proved to us that we were all unfit for the work—we dislike masonry, but we could not be recreant to Democracy—we thought of old Northampton—we thought of JACKSON—we returned the poisoned steel—struck the motly antimasonic flag, and now nail the bright union to the mast, inscribed, "Jackson and Democracy." Under this banner, our paper again puts to sea, with a single eye to the public good. With some we suppose, it will receive but little favor—but we shall be untiring in our exertions to render it useful and interesting."

A case similar to the above, has recently occurred in the western part of this State. A paper was established in Greenfield, about six months since, under the title of Freedom's Sentinel. It was commenced at Greenfield, under the patronage of antimasonry. They professed to have in view, (says the Albany Record,) the establishment of a paper, that should be accessible to a free and full discussion of the causes and reasonableness of the excitement on the subject of Freemasonry. They desired, as they declared, a free press, by means of which both sides of the question might be heard, and all information, necessary to a correct opinion, laid before the public. They disclaimed the desire of a purely antimasonic party paper, and only wished for one impartial and independent. To such an one they promised liberal support; and many of those who were not engaged in the excitement, many Masons were willing to encourage it, hoping that a free discussion would have a tendency to allay the public excitement. This course was marked out, and these principles avowed in the prospectus of the Sentinel. The editor, whatever may have been his individual opinions, held them for himself, and took no part in the controversy, only pledging himself to maintain a strict impartiality between his correspondents. This pledge, we know, he has hitherto redeemed. His columns have been open, without partiality or preference to decent communications from either party. Masons, indeed, have not much availed themselves of the opportunity. The controversy has been chiefly with the antis; but whether they have gained any advantage by it is a question in itself debatable. At any rate, they have had all that they asked or engaged for. But it now appears that, under this specious show of candor it was intended to hide the real features of the antimasonic beast. The leaders of the pack hoped to control the operations of this free press, and make it as entirely subservient as their other fettered and abject organs of foul-mouthed slander. They hoped to make it strictly an antimasonic free press—"freely open in favor of a few disinterested office-seekers and their deluded followers, and as freely closed against all others." But the editor was one of too much sense, spirit, and independence to be thus enslaved. When, therefore, it was found that they could not induce him to violate his pledge to the public, they hesitated not to forfeit their pledges to him; since they could not make him their tool, they resolved to make him their sacrifice. He has accordingly been denounced by the antisocial fraternity for having dared to publish a free press. Happy is it that antimasonry contains in itself an antidote to its poison, and that in its own excesses are sown the seeds of its destruction. We make a few extracts from the editor of the Sentinel's expose of the proceedings of the antimasons in relation to his paper; and trust that his appeal to the "friends of principle," will not be made in vain to the citizens of Franklin county.

"Previous to our location in this town, we had a very imperfect view of antimasonry, as it is. We were acquainted with some antimasons, but they were not of the genuine stamp—they were generally, pure-minded and honest, like a particular class of antimasons, which we have alluded to above, in this vicinity. How remarkable the contrast, whenever we compare them with the conscientious, disinterested, pious office-and-honor-seekers, and the heterogeneous mass, who are always ready to "cry aloud and spare not," when they sound the alarm. Setting aside a few candid gentlemen belonging to that party, of what is antimasonry composed? It is made up of those who feel a peculiar itching, either for themselves or particular friends, and of a deluded multitude who are used as tools for effecting the desired object.

"None who are not intimately acquainted with the trials through which we have had to pass, can form an estimate of our feelings at the brutal treatment we have received at the hands of certain creatures in the shape of human beings, under the garb of friendship. Nor shall we trouble our readers with a relation of facts which could not but be disgusting to their feelings, and tend to raise doubts as to the existence of consistency and honesty in their fellow men. And to bring this disgusting subject to a close, we will only add, that our opinion of Masonry has never changed; but of antimasonry we must say our opinion has changed, as we have become acquainted with its principles, or rather, its spirit. We have judged it by its fruits.

"It has always been our earnest desire to publish a paper, which might in the full sense of the phrase, be denominated a FREE PRESS. It was our intention to publish such a paper, when we commenced Freedom's Sentinel in this town. At that time, we accordingly declined taking part for or against Masonry, or advocating the tenets of one denomination of christians to the exclusion of others. Thus we expected each sect and party would have the best opportunity of keeping their own "fountain pure." In the principal part of an enlightened community we believe this course has been perfectly satisfactory. But there are some, who, though perhaps not overburdened with talent, and certainly not with candor, yet are remarkably gifted in the art of making a noise and doing not a little mischief. These gentlemen do not consider a press FREE, unless it will confine itself to ONE SIDE of a question. Consequently, they are now making a great outcry about our paper, because it is not FREE! To other words, because it is not devoted to their wishes and interests. Under these circumstances, it became necessary, either to pursue a course which we considered consistent with the character of a free press; or to become the conductor of what THEY call a free press—a mere echo of THEIR voices—an instrument of unrelenting persecution, to advocate their interests on all occasions, without regard to honor or principle. Thus situated, we have taken the liberty to inform them, in language which cannot be mistaken, that "—We wear not the shackles of slaves." How ambitious men will relish this course, we do not know; but we believe we shall be sustained by the honorable and virtuous, without distinction of sect or party.

"We hope we shall be favored with such an addition to our present patronage as will enable us, notwithstanding the malign spirit which is arrayed against us; to march onward with renewed vigor. The friends of principle are particularly requested to aid us, by their personal exertions or their influence. That additional efforts will be made to withdraw and prevent future patronage, we have no doubt; but we submit the case to the good sense of an enlightened community, on whose wishes and exertions, the decision will in a great measure depend."

We understand that a worthless, strolling mountebank by the name of Allyn, was permitted to exhibit himself, and to play the fool to a large number of very foolish people, "at the Baptist meeting house! in Canton," on the 14th instant! Now, we care not a rush how much money these vagrants may swindle out of the simpletons who run after them. But we do protest against the prostitution of our churches, to such base and villanous purposes; as a libel on the religion we profess; and a scandal to Him, to whom our places of public worship are solemnly dedicated. The Church is called the House of God. Our Baptist friends call it so. What right had they then to prostitute it to the base purpose of a profane and sacrilegious exhibition? Did they believe that the blasphemy of Avery Allen would be acceptable to the Almighty? No! They did not believe this—they could not believe it. This is the first instance in New England, of the pollution of a church by any antimasonic exhibitions: and we trust it will be the last.

ANECDOTE.—We are told that a certain member of the "Suffolk Antimasonic Committee," more noted for his swaggering impudence, than for his intelligence or liberality—called in at one of our bookstores, the other day, and enquired for ink-powder. He was shown some of Lauriat's; on the wrappers of which were several chemical emblems; a retort, &c. On perceiving these, the sagacious gentleman indignantly shrugged up his shoulders & exclaimed: "Ah! there's Masonry!—Preference in trade!—preference in trade!" and walked out of the store, muttering that he would not buy masonic ink at any rate! We would advise our friend Lauriat to dispense with his chemical emblems, (since antimasonic erudition cannot distinguish the difference between a hawk and a handsaw), and to substitute the longest-eared Jackass that Dearborn can engrave. It is very evident that antimasons have fully determined not to patronize any, other than their own species and kindred.

Antimasonry going down stream.—A western paper states that, a certain lumberman on the St. Lawrence river, conspicuous only for his opposition to Masonry, refused to take an old and experienced pilot to run over the Long Sault, because he was a Mason. He accordingly took an inexperienced antimason, who ran the raft high and dry on Crab Island.—This fool-hardiness cost the lumberman one hundred dollars! Bigotry and superstition find their own reward.

AS IT SHOULD BE.

Mr. Editor,—Since the patrons of newspapers expect to be told all things, which may occasion "a great talk in their times;" please inform them that, on the 17th of June last, in Arkansas territory, or Iberville, La. (for the papers are not definite as to place,) two "learned Thebans," philosophers! or Doctors, by the names of Jeffries and Smith, concerted together to commit the crime of murder; and then with pistols, at the distance of six feet apart, with deliberate malice and ferocity, murdered each other. Fortunately, both are dead; for thereby the disgrace incident to cowards, infidels and murderers, has been escaped; and the expenses of a halter have been saved to the State. PETER PENSE.

FRENCH EXPEDITION.—The late arrival from England, at this port, brings intelligence of the landing of the troops of the Expedition at Sadi Ferack, near Algiers. It appears the fleet had come in sight of the Algerine coast on the 30th May, 5 or 6 leagues off, and was compelled to put off again by gales and hazy weather. The elements continuing unfavorable, the fleet put into the Port of Palma, where it remained till the 11th of June. The debarkation commenced at 4 o'clock on the 14th. A telegraphic despatch of this date, states: "All the troops are now ashore. The enemy has been driven from the position which he had taken up in the rear, and the division Berthezene has taken nine guns and two mortars. The road to the west of Sadi Ferack is good, and the fleet should remain there at anchor."

A Despatch from the Admiral of the same date says, "The fleet anchored yesterday in the Bay of Sadi. The whole army landed to-day, and now occupy the heights in front of the peninsula. We have taken possession of the the enemies batteries. The head quarters are at Turretta Chica."

We much fear, from the various accounts that have reached us, says a Portsmouth paper of the 19th, that the whole of the crews of the two French sloops of war which were wrecked at Algiers, with the exception of about 12, who have taken refuge with the British consul, have been murdered. The Bedouins killed several of the crew, on their route from the point at which they were wrecked, to Algiers—upwards of 60, who reached that city, were thrown into prison—subsequently paraded about, subject to every ignominy, and then were beheaded on the ramparts, in sight of the French blockading ships. It appears that the Dey of Algiers meditates a retreat, as the men at arms, of all descriptions that he can muster, amount to less than 25,000.

THE WEATHER.

● For the Masonic Mirror.

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF THE "BOSTON BARD."

Gently sleep, thou lorn one here,
Minstrel,—rest thee, worn and weary;
Gently sleep thou lorn one here,
Though thy couch be chill and dreary.

Minstrel, how I pitied thee,
While o'er the foaming billows bounding,
Half a wreck, and far at sea,
And black'ning tempests thick surrounding.

Hadst thou the anchor of the ark,
So freely given, yet wrought so dearly,
Thy half-unmann'd and fragile bark,
Had rode secure, and that right cheerly.

Stars bestud the eastern sky,
And fade as glooms give place to dawning;
Save one bright star that rides on high,
And shames the glory of the morning.

O Robert, had that lucid star
Beam'd on thine eye with half its vigor,
Thou hadst not dragg'd thy life so far,
Nor felt its ills with half their rigor.

No cheering beams of hope arose
In thy dark breast, so prone to boding,
But mid night dreams of coming woes
Lurk'd there, like canker-worms corroding.

Woke not thy harp to cheerful lays,
As sweet Aurora brought the dawning,
And larks rose up to meet its rays,
And linnets hail'd the beauteous morning.

If e'er thy griefs thou lack'st to day,
Too often thou would'st go and borrow;
Minstrel, too oft thou gav'st away
Thy golden harp to thrilling sorrow.

But gently sleep, thou favorite name,
I would not wake thee back to weeping;
The star, the star of Bethlehem
Caught thy dim eye—in hope thou'rt sleeping.

FLORIO.

From the New York American.

MR. EDITOR:—I do not remember anything which has produced so pleasing an impression on my mind as the little story which is said to have been told by the late Dr. Godman to his friends; of the boy who was about to fall from the rigging, and was saved only by the mate's impressive exclamation, "Look aloft, you lubber." The story and the application were somewhat in the style of Dr. Franklin, and would not have been unworthy of his fame. The following verses cannot claim the merit of the slightest originality, but their insertion will amply reward the author, if they recall the anecdote which prompted them, or enforce its beautiful morality.

LOOK ALOFT.

In the tempest of life, when the wave and the gale
Are around and above, if thy footing should fail—
If thine eye should grow dim, and thy caution depart—
"Look aloft" and be firm, and be fearless of heart.

If the friend who embraced in prosperity's glow,
With a smile for each joy and a tear for each woe,
Should betray thee when sorrow like clouds are array'd,
"Look aloft" to the friendship that never shall fade.

Should the visions which hope spreads in light to thine eye
Like the tints of the rainbow, brightened to fly,
Then turn, and thro' tears of repentant regret
"Look aloft" to the sun that is never to set.

Should they who are dearest, the son of thy heart—
The wife of thy bosom—in sorrow depart,

"Look aloft" from the darkness and dust of the tomb,
To that soil where "affection is ever to bloom."

And oh! when death comes, in terrors to cast
His fears on the future, his pall on the past,
In that moment of darkness, with hope in thy heart,
And a smile in thine eye, "look aloft" and depart.

MISCELLANY.

AFRICAN CELEBRATION.

MR. EDITOR.—I hab de plesure and de satisfaction to inform yon ob de particulars which happened at de celebration ob de independence ob dis country, down to de Liberial Hotel in dis city. De companny was all provided wid a pocket pistol, and dey fired in de day at sunrise. At 2 o'clock de procession gan to form, and among dem was some ob de fust peple ob culler in dis city. Dey den proceded to de large room in de hotell, and set down to an elegant orashum, delivered by Phillip Spontem, Esquare, de beginning ob which was as follers:—

"De fire ob genus dat ellebate one max above nis brudder is inherunt in de bosum of dat man what possesses him. Genus may be fanned as de fire is fanned into de blaze; it may be culterbated as de lobely rose is culterbated; but if dere be not one spark ob de fire ob genus, den you cant make him blaze, or if dere be no rose bush, den you cant make him blow out and expand. De brack man hab genus as well as de wite man, and de reasun genus no get out ob de brack man is cause he head so tick he no let him."

Arter dis fust rate arashum, de company set down to a grand dinner, and arter de oil cloth was took away, de follering toasts was drunk:

By John Squasheye. De day we cellerbrate—May its annural return be met by tree grin from de peple ob culler.

Mr. Crookshank got up and begged de libberty to gib a toast dat was gibben before. Our frind and brudder Shinnul Jackson—We no care how many Ingion he kill so long as he let de peple ob culler set under dere own vine and ete up dere own fig tre.

By Thomas Ticklip. Retrencement—Here Sambo, skin dat flint, and mine you no spile more dan six jacknife.

By Charles Woolhead. Our brack gubburners—May we nebber hab de mortification agin ob habbing anudder brack gubburner dat steal chicken and leave he cain wid he name ont in he hen coop.

By Benj. Bigfoot. May we nebber hab enny more President dat will put his bigto (or what you call it) on eternal impruvement.

By Isaac Chucklehead. De President ob Hayty—De gratest man dat eber libbed in de annimals ob anshunt or modurn history.

Mr. Lovejoy got up and sed de wite folks alwas forgot de fair till de lass ting, and he propose to gib dem a toast. De Fair—More butiful dan de sunflour, and amell more sweet dan de dandylyon, and as modest as Massa FINNIS, dat alwas put he name to de end ob ebery book he write.

By John Flatnose. Shinnul Jackson—He berry good for Packing-hams, and packing-cottons, and dat all he good for.

By Pompey Crosseye. Anty Masons and Anty Blacsmiths—I spose dey tink as Sanco Panzy did, dat dey will gobbern an Island if dey help dere Massa Don Quicksote fite de win-mills.

By Simon Standstill. De Milletary—Dey are de fust in war, and de fust in peace, and may dey nebber stick dere baggernets into de hearts of dere country.

By Fredric Soreshin. Anty Masonry—De Politycal hobby-horse he so poor now dat de brack man can see trough him, and de crows refuse to take him.

I hab not bin able to git'all ob de toasts, but dese here wat I send you I hope you will print for de edderfuration ob de peple ob culler.

And den de tables was cleared, and de rooms swept, and de ball commenced at de fust lightning ob de candles. De ball was kep up til a late our, and was graced by all de buty and fashun ob de culler peple ob de city, and good many from udder places, ticularly * * *. De band under Cato, played de most delitesum music for de dancin which was cotilleums, dat being de most genteal. One brack exsquisit, I bleave you call um, from York, propose to dance de waltz, but Cato sed dat Massa Pek ob de Tryad, had denoused de waltz as lassiveus, and he was so respectable he mus be obade, and he was de special frend ob de brack man, and wud be mortally fended if de rules ob decorum was fringed upon. But some say dey wud hab a little waltz, cause dey had herd dat de fust peple ob culler in York and Philumadelfy and Bosson danced de waltz, and Cato was obliged to gib up, notwithstanding his respect for Massa Pek. De ebening vaperated widout any markable accident, excep one lady faint when she sea one brack nigger stick he dirty foot in de room widout any shoo nor token on, oderwise de ebening was spent in de utmost serenity. Arter many engagements ob de tender kind was made by faithful lobar, who neber prove so unsartin, like wite man, de company broke up at an erley our, and retired to dere home in de utmost confusion and geod order.

LATIN QUOTATON.—A rustic, who had been put to law expenses by a brutal landlord, complained of it to a village schoolmaster. "Never mind him," said the pedagogue, he is known to be "sui generis." "I know he did sue I," replied Hodge, "but I never heard he was generous in all my life."

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

MOORE & SEVEY, 46, WASHINGTON ST.

HENRY P. LEWIS, PRINTER.

From the Hampshire Sentinel.

TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

RENOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.
No. 1.

Sir.—Having volunteered as a leader in the crusade against Masons, and having causelessly assailed the reputation, and disturbed the quiet of your former friends and patrons, you are therefore entitled to especial notice. Permit a humble imitator of your former example to approach your reverence in the attitude of an inquirer, earnestly hoping that you may be able to remove from his mind, the doubts and difficulties that embarrass it, as to your strangely inconsistent conduct. I have been taught, Sir, to reverence the character of the minister of Christ, and bitter, indeed is my grief, when I behold this sacred officer prostituted to partisan and selfish purposes. The sacerdotal robe ill becomes the noisy demagogue, or wily politician. What an infinite departure from the example of the Grand High Priest of our religion is your recent conduct. When or where, did He encourage sedition, or incite one class of men against another? When or where, did He interfere with the long established civil institutions of the country? Other motives than those of patriotism, other motives than those of religion, must have influenced your recent unprecedented conduct. For what fellowship have the mild precepts of religion, with the inflammatory principles of Antimasonry, and what communion has the spirit of the Gospel with the spirit of insubordination! As well as you, Sir, I have passed the initiatory degrees; as well as you, I have gone under the living arch, and passed within the veils; and as well as you, have been elected to the High Priest's office, and presided over the labors of worthy companions. But, unlike you, Sir, I never "wept in secret over the enormity of masonic oaths," and openly prayed for the prosperity of the institution. Unlike you, I never solicited masonic charity, and then reproached the institution as selfish and unprincipled. Unlike you, I never "groaned in spirit," and urged my brethren to summon special meetings for my especial benefit. Unlike you, "the love of distinction" neither prompted me to advance in masonry, nor has it yet prompted me to renounce and denounce an institution as fraught with danger to the public security, and full of filiness and guilt, which I had before eulogized as the "handmaid of religion" and the patron of every virtue. And may God of his infinite mercy grant, that I may never become so utterly abandoned, as to turn traitor to my best friends, and denounce, in strains of bitter malediction, my former companions and neighbors. From the foregoing remarks, you will perceive, Sir, that I shall speak from knowledge, and not from conjecture, from intimate and thorough acquaintance, and not from doubtful or imperfect testimony. You will bear with me, and hear my complaints as those of an aggrieved brother, yet feeling himself bound by the solemn obligation of promises voluntarily incurred, and not yet sufficiently enlightened to feel emancipated from the responsibility of oaths, deliberately assumed in the presence of God. Permit me to say, Sir, that your former example exerted a prodigious influence. Wherever you went, you were bold and fearless in the cause.—Men witnessed your untiring zeal, heard your earnest prayers for the prosperity of Masonry, saw your blameless life, and gave you credit for honest intentions, not doubting your sincerity; and many were, therefore, induced, not only to think favorably of the institution, but actually to become its members. And these men still continue active and faithful members, not having the same facilities as your reverence, to renounce conscience, duty and obligations. You now unblushingly assure us, that your "conscience reproved you all this time," and that you often "groaned in spirit." You must have been singularly constituted, admitting this as true, for your actions proclaimed you an enthusiastic admirer of masonry. You prayed, exhorted, commended, preached and labored, while, it would seem, you "groaned in spirit." How happens it that this mental distress never manifested itself? Had you no kind friend, into whose bosom you might pour your sorrows, and provoke compassion? Who, Sir, is so very a dolt as to believe this? "Actions speak louder than words." "Circumstances cannot lie." What was your conduct during this period, ah, and professions too? Did your conscience reprove you, when you hasted from step to step, and from degree to degree, uniformly expressing the most unqualified approbation of their spirit and tendency? If your conscience did, indeed, reprove you, how happens it that your attendance was so constant, when you had the best of apologies for absence, in the dissatisfaction of your people?

At almost every communication of both Chapter and Lodge, your voice was heard, imploring the blessings of heaven upon Masons and Masonry. Is this evidence that you "groaned in spirit?" Is this evidence, that conscience reprove your deeds, and continually sounded in your ears her prohibitory admonitions? A most singularly constituted conscience, truly, to perceive clearly the iniquity of a certain course of measures and conduct, and at the same time, recommend in the strongest terms, both by precept and example, the same measures and conduct to the approbation and adoption of others. Did your conscience reprove you, Sir, when you were receiving the charities of the institution? Did it reprove you, when you earnestly recommended an appropriation of masonic funds, for the endowment of an asylum for the orphan children of Masons? Did it reprove you when you travelled two or three hundred miles to take the orders of knighthood?—Did it reprove you, when in the excess of zeal, you conferred a masonic degree upon certain ladies? Did it reprove you, when you manfully resisted the temptations to apostacy, held out to you at your former residence? Comparing your present declarations with your former conduct, and there appears abundant cause not only for "weeping in secret," and "groaning in spirit," but for loud lamentation, and public confession and humiliation. Full well can I credit the assertion, that you "could not sleep nights," in view of this contrast. If there be a final and just retribution, the designing hypocrite has, indeed, just cause for "trembling." A pillow of thorns would, indeed, be down itself, and Procrustes' bed the softest eider compared with this sleepless conscience, this vital and undying principle of rectitude, wantonly and cruelly aggrieved. Permit me now, Sir, to inquire, wherefore this sudden, this amazing change in your conduct? Do you pretend, that you have received "new light," that you were deceived in your former estimate of the nature and tendency of Masonry? You cannot. You say you "groaned in spirit," and "wept privately," even while yet a youth in Masonry. You can pretend then no new discovery of wickedness, and mask your recreant apostacy under that. Should you offer this pretence as an apology for deserting, Judas like, your former friends, and principles, and practices, it would be idle in the extreme. It might, indeed, pass current with the uninitiated, well seasoned with sanctimonious groans, and hypocritical regrets and tears, but with the well informed Mason, it would meet with its merited reward, and receive a conspicuous place with the chants "wept in private" and "groaned in spirit." Lift up your mask, Sir, and for once, look an honest man in the face. You and I know, that such a pretence is wholly gratuitous. You and I know that any man of common sense is competent to understand the nature and tendency of all the masonic degrees, as soon as he has taken them. You and I know, that there is no dark, and hidden, and mysterious meaning in the lectures and work, when explained, as they always are, and it is utter knavery to pretend it. You and I know, that many parts of the obligations are not considered as literally binding, and are so explained, and modified, at the time of their caption. I am constrained, Sir, to consider all your apologies which have hitherto reached me, as unsatisfactory, and failing entirely to justify your recent course, as a reasonable, not to say, pious man. I would gladly exonerate you from the damning charge of moral treason; I would gladly exculpate you from the miserable guilt of hypocrisy and double dealing; I would fain award to you the boon of honest intentions, if permitted by the irresistible force of "circumstances that cannot lie." I would fain attribute your secession to conviction of duty, and your present slanderous career to the hope of doing good. But, Sir, I cannot. You have yourself closed forever all avenues of retreat. You say your "conscience reprove you" even, when most zealous in the cause, and that you "groaned in spirit," while the language of praise was upon your lips. It is manifest, that no one but the most arrant and heartless hypocrite, admitting the above to be facts, could have performed the acts you did. Your brethren, even the most scrutinizing of them, were thoroughly deceived as to your character. They thought you, what you seemed, "honest in the sacred cause;" they listened to your prayers, as if they came from the heart, and dwelt upon the language of your lips, as if addressed to the Deity, in humble and earnest faith. But, if your present declarations be true, how was their confidence imposed on, how was the office of prayer prostituted, and how was the Majesty of heaven mocked and insulted.

Yours, &c.

ROYAL ARCH.

We are not quite so old as some of our antediluvian ancestors, having only come into this 'breathing world' somewhat more than a quarter of a century since, yet during the best half of our existence, we have been a pretty interested 'looker on in Venice' of the things that have been going on. We have seen some strange things in the political world. We have witnessed some fierce political contests—some, indeed, that seemed for a while almost to shake our state—even our Union, to its centre: but in all these we have seen nothing so disgusting, nothing so unprincipled, so wicked, violent, and daring, as political antimasonry. It, in its course, 'distances' all the violence, proscription, slander and vulgarity, that we have ever seen, in the worst of times. What it will lead to, unless, indeed, it should, as we hope and believe it certainly will, by its own violence, destroy itself, we cannot pretend to predict. We shall leave that for the reflection of some of our honest citizens who have been led astray by such an ignis fatuus. We trust they will reflect upon it. Let them pause a moment before they assist further to fan a flame which may consume the liberties of our country.

CONVENTIONAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER I.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE ANTIMASONIC STATE CONVENTION OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Sufficient time having elapsed since, your assembly convened, for the designs of unprincipled men to unfold themselves, for the angry passions of bad men to cool, and for the collected reflections of good men to weigh the probable tendencies of such assemblies, it may not be an entire waste of time to call your attention to some considerations which, probably, have never yet presented themselves to your minds.

It is a subject of too grave a character, to be treated with levity; of two important a character, in its consequences, to be discussed with passion. The fact that you have considered it of sufficient importance to call a State Convention, and have prepared to hold a National Convention, renders it unnecessary to enforce on you the consideration that it is truly, in your estimation, and may be in its consequences, an affair of magnitude. When men become heated in the affairs of a party, the causes which produced a common interest and a common effort, are often forgotten in the adoption of new views and new measures, that lead to excesses altogether unforeseen and uncontrollable. The moderate measures of honest and intelligent men give place to the violent excesses of partizan feelings, put in operation by an accession of numbers from hope of private benefit, perhaps from assurances of personal aggrandizement. God has seen fit, in his Providence, so to constitute human beings, that they differ as much in matters of principle as in matters of taste. The affairs of men must, therefore, in the very nature of things, be various, as climate and constitutional varieties are different. Laws, religion, morals and social intercourse, cannot be assimilated more than the arrangements of domestic economy. Least of all can it be expected that there can well be a similarity in social intercourse. Public opinion will always give direction to this, but violent measures never; whether they come in the form of legal enactments, or the open & violent denunciations of partizan measures. After all, the injury done to individuals, by a course of proscriptive measures, is of minor consequence, compared with the injury done to the public, in weakening confidence in the protection of laws, & faith in the stability of our free institutions. It is impossible that any considerable, intelligent portion of our citizens should be long exposed to repeated and continued obloquy and reproach, without producing, if not open resistance, at least that prudent course of measures which shall insure some modification of their real or supposed injuries. And the best men, when goaded on by long continued persecution, are sometimes induced, such is the infirmity of our nature, to measure their defence by their passions, rather than the occasion that called it forth. No good citizen, therefore, will lightly consent to enter on the work of reformation by measures to the violent convulsions of popular assemblies. What might be done, under the direction of dispassionate and intelligent men, will inevitably be defeated by the projects of unprincipled and ambitious demagogues, who are ever ready to seize on popular occasions to promote their general views.

He is not a wise observer of human affairs who does not discover the wisdom of the remark, that "public conventions are liable to all the infirmities, follies and vices of private men." Suppose then that the infirmity, folly or vice of an individual is witnessed in his inveterate propensities for political gambling; suppose that such person obtains a decided and paramount influence in the councils of a public convention, founded on popular excitement; and suppose this individual has views of personal aggrandizement which may be promoted through the influence of that assembly: can it, for a moment, be doubted whether he will seize on the fair opportunity to promote his own views? The case which is now merely hypothetical may become history. Mark, I conjure you, that I say it may become history; and heaven grant that my fear be not prophetic. But the time will come, inevitably it will come, when events will prove that they were not wholly unfounded. The political horizon, now chequered with every variety of uncertain form, will yet assume an aspect of such decided character, that it will not need the wisdom of inspiration to interpret its significance, nor extraordinary capacity to comprehend its tendency. The warning voice, which now comes upon your ear unheeded, may then be remembered, to mingle with the death-knell of your free institutions, perhaps of your liberties. The invasion of individual rights is not a mere private injury. The whole people suffer in their rights when the individual suffers.—He, whose rights are violated with impunity, is virtually absorbed from the very obligation of the social compact: for the condition on which an individual submits to the will of the people, expressed through the constitution and laws, is, that he is to receive protection from that people in his personal rights. Be reminded, that less formidable combinations than yours, with far less asperity of feeling and violence of measures, have laid the foundation for the bloodiest revolutions that have desolated the earth. Civil society cannot for a moment exist, and civil liberty cannot long exist, unless honest differences of opinion are not only tolerated but firmly protected. Men always lose their liberties in detail. The most ambitious tyrant never dared to grasp them all at once; and that beginning is the most dangerous which enlists popular excitement to accomplish its purposes.

ARCHITECTUS.

HEMAN ALLEN, Esq.—This gentleman, for having declined the honor of being held up to his fellow-citizens as a candidate for office, by such a disgraceful faction as the antimasonic, has become the subject of abuse and calumny. The vials of wrath have been emptied upon his head. The following will explain the matter.

TO THE PUBLIC.

It has seldom happened, I believe, in political warfare, that the mere act of declining an unsolicited nomination to office,—has formed, even a subject of complaint, much less, to have exposed the party, to the grossest imputation and abuse. Such, however, seems to have been my unfortunate lot, in the affair, of the antimasonic nominations, for the office of Governor, for this State, as appears, by the above article.

Coming then directly to the point, I declare, without fear of contradiction, that both the nominations in question, were made without my knowledge, or consent. As to the first, I was not consulted at all,—and as to the last, in reply to an enquiry on the subject, I gave not only a decided negative, but stated, that if put in nomination, I should certainly decline.

Here, I had very justly supposed, the matter would rest, and it was not until, about a week, after the adjournment of the Convention, that I learned by the public papers, that my name, had again been brought forward. Presuming that official information of the fact, would be given me, I waited about two weeks longer, for that purpose, instead of a month,—when, none having arrived, I lost no time, in publishing my refusal. The insinuations, that during this time, I was settling preliminaries at Craftsbury, is alike destitute of truth,—for, it so happens, that after a visit to my friends at Irasburg, I returned to Burlington, on the very day, that the antimasonic Convention, assembled at Montpelier,—and have not since visited, either Craftsbury, or that part of the State.

It is my misfortune, perhaps, that I can neither claim the distinction, of masonry, or antimasonry,—but, whatever my views upon that subject, may be, I trust, that those, who best know me, will have some difficulty in believing, that I could ever have imparted them, thus unreservedly to a stranger. Unless, I am greatly deceived in my own character, I am not much in the habit of intermeddling with the affairs of others,—having always found sufficient employment, in taking care of my own. But, these insinuations, are in perfect good keeping, with the absurdity and injustice, that pervades the residue of the article, which deals in conclusions, without premises, and scurrility and abuse, without measure.

In taking a final leave, of this subject, I cannot repress, the expression, of the deepest regret, that I should have thus been compelled to obtrude myself, upon the notice of my fellow citizens. Circumstances, of a most extraordinary nature, and the vindication, of my character and conduct, must be my apology. I came back, to reside in my native State, with perfect good feelings towards all, which I shall still, endeavor to cultivate, so far, as reciprocity, and my own ideas of happiness, will permit.

'We have now done with this gentleman,' says the author of this article. If, by the term we, is to be understood, either the individuals themselves, or the party, to which they belong, I accept the adieu, without any regret,—in either case, it is an acquaintance, I never sought, and feel no pride in preserving,—indeed, I very readily yield them all the advantage of it—for they seem to have finished with me, long before I even thought of beginning with them.

HEMAN ALLEN.

Burlington, 20th July, 1830.

TO THE REV. CALES EASTERBROOKS.

It is by the title of Reverend (as I perceive by the proceedings of a meeting lately held in the town of Russia, which were published in a paper self-styled 'Republican Farmers' Free Press' of the 16th ult.) you are called; and by that designation I suppose I am bound to address you. It is not my present purpose to enter into any discussion with you or any other professed minister of the gospel, in relation to the subject of your reported remarks to the meeting convened on the occasion; my object being to ask for a little more light concerning one of the 'many reasons' which have brought you to the conclusion that Masonry is a corrupt, wicked, and dangerous institution, which is this—you stated, so says your printed speech, that 'another case was that of a Grand Jury in this county,' and you 'had it directly from the mouth of a juror himself, (and he is well known to the inhabitants of this town, as a man of unimpeachable character and integrity;) who stated, and does now state to any person who may ask him, that he was on the Grand Jury for Herkimer county, when a complaint was made against a man who is a Mason.' &c.

The name, Sir, of the juror, the man of unimpeachable character and integrity who you say is your informant, is wanted. You must be aware, in making the above assertion, that you have assailed the purity of our judicial tribunals; you have gravely made a charge which affects materially the exalted character of our jurisprudence.—Name your informant, that the truth of your assertion may be established beyond doubt or cavil. Should you refuse this most reasonable request, then you must be deemed the author of the story, you must farther it; in which case name time, place and circumstance. Deal not Sir, in blind allusions and dark surmises upon a subject so all important as the free, unbiassed and unpolluted administration of justice is to the people of this county.

On your refusal or compliance, will depend the future credit to be given to your statements; and a letter addressed to the editor of this paper, containing the name of the juror, will be deemed by me, and probably by the public, sufficient justification on your part for the assertion you have made.

Yours, &c.

Little Falls, N. Y. Friend.

JUSTICE.

'Let it be remembered that the masonic Juror, Jonathan Ayre, to whom the People's Counsel objected, held out 36 hours, (against the clearest evidence of guilt,) for the acquittal of his mystic brethren.'

The above is from the Albany Journal, and is, no doubt, an 'average specimen' of antimasonic truth. If one man on that jury, alluding we presume, to the trial of Wright and Brown, procured their acquittal, what must the people think of the remaining eleven, who had sworn to render a 'true verdict according to evidence'—and that evidence, according to the Journal, was clear as to their guilt! They must of course be judged guilty of perjury—or, the statement in the Journal is false. The latter presumption is the most natural one and without doubt, the true one.

The Sag Harbor [L. I.] Corroctor of the 18th May last says, 'we find the following singular notice in the last Nashville [Tenn.] Banner:

CHURCH AND STATE.—The citizens of Nashville are requested to meet at the court house, on Monday evening next at seven o'clock, to adopt measures to effect the speedy extermination of Presbyterianism from this most enlightened, catholic and magnanimous commonwealth.'

We copy the above for the purpose of showing the natural tendency of the principle and policy adopted by the 'antimasonic party.' Renouncing masons and their friends call meetings and organize 'a party' for the speedy 'extermination of Masonry.'—The thing takes—a party is formed, and the 'leaders' get into office by the means.—In Tennessee an excitement has grown out of the 'Sabbath Mail' question: in its progress it becomes connected with 'Presbyterianism.' Directly a public meeting is called, 'to effect the speedy extermination of Presbyterianism'; and thus an 'Anti-Presbyterian party' is to be organized. In some other places, in the same way, an 'Anti-Catholic party' will spring up; or an Anti-Baptist, or 'Anti-Methodist party.' Now we wish to invite the attention of the religious public to this subject. It deserves deliberate examination. We ask, is it right to organize political parties upon such grounds? We ask the honest, the conscientious, the enlightened, the patriotic, the pious antiamason—Is it right? To what will it inevitably lead? If the opponent of Masonry use it to day, the opponent of religion may use it to-morrow. If party be a proper instrument to exterminate masonry, it would be equally efficacious to exterminate intemperance, and it might be used for a thousand similar objects.

But experience has ever shown the inadequacy of such means for the attainment of such ends. Man may be persuaded when he will not be coerced. Probably a majority of the antimasonic party in this county belong to the Baptist and Anti Burgher churches. All these are protestants, and many of them are not convinced of the great errors of popery, but entertain the strongest abhorrence of it. How easy would it be to enlist such persons into an Anti Papist party! Recent occurrences would favor the undertaking. The Pope has just sent a large number of priests and immense sums of money to promote the Roman Catholic faith in this country. How anti-scriptural and anti-republican! And only let half the pains be taken by public meetings, newspapers, almanacks, &c. &c. to excite fears and feelings and action upon this subject, which have been taken in behalf of antimasonry, and we should have 'excitement' enough. A large and efficient party would be readily formed. But, again, we enquire would this be right? Certainly not! It is inconsistent with the spirit of our free constitution and the genius of our free institutions. Here Liberty dwells. Here even 'Error is tolerated,' for here both scripture and reason are free to combat it.

DARING OUTRAGE!!

In the town of Barrington, in this State, a most disgraceful scene was transacted on Sunday the 27th ult.—The Rev. Mr. Prentice, (who is a seceding Mason of Providence,) was employed by the society worshipping in that place, to dispense to them the word of life. At the hour of meeting, Capt. Sylvester Allyn, a Royal Arch Mason, placed himself near the pulpit with a brace of pistols in his hands, and declared that if Mr. Prentice attempted to go into the pulpit, he would give him the contents of one of the pistols which he held in his hand, which he said was loaded. The congregation who were in the house at the time became alarmed, and a number of them, especially the female part, dispersed, and informed Mr. P. who was then in the neighborhood, of the threatening attitude of this man, and he prudently declined going to the Meeting House. Allyn has been taken into custody and put under five hundred dollar bonds for his appearance at the court in September next to be holden in Bristol.

'Capt. Allyn, as we learn, has since declared that Mr. Prentice shall not enter that pulpit as long as he is a Royal Arch Mason. The public can judge from this transaction, what spirit the devotees of Masonry exercise towards their seceding brethren.

'We are aware of the fact, however, that there is a contention in Barrington among the members of this society respecting their funds and the Meeting House.

'We are also informed that this Capt. Allyn, some time last winter, wrote an article for publication, calumniating Rev. Joel Mann, in a very abusive and malignant strain, but was afraid to have it published until it was inspected by a Lawyer to see if it contained libellous matter, for which he might be called to an account.

'Since the above was in type, we have been informed, that Samuel M. Fowler, the editor of the Pawtucket Chronicle, who was in Warren at the time of the transaction, has boasted before several persons in Pawtucket, that Allyn came to Warren for the purpose of borrowing a pair of pistols, and that he obtained them for him.'

Any man not wilfully blind, will discover by reading the above, that it is a real raw head and bloody bones story, got up by some worthless scoundrel, to amuse children with. The article carries with it every mark of falsehood and deception. The writer speaks of being 'informed' thus and so; but gives no satisfactory information on any point, as an honest man would do. If this Capt. Allyn was armed, why is it necessary to add that 'he said the pistols were loaded.' Must this be added to give a reason for leaving the house, and to show that the people were not such cowards as to be frightened at an old gun barrel? If this transaction proceeded solely from 'that spirit which the devotees of Masonry exercise towards their seceding brethren,' why does the writer make the admission that 'We are aware of the fact, however, that there is a contention in Barrington among the members of this society respecting their Funds and the Meeting House?' Why this last quoted mixture of a little truth with a great falsehood, except for a saving clause when his villany should be exposed?

When this freak of a crazy man was first noticed in the Rhode Island papers, nothing was said or thought of as to the connexion of the affair with masonry. But the leading Antis, who are hard run for the means of longer making their deluded followers 'believe a lie,' set about getting up the above ridiculous story.

Now we are informed also by a friend just returned from Rhode Island, that this same Capt. Sylvester Allyn is and has been a seceding Mason for several months past—that he has not committed suicide, as a renouncing clergyman lately has done in the State of New York—but this same Capt. Allyn has been in a deranged state of mind for a considerable time past—that he is interested in the funds of the Meeting House alluded to—that the society is divided on some isms in religion, and that the people have waxed warm on the question of who shall preach, and who has the greatest interest in the church funds, &c.—that on the day alluded to, Captain A. who had been sorely troubled with a crazy man's itching to be 'first in war,' escaped from the watch and care of his friends, and taking an old rusty gun, without powder or ball, showed the good people that "some things can be done as well as others."

These are the facts, as we learn them from good authority. Masonry had nothing to do with this exploit. If the Antis have discovered that their brother was actuated by malice aforethought in this affair, we leave it to these good souls to cast out the evil spirit.

☞ We acknowledge the receipt of a copy of an address delivered at Dudley, on the 24th June. We shall improve an early opportunity to notice it.

ANTIMASONIC HONOR AND CHARITY. In the town of Stoughton, Norfolk County, where antimasonry rages to a considerable degree, one of the Masons and his wife, were taken sick with a fever at the same time; being in low pecuniary circumstances, the masons on the twenty fifth of May last, made him a present in money.—This soon reached the ears of the Antis, and a certain one of them, who is more noted for his obstreperousness than any thing else; who, like the fly that lit upon a horse, thought it not best to let the masons raise more dust than Antis; or, in other words, to have it said that the masons were more charitable than they; took a subscription paper, for the purpose, as he said, of getting some money to assist this sick and distressed family. He called on a number of people, who were friendly to the institution, to which the sick man belonged, and they paid their subscription for the purpose above named. Now, Mr. Editor, the fact is, the sick man and his family have got well and are able to perform their daily labor; but have not received one cent of the subscription that was paid to this benevolent Anti! Query—what subscription money did the Anti take to pay his expenses to Worcester, to get a seceder to deliver an antimasonic address, in Stoughton, on the 5th of July last?

Stoughton, August 8, 1830.

It has been asked, 'why will not the masons give up their odious institution?' For this plain and sensible reason: it would be the surrender of a vested right, which no man or power on earth has a right to take from them; and because it would but whet the appetites of the voracious bloodhounds by whom they are beset for further devastation. If masons yield their rights, the Presbyterians will next be called on to abjure their faith and demolish their churches; the methodist next, and so on until every vestige of morality and virtue is swept from the country. We shudder when we contemplate the consequences to which such an event would lead. Let Christians beware how they act in this emergency. Their turn will inevitably come if success crown this first American war upon the speculative opinions of men.—Eric Observer.

NEW YORK ELECTIONS.—The editor of the Freedonia Censor, speaking of the approaching elections in New York, has the following remark—"For ourselves we have no particular choice between Mr. Throop and Gen. Roost; but we wish for the selection of the one that will be the sure means of defeating the antimasonic party. If we are not now wholly devoted in favour of any party, we are so in opposition to one. We have seen so much of the persecuting, peace destroying principles of political antimasonry that we are convinced; that liberty, justice and equal rights can have no abiding place where it exists.—Therefore we do not hesitate to avow that it is with sole reference to the extermination of this evil in the land that we are desirous of seeing the proper means adopted to effect it. The Jackson men should not be too sanguine of success. The fact cannot be disguised that they have lost strength in N. Y. Albany, and many other large places. A new party coming up under the pretexts of the "working men's party," is well calculated to be sharp bitten and to gain adherents. The antimasons claim to have received seventy thousand votes at the last election; and as their governing principle is to obtain office, and their means to obtain it are falsehood and deception, they will always find enough broken down partisans who have nothing to lose and every thing to gain, to take hold of it as long as there is a prospect of succeeding; but as it is bottomed upon no principle, one thorough defeat would destroy them; their incentive to exertion would be taken away, and before another election should come round they would only be numbered with the things that were, ANTIMASONIC FORGERIES.—The Knaves of antimasonry are circulating two letters, to which they have affixed the name of G. Washington. If this mean Gen. Washington, the letters are base forgeries.

MASONIC MIRROR.

FOURTH OF JULY TOASTS.

The following are selected from many toasts drank at the late celebration of American Independence.

At Wellsburg, Pa.

Liberty of conscience and equal rights—The motto of every American—the last will and testament of our forefathers—the legacy is ours.

At Lancaster, Pa.

Antimasonry—Anti-Republican in its doctrines, selfish in its objects, and proscriptive in its character; it is designed as a political sword in the hands of a few aspiring demagogues and broken down politicians.

At Vienna, Oneida co., N. Y.

Political Antimasonry—A piratical ship under false colors—let it but drop its political character and it vanishes away.

By P. Mahon—Antimasonry in the State of New-York—May its conventions and associations be converted into republican seminaries, to qualify its members and votaries to preserve the liberties and republican institutions of our common country.

By Gen. Carr—Political Antimasons and Fanny Wright men; may that light shine around them as it did round St. Paul; the scales fall from their eyes, and they become honest men.

By S. Curtis—May the sacred principles of human liberty, embodied in the Declaration of Independence, be ever fresh in the memory and hearts of freemen when Antimasonry is no more.

By J. Scott—The American republic—May they be allowed to pursue happiness agreeable to the dictates of free people, political Antimasonry to the contrary notwithstanding.

At Batavia, Genesee co., N. Y.

The friends of toleration and equal rights—May they ever be triumphant over intolerant bigots and persecuting fanatics.

By the President, Hon. S. Cumings—The county of Genesee—Formerly a bright star in the Republican constellation—now eclipsed by the grim visage of political Antimasonry.

By F. Foolett—the leaders of Antimasonry—A gang of Political Pirates—whose sole object is individual aggrandizement, although it be attained at the expense of honor, honesty, and virtue.

At Centreville, Orange co., N. Y.

The State of New-York—Eminent in size, rich in wealth, first in commerce and improvement; her only stain is political Antimasonry.

By J. Mather—Antimasonry—running on the horizontal principle—flat.

At Kingston, Ulster co., N. Y.

By Derick Dubois, Esq. Sheriff—The 'Special' Counsel—He should have taken a special look before he leaped.

At Bath, Steuben co., N. Y.

John C. Spencer—An over match for HIMSELF.

At Royalton, Niagara co. N. Y.

May we ever spurn with an indignant spirit, the men who endeavor to accomplish our ruin by perverting the end of our republican laws.

May time again come, when harmony shall take the place of discord; honorable competition of party extermination, and true republicanism animate every heart.

At Northumberland, Pa.

Antimasonry—The great Hydra by which aspiring demagogues wish to frighten freemen out of their rights.

At Lewisburg, Pa.

Antimasonry—The political hobby-horse, for broken-down office hunters to ride into office on; may we live to see his last kick, and hear his dying groan.

At Carlisle, Pa.

Antimasons—The dregs of corruption, corrupting and corruptible.

In Westmorland co., Pa.

Political Antimasonry—Like the locusts, it may distress the land for forty days, but the first up have already sung themselves out of wind.

At Gaines, Orleans co, Pa.

By Capt. S. Tappan—The new Special Counsel, Victory Birdseye—May he watch the perpetration of crime with Birdseye vigilance, and establish the Victory of the laws over abduction and murder, without the aid of bribery and perjury, as recommended by his predecessor.

At Harrisburgh, Pa.

Antimasonry and Wooden Nutmegs—Twin sisters; the people of Pennsylvania too intelligent to be gulled by such yankee notions.

By Henry D. Overholzer—George Wolfe—He once passed the ordeal of antimasonic persecution. The wise and judicious measures of his administration so far confirm the anticipation of his friends.

At Boston, Mass.

The Antimasonic Orators of the Day—Don Quixotes on mules—galloping down hill, with their feet out of the stirrups, holding on by the mane.

At Watertown, Jefferson co., N. Y.

John C. Spencer, the ex-special Counsel—In his attempt to obtain the testimony of Elisha Adams, at an expense of $2000 of the people's money, he has learned that "the wages of sin is death."

At Vienna, Ontario co., N. Y.

The late Special Counsel—"Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber."

At Tuthilltown, Ulster co., N. Y.

D. S. McKinsty—May public indignation prevail against those that will attempt to destroy the peace of any association of men that is tolerated by moral and republican principles.

By P. A. Kimbergh—Political and proscriptive Antimasonry—A twin sister of infidelity, destitute of reason and charity, despised by every Christian and Lover of Liberty; not a fit principle to be cherished by any honest man.

By B. N. De Witt—Antimasons—Like Ephraim of old, they are joined to their idols—Let them alone.

By H. C. Dubois—The square, plum and level of Antimasonry, defamation, degradation and disreputation—Why love you not your neighbour as yourself.

By I. Munson—Edward Livingston, a Senator of the United States—He deserves well of his country, why should he be proscribed or persecuted because he is a Mason.

By D. R. Bond—Washington's Farewell Address—May it never be misrepresented by aspiring demagogues.

That Antimasonry is rapidly on the wane no honest observer can deny—it is like a candle nearly burnt out. Upright men who sincerely felt indignant at the supposed fate of Morgan, are now equally indignant at finding it used as a political hobby. Every day dispels the illusion of Antimasonry and hastens the fate of those who speculate upon its political advantages.

SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

WONDERFUL MECHANISM.

Sir Everard Home's discovery of the pneumatic mechanism of the foot of the fly, which enables it to carry on progressive motion against gravity, led him to explain the peculiarity in the structure of the hind flipper or foot of the walrus. Such is the general resemblance between this flipper and the foot of the fly, that having seen the former in a very mutilated state macerating in water, he discovered the similarity of their structure. It is a curious circumstance that two animals, so different in size, should have feet so similar in their use. In the fly, the parts require to be magnified a hundred times to render this structure distinctly visible; and in the walrus, the parts are so large as to require to be reduced to the sixteenth part of the natural size, to bring them within the compass of a quarto page. When the flipper was dissected, by depriving it of its thick skin, it lost all appearance of a foot, and presented that of the hand of a giant, so far as respected the bones and muscles, differing only in having a web covering all the other parts, and extending beyond the point of the thumb and finger. The span, instead of being 12 inches, became 28. The resemblance of the bones of the hind flipper of a walrus to those of the human hand, (which is considered like nothing else in nature,) is curiously exact: the bones of the wrist are the same in number and shape; so are those of the metacarpus; so also the phalanges of the thumb and fingers. That this gigantic hand is employed as a cupping-glass to prevent the animal from falling back in its movements, whether on the ice or in climbing rocky cliffs, there can be no doubt; for it is only necessary to make the human hand, and envelope it in an elastic web, extended some way beyond the points of the fingers, to prove that it could perform such an office: but when we find the lumbricales muscles wanting, the only use of which is to clench the fist, it adds to the proof; and when the indicator is met with, a mode of opening a valve to let in the air, is pointed out. That the principle on which the foot of the fly, the beaks, and the walrus is formed, is the same, has been thus established by Sir E. Home. That the extent of the flippers is equal to the support of the enormous bulk of the walrus is proved by the fact, that an animal of this species, shot at Spitzbergen, weighed 20 cwt., or 2,240 lbs. Now an exhausted surface of 28 inches by 20, the size of the flippers when extended, will support, at the rate of 15 lbs. to every square inch, no less than 8,400 lbs. being nearly four times the animal's weight, as above.—But, of course, some allowance must be made for the contraction of the foot, and the partial admission of particles of air into the cavity or cup. In the foot of the fly there are two cups, in the walrus only one.

CRANE'S IMPROVED TOWN CLOCK.

BURLINGTON, Feb. 2, 1830.

Messrs. Curtis & Dunning,

In compliance with your request that I would express to you my opinion of the Turret Clock, which I had an opportunity of examining at your manufactory a few days since, and which you informed me was invented by Mr. Aaron D. Crane, of Caldwell, New-Jersey, I remark in the first place that the examination of it gave me a very high opinion of the genius of the inventor. I have not within a long time examined a piece of machinery that appeared to show a higher degree of originality, simplicity and beauty in its construction. Though I have had too little practical acquaintance with the different kinds of clock machinery in use to authorize my speaking, except with much diffidence, of its fitness to answer the purposes for which it is intended, yet I will briefly enumerate some of the particulars in which it seems to me to differ from others, and in most of which I cannot but judge it much superior to them.

The first thing which must strike the eye of every one when first looking at it, is the peculiarity of its pendulum and principal escapement. I hardly know how to characterize its pendulum except by saying that its construction and movement seemed to approach nearer to those of a scale beam with its points of suspension farther than usual above its centre of gravity. The consequence of this arrangement is the apparently paradoxical one, that a pendulum very short vibrates very slowly. If there are no special ill effects produced from such a construction (and I do not see any) there certainly must be some obviously good ones. The principal escapement is a singularly ingenious and simple piece of mechanism which must be seen to be understood. I say the principal one, for there is this usual arrangement in this clock, that almost every wheel has an escapement of some sort—each excellent and peculiar, but the one immediately connected with the pendulum, particularly so.

2d. It seems to me a very important improvement that the hands (which in the common public clocks, from the action of the winds, cause the machinery to labor very much at times, and of course to go irregularly) are moved by a small and separate power which is allowed to act at small and definite intervals from the simple release of a detent by means of the principal moving power. By this means it seems to me the regular movement of the whole is nearly, if not entirely independent of the action of the weather on the parts exposed to it.

3d. The adjustment of the striking part is decidedly superior to the methods commonly resorted to. With far less weight a more forcible blow is given, and while all flies or balance wheels are dispensed with, the whole movement is very regular. The great ease moreover with which the adjustment can be made for striking a bell at any requisite distance from the clock, is also very much in its favor.

4th. The fewness of its principal parts was surprising to me, and the slight friction of the whole machine was strikingly conspicuous in the fact that the weight required to move it (it being calculated, as you state, to go a year with once winding,) was not more than one fourth, or at farthest one third, of that required by common public eight-day clocks—this too with the required fall of the weight not being more than twenty five feet.

Experience may show difficulties in making it perform as intended, and for aught that I know, persons more skillful than myself might detect them even now, but according to my knowledge and judgement it seemed to me to be a great and valuable improvement, and I hope that you may soon have the opportunity of learning from actual trials that its operation will be all that you and its inventor can hope for.

Yours,

G. W. BENEDICT.

THE REPOSITORY.

Few of our readers, who have not made themselves conversant with the history of insects, will, perhaps, not believe, that among them are to be found miners, masons, carpenters and upholsterers, who were perfect in their different trades six thousand years ago! The common spider has made every body familiar with his proficiency in the art of weaving; a similar insect, who has taken up his abode in the water, might have suggested the idea of the diving bell many centuries before it was discovered: and if we had our senses about us, when wandering in the fields on a fine evening in summer, the honor of inventing the air balloon would not have belonged to the French; we might have derived the principle of it from the little spider, who lifts himself into the air upon tiny web of gossamer, an elevation which he could not otherwise have any chance of obtaining. The bees have, perhaps, been more frequently observed and watched in our gardens, than any other creature of the insect race. Yet how few have followed them into the hive, and there learned how much may be done in a given time by division of labor; how, by ingenuity of contrivance many mansions and store-houses may be erected with the greatest possible economy of space, and how, by mutual assistance and general subordination, thousands may live together in affluence and peace. Before Babylon was thought of, the social tribes of ants had constructed towers, and cities, and domes; had raised fortresses, and built covered ways, with all the art of an experienced engineer. The vulgar idea is, that these insects feed upon corn. They do no such thing. They take it to their habitations, and break it up amongst the other materials of their edifices, but their food is of a much more select description. Some of the ant tribes feed chiefly upon liquor, which is yielded to them by the aphids, whole flocks of which insect, if we may use the expression, they appropriate to themselves, tend and support, as we do our flocks of sheep and our herds of cattle. But what perhaps, is not the least surprising passage in the history of ants is this, that there are races of them which have their negro slaves: regular whites, who, reposing in indolence themselves, compel the less fortunate nation of blacks to do all the drudgery which they require. The wasp, who is pursued with unrelenting hostility by every body that sees him; the terror of all nurses; is, nevertheless, a most industrious and most excellent manufacturer of paper.

THE MAN THAT WISHED FOR DEATH. The habit of avoiding personal danger, or the instinct that leads to the preservation of life, is so strong, that persons who are resolved on suicide, sometimes conduct in a very ludicrous manner, under the fear of that death which they are desirous of procuring.

We have heard a story of a countryman, who had made up his mind to 'shuffle off his mortal coil,' and only waited until he had settled in his mind the most comfortable way of dying. Not being able readily to agree with himself on this important point, he informed a neighbor of his, whom he met with an axe on his shoulder, that he was resolved upon death, and would take it as a great favor if he would assist him in the accomplishment of his purpose. His neighbor being willing to humor the candidate for a change of worlds, told him he was just going into the woods to chopping, and that if he would accompany him he would fell a tree upon him, and put an end to his life with very little trouble.

'I'm very much obliged to you,' said the weary of the world, 'and shall consider myself bound to you for life. I'll go and be killed directly.'

Accordingly he followed the axe-man to the woods. A tall tree was chosen, and he was directed where to stand, so as to receive the full force of its fall. He fixed himself on the spot, folded his arms and prepared to wait the event. The chopper began to lay on with vigorous blows, while the death's candidate kept his eye upon the top of the tree, to see when it would fall. He stood very composedly for a while; but at length began to appear uneasy and not perfectly satisfied with his prospects. And while the axe man seemed to him to redouble his blows, he kept winking and winking, he thought he perceived the tree begin to nod, and that the next moment would be his last. The cold sweat began to issue from his skin, his limbs trembled—he could stand it no longer! He took to flight and never looked behind him until he had got at least forty rods, when he ventured to stop. He was pursued by the axe man who on coming up, asked him why he ran away.

'Oh,' said he, 'I was afraid if I staid there I should be killed!'

'I thought,' returned the chopper, 'you came on purpose to be killed.'

'Ah, true,' replied the man with great simplicity, 'but I forgot that. O how I tremble! If I'd staid there a minute longer, I should have been a dead man. What a crash it made when it fell!'

'Crash! why the tree is standing yet. I merely chopped with the head of the axe.'

'With the head of the axe! do you say so? 'You cheating rascal! but I'll never trust you to kill me again, I'll be hanged if I do.'—

WHAT'S HALLOWED GROUND?

BY CAMPBELL.

What's hallowed ground? Has earth a clod
Its Maker meant should not be trod
By man, the image of his God,
Erect and free,
Unscourged by superstition's rod
To bow the knee?

What hallows ground where heroes sleep?
'Tis not the sculptured piles you heap!—
In dews, that heavens far distant weep
Their turf may bloom;
Or genii twine, beneath the deep,
Their coral tomb.

But, strew his ashes to the wind,
Whose sword or voice has served mankind,
And is he dead, whose glorious mind
Lifts thine on high?—
To live in hearts we leave behind,
Is not to die.

What's hallowed ground? 'Tis what gives birth
To sacred thoughts in souls of worth!
Peace! Independence! Truth! go forth
Earth's compass round;
And your high priesthood shall make earth
All hallowed ground.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, AUGUST 7, 1830.

ELDER NATHANIEL COLVER.

In this man we have another of those hypocritical villains, who have "stolen the livery of the court of heaven, to serve the devil in." We have too, in this fellow, a counterpart to the infamous Elder Bernard; and together, they make a brace of scoundrels, unique in profligacy and wickedness. They are the high priests of antimasonry; and none will doubt but that they discharge the duties of their high calling, with zeal and faithfulness. They are worthless, abandoned, profligate men; and are, therefore, proper agents to be employed in promoting the interests of an unholy and disgraceful cause. They are choice tools in the hands of bad men. Their hypocritical sanctity gives to them an influence over the weak minds of a certain portion of society, that it is very difficult to destroy. Prejudice and fanaticism are not very desirable opponents.—Reason and evidence are weapons too impotent and inefficient to combat them with. These men, therefore, are important instruments in the hands of the leaders of the antimasonic faction; and from them they receive support and protection. But that support and protection cannot continue for any length of time. The public indignation is aroused, and such base wretches must soon shrink back into their congenial sloughs.

It is worthy of remark; and it is also creditable to the character and intelligence of the clergy—that those of their number, who have prostituted themselves to the base purposes of a political faction; who have voluntarily abnegated the principles of Christianity and embraced those of infidelity; are men whose course of life, under the cloak of religion, has been that of vile hypocrisy. Strip them of the mask which conceals their hideous deformity, and a viler set of wretches, "hypocrites accursed," were never held up to the finger of scorn. Their hearts are black as crime can make them. We hold that a more consummate wretch does not tread the earth, than him who assumes the cloak of religion, to conceal his villany. For the hypocritical priest, we entertain the most perfect contempt—we abhor the knave. We had rather claim kindred with every highway robber in Christendom, than to acknowledge acquaintance with such "traitors in Messiah's holy camp." The highwayman, when contrasted with a hypocritical priest, is an honorable personage. If he have a desire to cut your throat, he will do it manfully, and before your eyes. He meets you face to face and demands your money. The vile hypocrite, the sycophantic knave, while fawning and cringing about you, with professions of friendship, seeks the opportunity and cowardly plunges his dagger into your vitals. If we must come in contact with either of these scoundrels, may it be the highwayman.

We think it ought to have some weight in public opinion; some influence in estimating the character of antimasonry; that its most zealous supporters and ablest advocates, are profligate clergymen, and discarded politicians. A cause which is earnestly espoused and defended by such men, cannot be good or virtuous. It is difficult to point to an antimasonic clergyman of piety, principle and character. We know of none such; nor do we believe that one can be named. The reason is obvious. Respectable clergymen will not engage in promoting the ends of corrupt political factionists.

The readers attention is invited to the following development of facts. Colver was sent by a convention in New York, the last year, on a political mission to Vermont. He attended the Conventions in that State, and has been active in raising the excitement there. Our Green Mountain friends will now perceive that they have been grossly deceived. And "what will the anti's say to this? Will they, as is their ordinary practice, deny it? Will the Republican freemen of Vermont, still follow, lean upon, and exult in the patriotism and ardent piety of this fallen wretch? If any are so inclined, let them reflect for a moment on the "stack" and the "rum bottle," and his total disregard for truth; and if these things are not sufficient to deter them, let them go on to political perdition. We rejoice that for the credit of the clergy, it may be said, that few of their members have touched the unclean thing, and that few have justly suffered for their temerity, or have fled from it in season to save their flocks from the contaminating virus."

To the Members of the Baptist Church of Washington County, New York.

BRETHREN—

Constrained by that duty which I owe to myself, and country, and my God, I address you upon a subject painful to me as it must be to all who profess to follow the precepts of our divine Redeemer, and who have accepted the offered terms of salvation at the foot of the cross.—The spirit of that gospel which I hope and trust I have received as my guide, whispers to the heart of every christian, in the softening accents of love, the duty of inculcating peace on earth, and good will to all men. In obedience to that duty, I shall strive to repress the feelings of resentment arising from personal injury, and which are incident to human nature, while I invite you to a dispassionate view of the real character of an Elder in the church who is disturbing the harmony and sowing the seeds of bitter discord among its members. It is now more than a year since Elder Nathaniel Colver was invited to the spiritual charge of the Baptist church in Fort Ann. Previous to his call, a committee of four members of the church, of which I was one, was appointed with authority to invite (in behalf of the society) such suitable Elder as they, in their judgment, should believe best calculated to promote its spiritual interest. Elder Colver, had been named to the committee as such person, but previous to any decision respecting his call to the charge of the church, I had heard from several sources entitled to confidence, that his moral character was not good, and soon learned from authority of undoubted credit, that reports respecting his unchristian course, while presiding as Elder of the church of Clarendon, were true in all their material points. In addition to this information, his renunciation of Freemasonry was made public, and being myself a member of that society, I know the statements promulgated by him through the antimasonic newspapers, were, in many important particulars, devoid of truth. From this general information of the character of Elder Colver, I could no longer hesitate in the opinion that he was a person altogether unfit for the sacred charge of a christian church, and I felt it to be my duty, to warn my associates of the committee, of the danger to be apprehended by placing him in that important office. I therefore stated to the committee, in our consultations upon this subject, that the Elder had been guilty of deliberate falsehood in his declarations respecting Masons, and as I found for the basest of purposes, as he must have known that many of those declarations were false; and it appeared from the Elder's own statement that he was guilty, either of violating a solemn obligation, which he had deliberately and voluntarily taken, or of gross falsehood in his statements. That I had been informed, and verily believed it to be true, that while minister of the gospel in the county of Franklin, he had prostituted his holy office to political purposes, and in his political effervescence had added to this, the crime of deliberate falsehood. That while presiding Elder in the church at Clarendon, he had been guilty of positive lying, to the knowledge of the members of that church. That he had taken property not his own, and converted it to his own use, without the knowledge or consent of the owner. That he had been guilty of an act so indecent and obscene, that the most depraved and licentious, would recoil from its vulgar impunity.

The Elder, however, notwithstanding these objections to his settlement as pastor over the Fort Ann village church, was called to that solemn charge—a majority of the committee overruling any objections. Let the consequences which have followed this call, test the propriety of my objections. I now appeal with confidence to all christians who are acquainted with the present distracted state of the Fort Ann village church, whether my anticipations have not been fearfully verified; whether the labors of this Elder, in the performance of his ministerial duties, have been those of christian meekness and brotherly love? On the contrary, I appeal, even to those members of the church, who have followed him in the spirit of devotion of the ancient Ephesians, in his course of intolerance and proscription, whether the very genius of discord did not follow close upon his footsteps, and is not at this moment presiding in given majesty over its pulpit and its altar, and having his devastating torch among its members. As to myself, it may not be improper to mention, that soon after Elder Colver attained a supremacy over the church, a resolution was moved and adopted at a special church meeting, at which Brother William Brayton was appointed moderator, and William W. Cook, Scribe, one who had recently abjured Masonry; charging me with wrongfully charging Elder Nathaniel Colver with lying and perjury, in his renunciation of Masonry, and demanded that I should explicitly and publicly confess the falsity of these charges, or substantiate them. I admitted what I before stated to the committee, but insisted that this alone had not constituted my objections to the call of Elder Colver. That it was equally well known that I adverted to the baseness of his moral character, in as much as he had, in many instances, as I was well informed, been guilty of fabrication, in some cases, and direct falsehood in others; as well as the commission of other acts, immoral in themselves, which were wholly irreconcilable with the character of a christian. Upon this a meeting of the church was held, at which I was cited to appear, and at which I did appear, and offered to prove the truth of the allegations by the affidavits of numerous persons of respectability, residing in Vermont, and the north part of this State. These affidavits were refused to be received in evidence, although they were delivered as by the magistrate before whom they were taken, and it was known by the leading members of the society (who were antimasons) that the witnesses to these facts resided at such a distance from Fort Ann, that it was impossible for me to bear the expense of bringing them in person, without great injury to myself and family. No course was devised by which testimony could be taken that would be satisfactory before the church, and being convinced that antimasonry had infused its baneful influence over their deliberations, I withdrew, and was declared excommunicated. Fellow Christians, having been debarred the privilege of proving my innocence, and the Elder's guilt, before the church of which I was lately a member, upon technical pretexts, seldom if ever resorted to in a court of conscience, I present you and the public, a condensed statement of facts in relation to the character of Elder Nathaniel Colver.

I place myself before the church and the tribunal of public opinion, as his accuser, and I here assert that the Elder has, in various instances, been guilty of uttering deliberate falsehood. That he has taken from his neighbors, without their knowledge or consent, property not his own, and converted it to his own use, upon false pretences. That he has altered an advertisement while it was in a conspicuous place for public perusal, so as to give it the language of gross indecency. That he has been the moving cause of discord in the church of God, both in this State and the State of Vermont. That he is busy in season and out of season, in the contentions of political antimasonry. That he has visited upon the church over which he presides, through the medium of antimasonic intolerance, contentions, railing, heart burnings and persecutions, and carried discord and desolation into the sanctuary of domestic life.

I now proceed to publish the affidavits upon which my charges are in part founded, and which were refused as unimportant by the leaders of the church of Fort Ann village.

ELIJAH PRATT.

I, William Harrington, of Clarendon, in the county of Rutland, of lawful age, do testify and say, that in the year 1820, I planted corn in a field belonging to O. H. Round, in Clarendon—Elder Colver planted in the same field; and in the fall of the year, during harvest time, Elder Colver, and some hands were harvesting at the same time that myself, and some other hands, were harvesting my own corn, and in the morning of the same day he went with me to a stack of butts, where I had previously made a husking; I asked him to drink some rum from a bottle I had placed in the stalks at the time I made the husking. After drinking with him I put the bottle back to the place from whence I had taken it; and on the same day, towards night I went to get the bottle to give my hands some rum, and found the bottle: the rum was gone. On making some inquiry, it was suggested by some person that Elder Colver had got the rum for his hands. Some time after this I saw Elder Colver, and asked him if he had taken my rum, he said, no, George Rounds got it. Some time after this I inquired of Elder Colver and Rounds together. Elder Colver then owned taking the rum, and said he would pay for it, or get as much more for me. I further say, that he never paid for it, or replaced it with as much more. I further say, that the situation of the fields was such, that the hands were out of sight of each other, part of the time while at work. And further the deponent saith not.

Be it remembered, that on the 10th day of July, 1829, personally appeared William Harrington, signer of the above affidavit, after being duly cautioned, made solemn oath to the above affidavit, by him subscribed, contains the whole truth and nothing but the truth; before me at Clarendon, in the county of Rutland.

HORATIO BEALL, Justice Peace.

I, Alpheus Colvin, of Clarendon, in the county of Rutland, of lawful age, do testify and say, that in the fall of the year 1820, according to the best of my recollection, I was at work for Elder Colver, cutting corn in a field belonging to O. H. Rounds; some of the hands spoke about some rum; Elder Colver said there was some at the stack, and that Rounds had said that he would find some, and he with the rest of the hands went to the stack; Elder Colver found the bottle, gave it to his hands, and they all drank, and he put the bottle back in the same place, and afterwards he brought the bottle and we all drank again. I further say, that from his expressions at the time, I supposed he had liberty to use the rum. And further the deponent saith not.

Be it remembered, that on the 10th day of July, 1829, personally appeared Alpheus Colvin, signer of the above affidavit, and after being duly cautioned, made solemn oath that the same contained the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; before me, at Clarendon, in the county of Rutland.

HORATIO BEALL, Justice Peace.

I, George Rounds, Jr. of Clarendon, in the county of Rutland, of lawful age, do testify and say, that in the fall of the year 1820, I was at work for Nathaniel Colver, harvesting corn, on the land of O. H. Rounds; Wm. Harrington was at work in the same field—some of the hands said, some rum would be necessary; Colver said that there was some at the stack, not far from where we were; Colver went to the stack and got it, and gave it to his workmen. I afterwards heard that Colver said that I got it for the workmen; I afterwards saw Mr. Colver and asked him how he came to charge me with taking the rum; he said he thought as Harrington had married my sister, it was all in the family, and if he put it upon me nothing more would be said about the matter. Some time after this I saw Elder Colver and Harrington together, he then confessed taking the rum, and said he would pay for it. Elder Colver frequently said he would publicly confess the matter, but never did to my knowledge. I attended the meeting of the church. The vote was put with some reluctance, some few voted in its favor, others acted not at all. I was at that time clerk of the church, and made out the letter accordingly. I further say, that when he got the rum, he told the hands to say nothing about it. And further the deponent saith not.

Personally appeared before me, Samuel Hoard, a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, in and for the county aforesaid, Ezra Flanders, to me well known; who being duly sworn, depose and said, that in the month of April last past, in a conversation which he had with the Rev. Nathaniel Colver, he the said Colver observed that he had not supported for office; any man within the last four years who was a Mason! Upon which this deponent remarked that he had believed he had not only voted for De Witt Clinton, (who was within four years a candidate for Governor,) but that he used what influence he possessed in advocating his election, and that said Clinton was a mason. Whereupon said Colver replied, that he never heard, knew or suspected that De Witt Clinton was a Mason, until after his death! This deponent then said to Mr. Colver, that he would not be believed in making such an assertion; for he was a man of too much intelligence to be ignorant of a fact so generally known. Especially as Mr. Colver had a long time been a Mason. Upon which Mr. Colver re-asserted in the strongest manner, that he never knew, heard or suspected that De Witt Clinton was a mason until after his death!

SOLOMON SOUTHWICK.—This individual, who has so long been the devoted advocate of antimasonry, has abandoned, or rather been thrust out of that party, and is about entering on a course of lectures on the importance of studying the Scriptures! Mr. Southwick has seen better days: he was once wealthy and highly respected by the people of New York. Few politicians possessed greater influence over the minds and affections of his fellow citizens, during the troublesome times, from 1804 to 1815. He is now a bankrupt in fortune, fame and mind. Yet, in the cause he has now espoused, if properly pursued, all good men will wish him success. Southwick has been most shamefully abused by his own party. According to a statement in the Albany Daily Advertiser, the $2,000 raised chiefly for his benefit last winter, was appropriated to the purpose of getting up another paper in Albany! thus giving Mr. S. much disappointment and distress. Such is the ingratitude of the faction he has so long served.

"Daily Evening Transcript"—is the title of a new daily evening paper, the first number of which was issued on Saturday week, by Messrs. DUTTON & WENTWORTH, of this city. L. M. WALTER, Esq. is its editor. He makes a very good paper, and we have no doubt will give entire satisfaction to all who may patronise him. We hope the number will be large. The Transcript is handsomely printed on paper about half the common size of our daily journals, and is afforded at half the price, or four dollars a year.

"The Journal of Law. Conducted by an association of Members of the Bar." This is a new periodical recently commenced in Philadelphia; and, as its title indicates, is principally devoted to the exposition, in popular language, of the philosophy, history, and actual state of law and government in different countries—of our own constitutions, State and National—laws, civil and criminal—judiciary systems and modes of procedure—together with particular essays on those branches of the law, a knowledge of which may be most practically useful to men engaged in active pursuits; as, for instance, the law of corporations, patents, insurance, bills of exchange, and commercial and other contracts, in all their varieties, real estate, with modes of conveying it, insolvency, wills, descents, intestacy, &c. &c. The Journal is published in semi-monthly numbers of 16 octavo pages, at $1.50 per annum. Carter and Hendee, of this city, agents.

A Mr. Mehaffy, one of the candidates for sheriff, in Lancaster county, Penn. states in his advertisement, that if elected, he will use his "best endeavors to PREVENT MASONS from being selected as JURYMEN." If such a declaration is a passport to office—"God save the Commonwealth." If there be one honest and intelligent antimason in Pennsylvania, he will join in denouncing so contemptible, impudent and traitorous a thing—he is no man.

MASONIC ADDRESSES.—The excellent addresses delivered at the stated communication of the Grand Chapter of this State, June 8, 1830, by Rev. Samuel Clarke, H. P.; and Rev. Paul Dean, G. G. K.; with the addresses of Messrs. Livingston and Poinsett, are just published and for sale at the Bookstores, and at this office.—Price 12 1-2 cents.

THE WREATH.

HE NEVER SMILED AGAIN.

"Henry I. (after the loss of Prince William) entertained hopes for three days, that his son had put into some distant port of England; but when certain intelligence of the calamity was brought him him he fainted away; and it was remarked, that he never afterwards was seen to smile, nor ever recovered his wonted cheerfulness."—Hume.

The bark that held a Prince went down,
The sweeping waves rolled on;
And what was England's glorious crown
To him that wept a son?
He lived—for life may long be borne
Ere sorrow break its chain!
Why comes not death to those that mourn?
—He never smiled again!

There stood proud forms around his throne,
The stately and the brave;
But which could fill the place of one,
'That one beneath the wave?
Before him passed the young and fair
In pleasures reckless train;
But seas dash'd o'er his son's bright hair—
He never smil'd again.

He sat where festal bowls went round,
He heard the minstrel sing;
He saw the tourney's victor crown'd
Amidst the knightly ring.
A murmur of the restless deep
Seem'd blent with every strain,
A voice of winds that would not sleep—
He never smil'd again!

Hearts, in that time, clos'd o'er the trace
Of vows once fondly pour'd,
And strangers took the kinsman's place
At many a joyous board.
Graves which true love had wash'd with tears
Were left to Heaven's bright rain;
Fresh hopes were born for other years—
He never smil'd again.

MISCELLANY.

STEALING FOWLS.

At Cambridge, some years ago two or three students of the University had one night set on foot an expedition against the President's fowls. They proceeded with all imaginable caution to the roost, and in the first place seized upon Chanticleer, whose neck they rung before he had time to cry murder. Besides being large and fat, they had another reason for making sure of him, viz; to avenge the oft committed crime of waking them up too early in the morning. They next seized upon one or two fine pullets, and twisted their necks without any signs of remorse. They were proceeding in their rapine, when the remaining fowls, awakening from their sleep which had proved so fatal to their companions, began to cry Kud-aghkut! Kud-aghkut! kut, kut, Kud-aghkut! The noise brought out the President, who, coming pat upon the foul assassins, said; "Upon my word, young gentlemen, this is a fine business I've caught you in!" Not so very fine neither, thought the students; it will turn out devilish bad business before we get through with it. And thereupon they began to apologise, and to implore the clemency of the Prex; but all in vain. "I must make an example of you," said he sternly. But I shall say no more at present. Call upon me tomorrow at one o'clock."

The students took their leave, and the President took possession of the slaughtered fowls. All night the culprits could think of nothing but their approaching doom: they dreamed of rustication, suspension and expulsion: and wished Chanticleer, pullets and all, had been at the devil, before they meddled with them. They waited upon the Prex according to his direction, and were received with extraordinary politeness. Not a word was mentioned of the events of the night before. He conversed with them for some time upon various topics; and they began to be impatient for the worst. At last, rising with dignity, and leading the way, "young gentlemen," said he, "walk into this room." Now thought they we shall have our sentence. The door opened and discovered to their view—a table well set, and on it the very fowls whose necks they had wrung the night before.—They were invited to take their seats at the board, and bountifully helped to the nice bits of Chanticleer and the pullets. This, thought they, is too bad! Confound the old fellow's politeness! But the President urged them to eat; and finding them rather backward in doing justice to his rians, repeated his pressing invitation to take hold and spare not. But the students felt more like a culprit with a rope round his neck, than like young gentleman dining with the President of a College. And in fact they were in little less danger of choking than the noosed culprit; for the dinner, although exceedingly well cooked, had a strange tendency to stick in their throats; and they could not help fancying all the while that they heard the appalling sounds of—"Kut, kut, kud-aghkut! Kud-aghkut! Kut, kut, Kud-aghkut!" To make short the story, they were dismissed without the slightest allusion to the last night's adventure, and thought themselves sufficiently punished for their folly.—Constellation.

* Should any person be disposed to question the orthography of those words in Italics, we can only say it is the language of fowls, (not foul language, and that probably they have never seen Walker or Webster.

FAGGING.—While Lord Byron and Mr. Peel were at Harrow together, a tyrant whose name was—claimed a right to fag little Peel, which claim (whether rightly or wrongly, I know not) Peel resisted. His resistance was in vain:—not only subdued him, but determined to punish the refractory slave; and proceeded forthwith to put his determination in practice by inflicting a kind of bastinado on the inner fleshy side of the boy's arm, which during the operation was twisted around with some degree of technical skill to render the pain more acute. While the stripes were succeeding each other and poor Peel writhing under them, Byron saw and felt for the misery of his friend, and although he knew that he was not strong enough to fight—with any hope of success, and that it was dangerous even to approach him, he advanced to the scene of action, and with a blush of rage, tears in his eyes, and a voice trembling between terror and indignation, asked very humbly, if——would be pleased to tell him, "how many stripes he intended to inflict?" "Why" returned the executioner, "you little rascal what is that to you." "Because if you please," said Byron holding out his arm, "I would take half!" There is a mixture of simplicity and magnanimity in this little trait which is truly heroic; and, how we may smile at the friendship of boys, it is rarely that the friendship of manhood is capable of any thing half so generous.—Moore's Byron.

HENRY P. LEWIS, PRINTER.

TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

RENOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.
No. 2.

Sir—You attempt to justify your apostasy from Masonry by the example of St. Paul. What rank imposture was ever palmed upon the world, without first usurping the seeming sanction of divine authority? What damning heresy ever obtained currency among men, without pressing into its service the holy precepts of inspiration, and sanctifying its pretensions by the examples of holy men? This is a part of the necessary machinery of popular fraud and imposition, I was not, therefore, surprised to find you boldly asserting your claim to it. Happily however, for the country, much of the old fashioned veneration for the “black coat gentry,” has passed away, and something more than costume and pretension is requisite to establish a character for sobriety and godliness. But why, Sir, offer any apology? If Masonry, be, indeed, as full of abominations as you now represent it, as perfect a sink of pollution as you now affirm it to be, apostasy would be a virtue, and require no apology, an act highly meritorious, and would command universal praise. But, perhaps, Sir, to entitle you to this praise, and give you a just claim upon the sympathies of enlightened and thinking men, it would have been essential for you to have discovered this enormous wickedness somewhat earlier in your masonic career, and to have published your renunciation before any strong temptation to apostasy was known to the public; at least, to have discontinued your high wrought commendations of the institution, and have withdrawn from it your countenance and support. It will be difficult for you to satisfy any intelligent man, who requires a reason for his faith, of the irreconcilable repugnance between your professed creed and practice. He will ask you, Sir, if you were, indeed, conscious of all this wickedness, blasphemy, and profaneness—why did you not come out from among them—why did you not reprove and denounce them and their works of darkness, as well became the minister of the cross—least of all, why did you patronize them, and show your reverend countenance regularly at their communications, and lift your hands in solemn prayer in their behalf? He will ask you with much earnestness, how can you reconcile your former practices, during a long course of years, with your present professions? One or the other, it seems to me, must be absolutely and unqualifiedly false, and before your assertions can command my belief or respect, you must reconcile this wide and palpable contradiction. You seem yourself to have some secret misgivings on this subject, and to acknowledge indirectly the claims, which truth and reason make upon you; for at both the morning and the evening service, you introduced your philippics, by apologising for your secession. I confess, Sir, that this conduct lowered you in my estimation. If your present course be right, why apologise—if wrong, why pursue it? To attempt a reconciliation of your present and former courses, is futile in the extreme, and can only serve to load you with additional obloquy. You might as well attempt to blend the opposite elements of fire and water, or produce an intimate union between oil and alcohol. The two courses are as repugnant as light and darkness—as remote as heaven and hell!

You affirm your apostasy, and the apostle Paul's conversion to be similar, and both justified by the same reasoning. This is, perhaps, the most unfortunate assertion you made, on that day, of follies. I have read in the Great Light of Masonry, that men are, sometimes, given over to believe a lie, that they may be damned, but I never before knew that men were proud of their reprobation, and fond of exhibiting their title deeds of that glorious inheritance. Let us candidly examine this pretension, and trace out the analogy of the two cases. The thorough going Anti, Sir, will be satisfied with your course, and offer you the incense of his adulation, with or without an apology, with or without a reason. But, the man of sense and reflection, who requires a valid reason for his faith, will inquire long, before he will adopt an apology manifestly founded in error, and obviously intended to deceive. Thinking you may have some ambition to convince and enlighten, if not to please, your former benighted brethren, I ask your attention, while I trace the wonderful parallelism, the almost miraculous coincidence of the two cases, you so triumphantly assume. Possibly, you may be led to believe, that even this fortress of your defence is not so impregnable as you seem to imagine. Wherein consists their striking similarity? Saul of Tarsus “verily thought he was doing God's service,” and prosecuted his designs with full purpose of heart. You “wept in secret,” and advanced from degree to degree, “groaning in spirit,” conscious of wickedness. He, the moment “the scales fell from his eyes,” and was persuaded of his erroneous bearing, and convinced of the right way, instantly abandoned his old courses, and adopted the new religion, and advanced its interests with all the energies of his noble mind, and godlike spirit. You, it seems by your own confession, sinned against light, and knowledge, and conviction for years, advancing at your own solicitation, further and further into the unfathomed mysteries of this iniquity, till at length, fancying you perceived the popular current setting against it, when lo, you trimmed your sails to the breeze, and came out of it, not like Paul, abandoning his evil courses, but like Judas betraying his friends.—In his case, there were two distinct systems of religion, the interests of the one being diametrically opposed to the interests of the other, teaching perfectly different doctrines prescribing perfectly different duties, and inspiring perfectly different hopes. His apostasy from the Jewish, and conversion to the christian religion was, therefore an entire, and radical change. In your case, the system of Masonry, when you entered it, and when you left it, was one and the same; its principles and duties, its hopes and penalties continued unchanged, and, moreover, you understood its nature and tendency, fifteen years ago, as well as you now do, or ever can. It was the same system, Sir, when, at its very threshold, you “wept in secret,” and commended it publicly—when you went along its devious paths, “groaning in spirit,” and loudly proclaiming its good works, as when you journeyed some three hundred miles to take the degrees of the Encampment, and from pure benevolence conferred a degree on certain ladies.—It was the same system, when you unceasingly raised your voice in its behalf, and earnestly supplicated its protection, enlargement, and uninterrupted success, as when the same shrill, ardent tones were heard, deprecating its existence, and imploring its speedy destruction. The scales that fell from the eyes of the apostle, seem to have shrouded yours in triple darkness, for the same things which you profess once appeared to you lovely, and beautiful, luminous, grand and heavenly, now assume fearful shapes,

The exact analogy, and wonderful coincidence of the two cases, must by this time, I think, be obvious to every body.

Now, Rev. Sir Knight, suffer me to draw a parallel between your case, and a certain other one, which seems to me far more perfect and applicable, than the one we have just been considering; and since you seem partial to scripture instances, my example shall, also, be drawn from the sacred record. Judas, sometimes called Iscariot, was one of the twelve chosen; he enjoyed all the enviable privileges, and participated in all their benevolent labors, and for aught we know, was as zealous and as much approved as the other eleven, till darkness and storm began to lower over his divine master, and persecution and suffering stare him in the face, when lo, the frugal disciple, putting on the mark of uncommon affection, betrayed him to his enemies, with a kiss. Up to the last moment of their companionship, he affects extraordinary zeal and personal devotion, and then consigns him into the hands of murderers, by that most significant token of affection. You, Sir, have in an eminent degree, enjoyed the privileges and immunities of Masonry—you have been honored with her offices, and relieved by her charities—your zeal has been conspicuous even among the most zealous, and stirred up the lukewarm to a more hearty performance of their duties—your enlogies, frequent and bold, and your prayers, fervent and apparently sincere, earned for you the excellent name of champion, and when the storm thickened around her, and the lightnings gleamed, and the thunders roared, and the hail descended on her devoted head, the genius of Masonry in the excess of her agony, cried, “Where is David my friend, the champion of mine honor?—is his voice silent in the time of need,—is he unmindful of our kindnesses and charities—where is his fond token of recognition—are his lips sealed too? Where, I ask, where is David the champion?” And the sentinel on the tower replied, “abandoned his trust—foresworn his honor—gone over to the enemy, with Judas, in search of ‘thirty pieces of silver.’” How like you, Sir, the comparison? Is it not infinitely more analagous, and more appropriate to your case, than the former? You were both zealous servants of your respective masters—both continued cheerfully in their service till dangers encompassed them, and both abandoned them at the critical moment of their utmost need of friends, and both reproached their former kindness. There is one particular in which the analogy fails; “Judas went out and hung himself.” Sir David has not yet done it, but it would not be the most surprising incident in his history, if he should.

You told your audience, “that you did not know, but you should have been as zealous a mason now, as ever, had it not been for the popular excitement, at the West.” This, Sir, is a precious confession. The terrible wickedness of the institution, then, did not disturb you?—the awful blasphemy of its rites, and horrible profaneness of its oaths did not shock your truly susceptible bosom, or alarm your tender conscience? I must confess, Sir, the more I contemplate your character, the more I am charmed with it, the more I wonder and admire. In one breath you tell us Masonry ought to be suppressed for its damning wickedness; in the next, that had it not been for the noise and tumult at the West, you might have been as zealous as ever. In one part of your discourse, you entertain us with the most delightful visions of “weeping in secret,” and show us the reluctant disciple, passing from degree to degree, “groaning in spirit” as its enormous wickedness is unfolded, yet swearing at every degree, that it is of your own free will and accord. And now, to cap the climax, after all this whining and blubbering, you say it is uncertain, that you might not have continued as zealous as formerly. For the honor of poor human nature, revise your address before it is published, or I shall blush that you ever were a mason.

And now, Sir, will you relieve my anxiety on a certain subject, by answering with your accustomed frankness the following questions: Did you not hope by renouncing Masonry, at the time you did, that you might be recalled and reinstalled in your former comfortable living at Cazenovia? If not, why did you send privately thereto to a friend, and request him to circulate a report that you had renounced? If you had made up your mind, why did you not publish your renunciation off hand, and not wait till this informer had spied out the land? His report was disbelieved, and who that knew you would, or could believe, such an outrageous slander, and so, forsooth, to save his veracity, you forwarded the documentary evidence? This is a fine story and well told. Did you not fellowship the institution, nay, commend it openly among your neighbors in Conway, after that sage renunciation was composed and forwarded?

Your answer to the above inquiries would much gratify!

Yours, &c.

CONVENTIONAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER II.

TO THE SUFFOLK MEMBERS OF THE ANTIMASONIC CONVENTION OF MASSACHUSETTS.

GENTLEMEN:

In compliance with common usage, I address you by the equivocal appellation of Gentlemen, which address admits neither a laudable public or private object in your Convention; nor respect for your individual reputation. It is a common but just remark, that the respectability of all associations of men is formed on the reputation of individual members; and, that the purity of their motives and the worthiness of their objects, may safely be inferred from the excellence of their private character. By this rule is the Masonic Institution to be judged; by this rule it will be judged by the public. To that public you also stand amenable; and Masons will hold you to the standard to which they cheerfully submit. Shrink not from the trial. You have ostentatiously put yourselves before the public, as the voluntary guardians of public morals: it is fit, therefore, to examine your qualifications to discharge that trust. You have denounced a whole Institution, as injurious to public welfare and private duties: it is right, therefore, to inquire whether we may not say to you, 'Thou hypocrite! first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.' When men, without personal weight of character, without intelligence or integrity, to obtain public confidence, endeavor, by temporary excitement, to give themselves popular buoyancy, it is not common to declare their own worthlessness, nor the baseness of their objects. It is usual to begin with disinterested love for the dear people, and promises to reform some flagrant abuses. It was sufficient for discerning men, having a knowledge of your characters, to perceive that the union of such persons had its origin in anything rather than a desire to promote the public welfare. But the later developments of your secret designs were necessary to convince many well meaning citizens of the selfish motives that influenced you, and of the boldness of your enterprise.

The 30th Dec. 1829, will long be remembered. By you; because your magnificent expectations, before your meeting, seemed to embody themselves, prospectively, in the cradle of liberty, and derived some coloring of patriotism from the sanctity of the place, and because, at the time of your meeting, you felt, and the public knew, that pity, contempt and scorn would be the rewards of your labors. It will be remembered by Masons; because notwithstanding your furious attack on their Institution, and your bitter malignity towards its distinguished members, they nobly stood the shock, erect and undisturbed as Ætna.

"While storms and tempests thunder on his brow,
And oceans break their billows at his feet."

It will be remembered by Masons; because the base and dastardly foot of defection made hardly a perceptible impress even on the dust of that venerated Hall. Its guilty step was light and wary. Already has time obliterated the feeble traces of its participants. It will long be remembered by those who are neither Masons nor Antimasons; because they respected the firm and dignified course pursued by the Masons of this Commonwealth, at a time when patience had almost ceased to be a virtue, and forbearance had almost ceased to be respected.

You had succeeded in your designs, almost without a shadow of detection, until, emboldened by impunity, you betrayed your political plotting at the organization of the National Republican County Committee. Then, honest men saw your infamy, and exposed it; and the best evidence of your discomfiture was witnessed in the malignant ebullition of coarse and vulgar remarks from the affectedly chaste and patriotic lips of some of your worthy members. You then raised the cry of persecution, and cunningly endeavored to withdraw public attention from the observance of your odious measures, by endeavoring to fasten its suspicions on those who had exposed and unmasked you.—This will not do. Your false lights will no longer allure men from the straight forward path of Truth. Neither your threats nor your promises will deter the members of an insulted Institution from holding you up to the view and scorn of the public, as examples of warning to those who would practise on its credulity.

The ostentatious and vain parade of entitling your assembly a State Convention, could not, to those acquainted with its elements and materials, fail to excite derision. But with those unacquainted with its characteristics, in its formation and organization, its pompous and inflated name, and its affected solemnity of regular proceeding, had a tendency to mislead and delude. It is somewhat remarkable, that of the fourteen counties of the Commonwealth, six were not represented in the Convention, viz: Barnstable, Dukes, Nantucket, Hampden, Hampshire and Berkshire! Of the remaining eight Counties, the most respectable individuals, named as delegates for their respective Counties, declined taking any part in an affair so useless in its avowed objects, and so doubtful as to its ulterior views. This applies particularly to the Counties of Middlesex, Worcester and Essex. In truth, it was a Convention of members from Suffolk and Norfolk; and of members too, who, in their individual capacities do not obtain a mediocrity of standing: either in influence, intelligence or moral character. It required but little discernment, therefore, to foresee that the ostensible purposes of that assemblage were mere disguises, and very clumsy ones too, to promote the sinister views of a few ambitious persons, who despaired of obtaining rank and influence by the ordinary steps that mark the progress of honorable and high minded men. It will be sufficient to illustrate this remark, by a reference to the disinterested and patriotic members from Suffolk County. On the 8th May 1830, the inhabitants of Boston assembled to choose their Representatives to the State Legislature; and the names of nine of your Committee were borne on the Antimasonic List of Candidates!

Gentlemen, your political text-book is too easily comprehended to require an elaborate commentary; and therefore feel assured, that your efforts will be appreciated as truly by others as by

ARCHITECTUS.

The Antimasons in Connecticut say, now that they have put down the Masonic Institution, they are willing the excitement should subside! How very kind!

The truth is, public opinion has put down the evil spirit of anti-ism in that State.

OHIO ANTIMASONIC STATE CONVENTION.

We make the following extracts, from communications received from several intelligent, and highly respectable individuals of Canton, on the subject of the late abortive attempt to hold a State Antimasonic Convention, at that place.

Canton, July 24 1830.

I was not at a small meeting held at the Courthouse in this town, on Tuesday evening prior to the Convention, by some 20 or 30 individuals, for the purpose of appointing Delegates—but all who did attend, represent the scene as most supremely ridiculous. A Mr. Sortwell took the lead and succeeded in getting himself first appointed Chairman, and then elected Delegate in the following manner. Having been nominated as a Delegate, the question was put, and all in the house cried Ay. As a mere formality the Negative vote was called for, when all present cried No. This placed the Chairman in a woful predicament. He was unable to determine whether he was elected or not.—To render the scene more completely ridiculous, a person proposed that all who were in favor of the election of Mr. Sortwell, should leave the house—instantly one general rush cleared the room, and Mr. S. was left in the chair without one solitary person to move an adjournment of the meeting!

When the Convention met, to the number of 25 or 30, one universal lower pervaded the countenances of the citizens of this place. In the evening, when the Convention adjourned, a number of the citizens of the Village, proposed to meet, and calmly express their feelings in regard to the doings of the Convention. The bell was rung, and the Courthouse was immediately filled to overflowing. The preamble and resolutions, which you will have communicated to you, were adopted without a dissenting vote.

I have not heard a voice raised in favor of the doings of the Convention, but an universal expression of disapprobation.

Yours, &c.

Canton, July 23, 1830.

Without preface or apology, I will proceed to give you a brief account of the proceedings of the antimasons at this place for three days past.

On the evening of the 20th instant, some four or five Delegates to the State Convention, arrived from the North, and finding that their edict, issued some time since, requiring Delegates to be appointed, had been disregarded by the citizens of our county, immediately set about getting up a meeting of the villagers, for the delinquency of the county. Accordingly a few individuals assembled at the Courthouse, where a most laughable farce took place, which resulted in what was called, by way of derision, the appointment of A. Sortwell, Esq. a Delegate.

On the 21st a few choice and mighty spirits of the land assembled, and in majesty of self sufficiency, proclaimed that every nook and corner of the earth was to be illuminated, and every soul that thirsted for office should be satisfied. They logically announced that all who were not with them in sentiment, must be against them, and he that refused to be unconditionally submissive, must be disfranchised.

Perceiving that the people of Canton knew not how to transact business for themselves, the Convention proposed and agreed to hold an election for them. They accepted Mr. Sortwell's pretensions, and elected Dr. Simmons a delegate, and constituted them members of their honorable body.

At evening, after the Convention had adjourned, the citizens agreed to call a Meeting, for the purpose of asserting and maintaining their rights and privileges—the Court-House was crowded—and the meeting was organized by calling George H. Cake to the Chair, and electing V. R. Kimble, Secretary; when the following Preamble and Resolutions were unanimously adopted:

'Whereas the town of Canton has heretofore been remarkable for the urbanity of the manners of its inhabitants, the friendly intercourse of its citizens, and its freedom from internal factions—so much so, that its name has become proverbial as such throughout the whole State. And whereas the citizens of the town of Canton are unrepresented in the Antimasonic Convention which commenced its session this day in their village, by any person of their own choosing: Therefore,

Be it Resolved, That we view with decided disapprobation an attempt by citizens of neighboring counties to raise an excitement of a political and dangerous nature to the peace and tranquility of our hitherto peaceful and happy village.

Be it further Resolved, That we will endeavor, to the utmost of our power, to preserve that unanimity and friendliness of feeling heretofore existing among us, without any regard to names—or the societies to which we may belong.

Resolved, That we design no disrespect to any of the members of said Convention, but are wholly actuated by a desire to suppress the unprofitable, and in fact, unwarrantable and injurious influence which their measures, as delegates in said Convention, are calculated to produce.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting, be signed by the Chairman and Secretary, and published in the papers of this county.

GEO. H. CAKE, Chairman.

V. R. KIMBLE, Secretary.

On the Morning of the 22nd, the Convention again met, and, in council assembled, resolved that Masonry was dangerous to a republican form of government, in as much, as it has ever been an object of hatred and persecution by tyrants, the Inquisition, and the crowned heads of Europe. Mr. Powers expressly and plainly declared that every Mason who would not apostatize, must be put down—must be proscribed at the polls of our country!—that every person who held a different opinion, and would not disobey the dictates of his conscience and join in the cause of Antimasonry and cry, down with these men, must be proscribed equally with the masons!! The Convention pledged themselves to pursue this course of proscription for opinion's sake! This is the first step—and from the same spirit of intolerance may we not expect the fire and faggot to follow? Yours &c.

Canton, July 26, 1830.

I really regret that my time before the closing of the mail, will not admit of my giving a more minute and detailed account of the attempt to raise an excitement in our town on the day preceding the famous Political Antimasonic Convention. It was in reality the most farcical and laughable proceeding I ever witnessed in a public assembly. Almon Sortwell, Esquire—originally from New-Hampshire, lately a school master in Virginia, and now a young lawyer (of great promise,) in Ohio, aged about 40, was the Alpha and Omega of this truly laughable farce, which gave rise to the meeting of the citizens, and a very general one, on the next evening, when the resolutions of disapprobation, (herewith enclosed,) were unanimously passed. I was present at this meeting, which was composed principally, and almost wholly of citizens who were not masons—neither Mr. CAKE, the chairman, or Mr. KIMBLE, the secretary, is a mason—and their doings, I think, operated as a serious damper on the spirits of the Antis—plainly discernable the next day in their chop-fallen countenances.

In haste, your friend & ob't serv't.

Canton, July 22nd 1830.

Yesterday, and the day before, were noted in the history of Canton. Having business enough of their own to attend to, the people of Stark had made no preparation for the reception of the Magi, and they accordingly came, and went like ordinary individuals, but their stay—oh it was delightful! By the exertions of a very promising young lawyer of about forty, who has lately established himself in this town, the BELL was tolled; and the people assembled to know the cause, when they were informed that disinterested patriotism, and love of office had drawn a half dozen wool dyed democrats from Portage county down here, who were seeking the political salvation of Stark county, and that they had brought along a brace of seceders, the spared monuments of masonic vengeance, who would be exhibited the next day. That the thing might be done in style, it was proposed that a representation for Stark county be appointed. To match one from your county the young lawyer who got up the meeting was nominated, the question was put and all said yes, the contrary was put and all said no. The chairman was puzzled, and who would not have been? to know what to do but a wag kindly helped him out of the quandary, by moving that all in favor of the nomination should leave the house. Never was thought more lucky. The people had all become tired of this farce and left the house, no person remaining but the chairman, who was also the candidate in nomination. As he attended the convention next day, I presume he declared himself duly elected.

Probably you will want to know the number that attended this State Convention. I cannot tell exactly as they manufactured several very nice delegates after they got here—at a rough guess, real delegates manufactured delegates, volunteers and all, I should think, there might have been, perhaps, two dozen, and a half. Now, this handful of patriots, were brave as Hector, and wise as Ulysses. They made large speeches renounced, and denounced all who would not join them; declared that all that were not for them, were against, and that they, yes they, should visit vengeance on them at the polls. Never did Mahomet labor harder to gain proselytes by fear, and threats than did these virtuosi. But our German population are unused to be driven. They then tried the power of sympathy, spoke of Mrs. Morgan, and her babes, and resolved to make her a contribution. On going round I presume they got large donations, it is said the chairman of the Convention put in three shillings, York, and the secretaries two and six each. Why they made this difference in their donations I don't know—some thought that the difference was the ratio between their offices expectant.

They then resolved, for the purpose of giving their doings a respectable appearance abroad, that they would print them in a pamphlet, and let the world know that antimasonic tracts could be made in Ohio, as well as in New-York—but if the book does not make a more respectable appearance than their meeting did, I think their book merchant had better stick to Giddin's antimasonic almanacs.

Yours, with sentiments of esteem.

Ravenna Courier.

From the Lancaster Penn. Republican.

MR. EDITOR—Mr. Fenn, of the Herald, says that he has it from good authority, that there is a mason in Lancaster county who has sat in a lodge with the mail-robber, Wilson. Now please inform Mr. Fenn, that I will bet him $100 to $5, that he never heard of such a man; and that there is no such man in the county; and further inform that veracious gentleman, that I will make him a present of $50, if he will leave the name of any such man either at your office, at Graeff's, or Parker's hotel, at any time within a month. Let Mr. Fenn address a note to 'Leacock,' and it will be attended to.

Leacock, we can assure him, will never be troubled with any note from Theopilus. Having fabricated, for his own purposes, a base lie, he will be content to lie under the imputation of a liar, or else attempt, by some sneaking means, to creep out of it. Open ingenious, and manly dealing, Fenn is a stranger to.

MORE ANTIMASONIC TRUTH!!

The masons hold all the offices.

By a list published in the last 'Greensburg Republican,' of the persons who have held office by election or appointment in the county of Westmorland, since its organization, a period of FIFTY-SEVEN YEARS, it appears that twenty three were masons, and one hundred and seventy not masons! In the same period there has been but one mason, sheriff in that county. And by a similar list for the last twenty-five years, taken in the county of Armstrong, we are informed by the 'Kittanning Columbian' that the number of masons elected and appointed there during that time is THREE and the number of non-masons amounts to ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-EIGHT!!! We ask every lover of truth to weigh these statements and compare them with the assertions of the antimasonic leaders, and ask themselves what good can come out of a cause based on such fabrication and deception.—Penn. pa.

ANTIMASONIC PRESIDENT.—We believe it is generally expected by the antimasonic party, that the Convention to be held in Philadelphia next month, will nominate some prominent individual for the Presidency. The gentlemen who have been most frequently named, are Henry Clay and John McLean. We believe that they are both Masons. Mr. Clay certainly is; and Mr. McLean is a gentleman of too much principle, if he is not a Mason, to consent to be put in nomination by a party of desperate, degraded office-hunters. Thurlow Weed, of whisker notoriety—and the godfather of antimasonry—makes use of the following language:—"Let it be remembered by our enemies that no man continuing to adhere to his Masonic obligations, can receive the votes of Antimasons, for any responsible office in the gift of the people!!!" Mr. Clay, therefore, before he can receive the support of the antimasonic faction, must renounce Masonry! Will this base proposition be made to Henry Clay?

In regard to Mr. McLean, the Erie, Pa. Observer makes the following remarks:—"John McLean, late Postmaster General, has been for some time past held up by some of the antimasonic papers as a candidate for the next Presidency; he has been represented by them to be one of the most honest men and pure patriots that ever lived. We have long entertained this opinion ourselves, but it seems the tune is changed with the Antis. The Antimasonic Examiner, which we believe is accepted by all as the official organ of the party in this state, says:—"In regard to Mr. McLean's situation and feelings towards masonry there is much doubt. For a time the belief here was, that Judge McLean was free from masonic obligations; but since his late visit to Pittsburgh, the impression has gained ground that he is a mason of at least three degrees and that whether he belongs to the order or not, that he is not well affected towards antimasonry." What a pity! Thus it appears, that honesty, patriotism and talents weigh not a feather against the all important question, whether he is favourably inclined to antimasonry. What a comment we have here upon the virtue of the antimasonic cause. But yesterday, Judge McLean was worthy of their unbounded confidence, and no office was too high for him; to day, he is an outlaw, unfit to fill any post of honor or profit. No change of principle is alleged against him—no act of his life is found fault with—but it is rumoured that he is a mason of three degrees," and the cry is, down with him.

Antimasonry.—We have never seen but one thing with which Antimasonry could be compared—that is a hand organ. The grinding part is the same, and the players on the Antimasonic instrument grind out "Murder"—"Treason"—"Perjury"—"Hoodwink"—"Martyr"—"Widow"—"Kidnapper"—"Abduction"—"Morgan"—&c. with the same unvarying harmony that tunes are ground on the organ; and to produce a change in the tune the cylinder is only to be slipped and the same words ground out with the order changed.—Thus, "Kidnapper"—"Hoodwinked"—"Fraternity"—"Martyr"—"Perjured"—and so they go on, and every one that plays on the instrument adds a note if possible, which entitles him to a peg on the pillar of fame to hang his hat on. Occasionally a concert is given by these players, when for effect they use, instead of the above words—"Special Counsel"—"Weed"—"Granger"—"Whittlesey"—"Southwick"—"Giddins"—"Tracy"—&c. and it is only necessary for a person to be located in the neighborhood of either to become so familiar with them that they exercise no charm over him. It is those who are unaccustomed to the sounds and unacquainted with the machinery producing them, that are in the least operated upon by them.

BIOGRAPHY.

BIOGRAPHY OF GEORGE IV.

The history of a living monarch can seldom be depended on for its authenticity, as he is likely to be misrepresented both by his friends and his enemies. Those who are placed near his person, and are therefore supposed to be best qualified to furnish the materials for his biography, are generally influenced both by the hopes of preferment and the fears of giving offence; and thus many virtues are attributed to him which he does not possess, and censure is often withheld when it might be applied with the greatest propriety. In this brief sketch, however, we will endeavor to avail ourselves of such sources of information as are not liable to the charges of prejudice or partiality. Yet it must be promised that this course will reduce our observations to a very narrow focus; but although our narrative may discover a paucity of incident, we hope its unimpeachable veracity may atone for that defect.

George IV. was born August 12, 1762; and five days after his birth, letters patent passed under the great seal for creating him Prince of Wales. He was baptized on the 18th of September, in the same year. A writer remarks that his father was always particularly delighted with this ceremony; a predilection which deserves a little observation as many other of that monarch's affectations and antipathies. George the Fourth, in his youth is said to have exhibited some marks of superior talents: it is further observed that he made great and early proficiency in his studies, especially in the classics. He soon became so excellent a critic in the Greek language as to puzzle one of his tutors to the great amusement of the court. The poor man was so mortified at this circumstance, that he immediately made a resignation of his office. Notwithstanding the preceptive and exemplary care of his father, (whose moral character was certainly good, whatever may have been his intellectual deficiencies,) George the Fourth became a young man of many vicious propensities, associating with the most depraved characters, and frequently abandoning himself to every species of profligacy. There is a strong resemblance between his conduct and disposition and those of Charles II; the same reckless levity, the same fondness for illicit pleasures characterized these two branches of the ungenial houses of Stewart and Brunswick.

On the 8th of April, 1705, the nuptial ceremony between the Prince of Wales and his cousin, Caroline Amelia, was solemnized with great magnificence. This marriage, which subsequently proved so unfortunate, afforded the greatest satisfaction at the time to almost every member of the royal family. But the charms of a courtesan soon drew off the Prince's attention from his bride; and he began, in a short time, to treat the latter with the most mortifying neglect. When a venerable old gentleman took the liberty to expostulate with the Prince on this subject, he received an answer which is not fit to be repeated, and which discovers a brutality of disposition that would be disgraceful to any man in any station. When we consider the former life of the Prince of Wales, we need not be at a loss to account for his conduct towards his wife; for men who have given themselves up to certain modes of dissipation, are entirely unfit to enter into the matrimonial engagement. We are unwilling to believe that any misconduct on the part of the Princess, at that time, could have warranted such treatment. Imprudent she certainly was, but never overstepped the bounds of decorum until she had received repeated provocations from her husband.

In 1814, her royal highness embarked for Italy. On her way, she visited her brother, at the court of Brunswick, and was every where received with the honors due to her rank. She afterwards travelled in various parts of the continents of Europe, and also in Asia, visiting Jerusalem and other cities of Palestine, as well as different places in the Mediterranean. On the accession of her husband to the throne, her majesty's name was erased from the liturgy, and she was informed that if she returned to England, judicial proceedings would be instituted against her; but that fifty thousand pounds be allowed her if she consented to live abroad. This proposition was rejected with disdain. These circumstances gave rise to the following epigram:

"How can old England then forbear
So good a queen to own,
Who for her suffering country's care,
Leaves fifty thousand pounds a year,
And asks but half a crown?"

The Prince of Wales was installed in the office of Regent on the 5th of February, 1811, and took the following oath—"I do solemnly promise and swear, that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to his Majesty, King George." He also took another oath, to execute his high office agreeably to the act of Parliament in that case provided. The conduct of George the Fourth, during his regency, was better than could be expected from his private character. He ascended the throne January 31, 1820, under very inauspicious circumstances, the policy of the other nations of Europe being then opposed to England. His domestic situation was not more tranquil. Queen Caroline now arrived in England, and was greeted by the acclamation of the populace. On the day of her arrival, the King sent a message to Parliament, requesting that an inquiry into the Queen's conduct might be instituted, which request was complied with. During the Queen's trial, the public mind was greatly agitated, and party spirit was extremely violent. She was accused of improper familiarity with a menial whom she had taken into service, and whom she afterwards raised to rank and honor. A very small majority of the Lords having declared the Queen guilty, the bill was formally withdrawn. Her death, shortly afterwards, relieved the King from any further embarrassment on her account.

The coronation of George IV. in Westminster Abbey, took place on the 19th of July, 1821. It was celebrated with much splendor, and London never before contained such an assemblage of rank and fashion. As the high office he holds is not requisite of any extraordinary virtues or abilities, the King has continued to discharge its duties without incurring much censure or eliciting much praise.

Having stated these particulars, our limits oblige us to conclude. To place the character of George IV. in all its lights and shades before the public, must be the task of some future biographer.

Recent accounts from England state that the King is dangerously ill, and not expected to live. Indeed, the excesses of his youth might have warranted the supposition that he would never have arrived at his present age.—Phil. Casket.

When we subdue our passions, it is rather owing to their weakness than our strength.

MISCELLANY.

LOCAL PECULIARITIES OF SPEECH.

Yankee. Good morning, Mister. Can't I sell you a few notions to-day?

Southerner. I don't like your notions, they're too yankeeified for me. But wait a bit, I'll look at them.

Yankee. Let me sell you this ere fine-tooth comb; it's a real thing for taking hold of the live stock. Jest try it.

Southerner. I wish you'd have done with your vile Yankee talk, and speak like a man ought to.

Yankee. Now I swore, Mr. Southerner, you hadn't ought to open your mouth about Yankee talk, unless you can talk better yourself.

Southerner. And hark, sir, you never ought to open your mouth from July to eternity, unless you can leave off using such phrases as, hadn't ought, et cetera.

Yankee. In the first place, learn to talk as you'd ought to yourself, and then correct me.

Southerner. You orney fellow! do you pretend to call me to an account for my language?

Yankee. I did but drop a hint.

Southerner. Drap a hint! What right have you to be a drapping your hints about. Why, sir, I can teach you your alphabet from A to zed and from zed back again to A.

Yankee. Let's hear you begin.

Southerner. In all cases, then, if you mean to speak grammatically, talk just like I do. I've been to Master Swingletree's school year in and year out, and know how a man should talk.

Yankee. I dare say, you're pretty cute.

Southerner. Cute! pretty cute! now why don't you drap your Yankee phrases, and talk like a scholar?

Yankee. I'll drop my Yankee phrases as soon as ever you drop your draps, and your craps, and your scholards.

Southerner. Now you think you've caught me, I reckon. But you're mistaken there. I don't say drap, but drap.

Yankee. I know you say drap.

Southerner. Well, do drap the subject. I'm tired of it—it's too saf.

Yankee. Why don't you say soft, as you'd ought to do?

Southerner. I'm sure I do say saf, as much as you do.

Yankee. And a little more by a darn'd sight.

Southerner. What do you mean by a darn'd sight?

Yankee. Why, what a darnation fool you are to ax sich a silly question!

Southerner. I done it for the sake of information—that's all.

Yankee. You done it! ha, ha, ha! I guess you have done it indeed. Why don't you say did it, not done it?

Southerner. I suppose you'd have me talk like you do.

Yankee. No—I'd have you talk as I do, not like I do, by a darn'd sight. But say, Mister, can't I sell you a few notions?

Southerner. Your notion and mine don't agree; we can never hitch horses.

Yankee. Who axed you to hitch horses! All I want of you is to buy a few notions that I have to dispose of.

Southerner. I tell you I've no notion of buying any of your Yankee notions. I would as soon think of driving a trade in hop-loads.

Yankee. Hop-loads! what are them?

Southerner. Don't you know what hop-loads are? They're little creatures what hop like a frog does, and catch a fly in less than no-time.

Yankee. I know what a toad is well enough. But I should like to know if all toads don't hop.

Southerner. By all means—and that's the reason I call them hop-loads.

Yankee. By the same rule you might call a hog grunt-hog, because all hogs grunt.

Southerner. Ah, now you scrouge too hard, neighbor. Them, who lives in glass houses, should be the last to throw stones.

Yankee. True, true; but say, can't I sell you a few notions. I'll take any thing you've got in the way of trade.

Southerner. The devil a bit have I got any thing for trade, unless you'll take corn-cobs.

Yankee. I'll take any thing for the sake of a bargain. But what do you mean by corn-cobs?

Southerner. I mean the cobs what grow on corn-stalks. What do you say, shall I tote them out?

Yankee. Why, yes if we can agree upon the price. But do tell me what you mean by tote.

Southerner. O now you're too monstrous inquisitive—you scrouge too hard.

Yankee. If you're so darn'd 'fraid of being scrouged, as you say, I'll jog on.

Southerner. Well, away with you—clear out like a white-head.

Yankee. You're a very handsome looking man; it's a pity you're so darn'd ugly.

Southerner. How's that? be good enough to inform me how a man can be handsome and ugly at the same time.

Yankee. Easy enough. Ugliness applies to a man's actions and handsomeness to his looks.

Southerner. That's another of your vile Yankeeisms.

Yankee. We both have our notions, and if you wont trade for any of mine, I wont have any thing to do with yours. Good bye.

Southerner. Good bye, and the devil tote you.

Running down a Whale.—Much has been said, and more written about the thrift and sagacity of Yankees. Their aptness in turning every untoward accident to their advantage has long been proverbial. The following narration will go to illustrate this part of their character. Some fifteen years since a sloop of sixty tons or upwards was fitted on Connecticut river for the West Indies, with a cargo of small stock, consisting of sheep, pigs, poultry, &c. On the morning of the third day, when they were about equi-distant from Montaug and the Gulf Stream, a monstrous whale was espied a little ahead, fast asleep. The Captain, as jovial and laughter-loving as Jonathan as ever made a cucumber-seed out of bass-wood, called all hands upon deck. 'Boys,' said he, 'I'll play that greasy lubber a Yankee trick. Look you out now for a little fun.'

There was a smart breeze a blowing and the Captain taking the helm, run the sloop smack on the Whale. The leviathan not relishing such familiarity, raised his huge tail, and at a single sweep, carried away the bowsprit up to the night heads. Here was a Pretty kettle of fish as the cook said when she upset the lobster.

'There, Captain, by golly,' said the mate, 'you've got fun enough for all hands now.'

'Ahem—I swear,' returned the Captain, 'who would have thought'o that. Well, if we can't go to Turk's Island, well try Martha's Vineyard. Put her away for Gay head.'

In less than a week the sloop reached the Vineyard, the pigs and poultry were sold, and the sheep turned out to pasture. In another week, the vessel was repaired, a sufficiency of salt on board, and on her way for the Banks of Newfoundland. A load of fish was soon caught, and the sloop Good Intent made five hundred dollars by the attempt of the Captain to make a little sun by running down a whale.

FILIAL AFFECTION.

A French officer, going to rejoin his regiment, took the opportunity, while on the road, to enlist some recruits whom he wanted to complete his company, and had got several in a city where he halted. Two days before he determined to march from the city, a young man of a very graceful figure and pleasing aspect presented himself. An air of politeness and candor prepossessed every beholder in his favor, and the officer at the first interview wished to engage him, while with the utmost precipitation he offered to enlist. The officer perceived his embarrassment, and tried to remove it. 'Ah, sir,' said the young man 'do not I entreat you, attribute my disorder to any base or shameful motive; but perhaps you do not choose to engage me, and in that case dreadful indeed will be my misfortune.' Some tears escaped as he uttered these last words, and the humane officer, eager to relieve him, demanded to know his conditions. 'They will perhaps, disgust you, sir, and I cannot propose them without trembling. I am young. You see my size. I have strength and every disposition to serve, but the unfortunate circumstances I am in, compel me to set a price upon myself, which I am confident you will think is too exorbitant, though I can make no abatement. Believe me, that without the most pressing reasons I would never sell my services. I cannot follow you for less than 500 livres, and you will break my heart if you refuse me.' 'Five hundred!' replied the officer. 'The sum is considerable I confess; but I feel myself prepossessed in your favor. You seem well disposed. Therefore I will not dispute the bargain with you. Here is the cash. Sign, and hold yourself in readiness to march by the day after to-morrow.' The young man seemed overjoyed at thus obtaining his desire, and with great alacrity signed the engagement.

After receiving his 500 livres, he requested his captain's permission for a short absence to fulfil a sacred duty, and promised a speedy return. It was granted. But the officer, curious to find out the intention of his new soldier, followed him, who, on his part rather flew than ran to the prison, knocked eagerly at the door, which was no sooner opened, than he darted in, saying hastily to the jailor, 'I have here the sum for which my father was arrested. Take care of it but conduct me to him. Let me have the happiness to release him.' The officer stopped a moment to give him time to go alone to his father, and then followed. But how affecting was the scene that presented itself. The young man closely embraced by his aged father, who, upon hearing the sacrifice he had made, felt his emotion too powerful to express—but his silent though eloquent language of tears evinced his gratitude to the Almighty for giving him so inestimable a son, while paternal tenderness mourned the sad extremity to which he was driven. officer, no longer able to conceal his feelings came forward and said, 'Take comfort, my good old man. I will not take your son from you—but on the contrary, will share with him in the meritorious action he has performed. I can never regret a sum he had made so noble a use of, and here is his engagement which I return to him.' The father and his son fell at their benefactor's feet, expressing the most lively gratitude for his generosity—but the son respectfully declined the offer of liberty, and entreated the captain to accept of his services, which with some difficulty he obtained, represented that his father having then no employment for him. He joined the regiment and fulfilled the term of his engagement. He always while in the army, saved a small sum out of his pay, which he regularly remitted to his father—and upon receiving his discharge, returned to provide, by his daily labor, for their mutual support.

From the London Monthly Magazine. POISON FOR THE RATS.

A paddy once fresh from the banks of the Shannon,
And for the Temple bound, middle or inner,
To London came, where, by the ancient cannon,
Folk's learn the law, by—eating many a dinner.

Thus children when they will not take to learning,
Too quick of temper, or too thick in head,
Are by their stomachs taught—for letters yearning,
Seductive in Dutch foil and gingerbread.

Paddy who thought this mode of studying law,
By masticating mutton very clever,
No vast utility in reading saw,
And troubled Coke's and Blackstone's pages—never.

So while the cash was flush, he 'saw the town,'
Drank his Champagne—at no expense would stop;
But when the Spanish failed, perforce came down,
And at the cook's shop ate his mutton chop.

It chanced that, when his cash was running taper,— That's, when his notes were no more—common places—
Ere all was gone to have one parting caper,
He drove his tilbury to Epsom Races.

Still he determined on a frugal plan,—
A plain beef-steak, a chicken and some claret,
'It was high time economy began,
His purse was low, and d—n it, he must share it.'

Man but proposes, while 'tis Heaven directs!
When Rabelais' quart d'hure brought in his bill,
If it had errors they were not defects,
And though 'twas long, pat's face was longer still.

To say the truth, the bill was most unseas'nable;
For he had chosen a 'prime' caravansary,
There they take merit in a charge unreas'nable
In short—the bill was like a bill in Chancery.

While pat this woodcock reckoning was scanning,
'So much potatoes, and so much for butter,'
The landlord, who with some strange man stood planning
Began, in under-tone of rats to mutter.

It was a rat catcher, whose schemes had failed,
To save the landlords, meat and cheese from plunder,
And much 'my host' with many a curse detailed,
'Is there no remedy to keep rats under?'

'Is it the rats you'd banish, man?' gouth pat;
'To clear your house of them, without much pain
There's your own bill; by J—s, shew them that,
And, faith and troth, they'll not come here again.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, AUGUST 14, 1880.

ELDER DAVID PEASE.

On the first page hereof, we have placed the second of a series of numbers addressed to this Reverend and pious divine. In addition, the Belchertown Sentinel furnishes the annexed letter, as evidence of "the enduring sense of gratitude, and conscientious regard to promises," manifested by this spotless disciple of anti-ism. "The letter," (says the Sentinel,) is in the hand writing of the apostate himself, and has been furnished us for publication, from the files of the Lodge. We are informed from unquestionable authority, that several individual Masons taxed themselves, annually, in gratuities to Mr. P. while settled here, about the amount of their ministerial tax. The Rev. gentleman received their donations with many professions of gratitude, and lauded much the spirit-stirring benevolence of Masonry. How are the tables turned! Now he does not blush to say, Masonry is inordinately selfish, and enormously wicked! that Masons are conspirators against the public welfare, and enemies to mankind!! O shame where is thy blush! O piety how art thou mocked and prostituted!"

David Pease has been a Mason fifteen or twenty years. He has prayed often and fervently for the prosperity of the Masonic fraternity. He has knelt in solemn prayer at the altar of the Lodge, and with uplifted hands, implored a blessing from his God, on that Institution which he now denounces as the most "dangerous and damnable" on earth! Did he act the hypocrite then? Or, is he playing the knave now? He either knelt in solemn mockery before his Maker, and impiously invoked the favor of heaven on the iniquitous transactions of a band of infamous wretches; or he now sets at defiance the curse of his God; heaps perjury upon his own soul; kneels at the altar, and imprecates curses where he had before implored blessings! He has declared the principles of Masonry, to be "the principles of our holy religion." He now contends that they lead to innocent bloodshed, and to the perpetration of outrages and murder. These cannot both be true.—On which horn of the dilemma will the Rev. preacher be hung? Is it not, to say the least, a little surprising that, after having been conversant with the principles of the Masonic Institution for twenty years, Mr. Pease should not have discerned their evil tendency, until the present moment of excitement and discovery? He declares that the disclosures which have been made by Morgan and others, are true. He admits then that he has taken upon himself the most solemn obligation which language can enjoin upon him; and, in the character of a preacher of the gospel, and in the presence of his God, he has violated that obligation! Now, if his declaration be true, he has, in the presence of his Maker foresworn himself!—literally bartered his soul for a mess of pottage—and imprecated upon his head the deep-toned curses of heaven. If tried by the moral code, he stands in the same predicament with the wretch who has perjured himself in a court of justice. Between the two, in the forum of conscience and the tribunal of the Most High and righteous Judge, there can be no difference. The admission that he has voluntarily taken and broken such oath cannot be regarded in any other light than as a direct admission of the high crime of moral perjury!—a crime for which the criminal code of his country may have made no provision;—nevertheless, it is a crime, for the commission of which he must answer at the bar of his God. Among men, the acknowledged act must consign him to infamy and disgrace. He cannot escape the consequences of his own folly. If what he now asserts be true, he has been, for fifteen or twenty years past, one of the greatest scoundrels, or consummate fools, that ever trod the earth. If what he says be not true, then he stands before the public a self-convicted liar! As the Rev. gentleman has followed the example of Judas in one instance, he might perhaps relieve his conscience and avoid the consequences of the dilemma into which he has plunged himself, by following his illustrious prototype in another! The following is the letter referred to, at the beginning of this article:—

"BELCHERTOWN, Nov. 13, 1815.

To the W. Master, Wardens and Brethren of Mount Vernon Lodge:

Respected Brethren—

Please to accept my most grateful and unfeigned thanks for the recent favor received from you, in the present of a Coat and Hat bestowed by your generosity upon me, and be assured they will be worn with just sensations of your politeness and generosity. And I shall ever esteem it my duty and highest pleasure, to do every thing in my power to promote the honor and welfare of this Lodge.

Yours, in the bonds and affections of Masonry,
"DAVID PEASE."

Ingratitude we hold to be one of the worst crimes of which human nature can be guilty. The ingrate is fit only for "treason, stratagem and spoil."—He is always ready to smite the hand that feeds him! In proof of this we appeal to the above letter and to the conduct of its reverend and pious author. Whilst he had neither a coat to his back, nor a hat to his head, he considered it his "highest pleasure" to promote the honor and welfare of the Lodge! But after his Masonic brethren had clothed him and fed him—when they had no more to give, or he no longer requiring their aid, he basely and treacherously deserts, betrays, and vilifies them! If the man who can deliberately be guilty of this, is not ripe for the commission of any crime on the catalogue of wickedness, we know not what qualifications are requisite to make him so. We seldom meet with a baser wretch than the ungrateful man.

We have a high regard for the ministerial office; but we have not a blind adoration for every man who may assume the badge of that sacred profession. There are ignorant and bigoted pretenders in religion, as well as in more worldly matters. And it will not be denied that a very large portion of those who officiate as preachers of the gospel, in the United States, are men without an adequate education; without qualifications commensurate with the responsibilities of that important office. We know that such men are superstitious to the highest degree; and that, with them, it is a received axiom, that "the end sanctifies the means;" that they will break down all barriers, to the attainment of a single object; though that object, when attained, be injudicious and prejudicial to the peace and happiness of the little flock of good people, whom Providence has placed under their care and protection. Among this class we rank Elder David Pease. And it is folly to presume that Freemasonry will escape the censure and calumny of such bigoted self-righteous pretenders. But what do these men mean? Do they believe themselves commissioned by Him, whose humbly devoted servants they profess to be,—to generate strife and contention in community? Or, are they called, (as they assume to be,) by Divine Goodness, to allay the turbulent passions of our nature, and to establish "peace on earth, and good will among men?" We are not disposed to question, on a tenable grounds, the motives of any class of men. But we do doubt the motives of that clergyman—the motives of Elder Pease, if you please—who, for a long series of years, has been a member of the Masonic family; who has been constant in his attendance on the Lodges; who has advocated the Institution in public and in private; and who has given it the sanction of his character and influence: we repeat, we doubt the motives of such a man, when, in a time of general excitement, he comes forward and denounces the Institution as immoral and licentious. Is he weak enough to set up the ridiculous defence that he has been deceived, for the many years he has been a Mason? Then he admits that he is not possessed of common sense; and, of course, his judgment or his evidence in this case, is not to be relied on. Does he not set up this plea, then we say, he has, for this length of time, been a hypocrite and practised the basest deceptions, not only as regards his Masonic brethren, but the public in general; or, place the matter in another light, and presume that he was honest and sincere, in his devotions to the fraternity; and the conclusion is inevitable, that he is now a dissembler, unworthy of trust or confidence; a dishonored christian and profligate libeller. Let the sincere christian, of whatever denomination, bear continually in mind that it is written, that, "in the latter days, wolves shall assume to themselves sheep's clothing, and scatter the flock."

ALABAMA.—The following extract of a letter to the editor hereof, dated Washington, Ala. July 19, will be read with interest by our brethren in this section of the country. The source from whence it comes is entitled to implicit credit. Antimasonry cannot live in the Southern States. There is too much warm blood there. The Southron has too much manly feeling—too much regard for the character of his neighbor, to countenance the spread of such a proscriptive, persecuting monster.

"The independent and fearless course you pursue, has gained the approbation of all unprejudiced and intelligent men in Alabama. We have our restless spirits, who do not expect to rise on their own virtues, and wish to take advantage of the heated passions of the 'weak vulgar.'" But, thank heaven, we have still a redeeming spirit in our land, and the cry of thousands in this State is, "God forbid that the monster, Antimasonry, may become predominant throughout the United States. We may then say, farewell Liberty, virtue and every thing that makes life desirable." The 24th June was celebrated by our Lodge, Autauga Lodge, No. 31, in fine style. At a previous anniversary meeting, we had only about thirty five or forty Brethren; but at this, many of our old Fathers in the cause came out. O, how it delighted me, to see their grey hairs giving the lie direct to Antimasons! Two of our old brethren fought and bled in the glorious struggle for Liberty, (Revolutionary war,) and one of them observed—"I am a soldier of the Revolution, I fought for Liberty, I am a Mason, a patriot—who of you ever heard aught against the character of CAMPBELL? It has been fifteen years since last I met in a Lodge, (though I have been a mason near forty years,) but having heard how unjustly and illiberally my order was attacked, and censured, I was determined this day, through the help of God, to appear among you, and convince my friends and neighbors, if possible, of the base designs of Antimasons." There were present nearly seventy brethren. We had a very appropriate Oration, delivered at the court house, by our Brother JOSEPH P. DEIGHAN. Hundreds of our worthy citizens attended. I never saw a more orderly congregation; and they retired, perfectly convinced of the slanders heaped upon us by the Antimasonic squad. Mark the result—a healthy reaction has taken place. On the same day four or five petitions were handed in; they have since been initiated, and express themselves perfectly convinced of the utility and goodness of the Institution. Petitions from our most worthy and respectable citizens are daily coming in, and the great and good work goes bravely on."

GENERAL MEETING.—On Monday the votes of the inhabitants were taken upon the following resolutions—At the close of the poll the whole number of votes was found to be 2498, viz:—For the resolves 1946—against them 532—nearly four to one.

1. Resolved, That it is expedient for the City of Boston to make application to the Legislature of the Commonwealth for an act authorizing said city to subscribe for and take shares of stock in the Rail Road to be established in a direction calculated to facilitate an intercourse between Boston and the Western States, and to such an amount as said City shall deem proper, Provided the amount shall not exceed one million dollars.

2. Resolved, That the City Council be requested and instructed to prepare and present to the General Court, at an early day of the next session, a petition for an act granting the authority aforesaid.

3. Resolved, That the Senators of the County of Suffolk, and the Representatives of the City of Boston, be requested to exert their influence to promote the passage of such an act.

THE FLOOD IN VERMONT.—As the Mirror circulates extensively in the State of Vermont, we have thought that we could not better subserve the cause of humanity, than by giving publicity to the following Appeal. Though the appeal is made particularly to the citizens of Vermont, we think it presents a case worthy of the consideration of the benevolent of our own State. We would suggest to the philanthropic of this city, the propriety of calling a public meeting of such citizens as are disposed to contribute to the relief of their suffering fellow-beings. A few hundred dollars would go far to alleviate the afflictions of "a mother, and three helpless children, reduced to widowhood and orphanage and want, by this awful visitation." The persons drowned are a Mr. Bancroft, of Calais; David Grant, of Berlin; the wife of Harvey Carpenter, of Moretown; Charles Bryant, of Hartford; Chas. Rannels, of Pierpont, N. H.; March Allard, of Haverhill, N. H.; Miss Eliza Hatch, of Surry, N. H.; and a Mr. Wheeler, of Royalton.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The undersigned Committee appointed by meetings of inhabitants of Middlebury, New Haven, and Bristol, in the County of Addison and State of Vermont, for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of private damages sustained in said towns and their vicinity by the late flood, and of devising measures for the relief of the sufferers, beg leave to present to the public the following statement of facts.

The rain that formed the flood commenced on Sunday the 25th July and continued, with little intermission, though with no extraordinary violence, until evening of the following day when it suddenly increased to almost a torrent, which continued with slight intervals for several hours:—The streams that descended immediately from the mountains became very suddenly swollen to an extent unparalleled, within the recollection of our oldest inhabitants. It was at the hour of midnight! The residents in the immediate vicinity of Middlebury and New Haven Rivers were aroused from their slumber by torrents of water sweeping around their dwellings and threatening them with instant destruction. Numbers had scarcely time to effect their escape by leaping from their beds and precipitately fleeing from their habitations, before those habitations were smothered to fragments and born away upon the surface of the flood. The horrors of the scene was most greatly heightened by the most intense darkness. To save any thing but life was impossible; and even the efforts to do that proved, also, in many cases unavailing. In a single hamlet, in the west part of New Haven, containing a population of but little more than fifty, fourteen human beings suddenly exchanged the quiet of the midnight hour for a conflict with the merciless element, beneath whose foaming surface they that hour slept the sleep of death!

Of the amount of the loss in the towns above mentioned it is impossible for us to speak with very great precision. There were swept away and destroyed,—

In Middlebury, one grist mill, one clothier's work's, one saw mill, and two dwelling houses.

In New Haven, one woollen factory, two clothier's works, two grist mills, three saw mills, three triphammer shops, two furnaces, one set of carding machines, and four dwelling houses.

In Lincoln, two saw mills, two forges with 20,000 bushels of coal and a large quantity of iron ore, and two dwelling houses.

In Weybridge, one woollen factory, one saw mill, and one set of carding machines.

In addition to dwelling houses, there have been destroyed a great number of shops, barns and other out-buildings. Large quantities of lumber have been carried away with the saw mills.

We make no estimation of the damage to roads and bridges,—only stating that there have been swept away on New Haven river, including its branches, twenty bridges; on Otter Creek one, and on Lemon Fair one.

In all of the above towns, crops of every description, in the vicinity of the rivers have been severely injured,—in many cases, entirely destroyed, and the soil itself swept away.

We speak most undeniably within the limits of truth when we estimate the whole amount of private damage at between fifty and sixty thousand dollars.

Of the loss thus estimated, a very considerable portion has fallen upon individuals who solicit no aid from charity. Severely as they have suffered, they still retain a competency: and they would not, if they could, avail themselves of the liberality of their fellow citizens, since it would necessarily diminish the amount of relief to those who are stripped of their all, and reduced to absolute want.—Among the latter class, there is an extent of suffering of which we can communicate no adequate idea to the public; and which calls for a prompt and liberal relief. There are a number of families who, with their mills; their shops, and dwellings, have lost their furniture, their clothing, their provisions and every thing but their lives. Among them is a mother, and three helpless children, reduced to widowhood and orphanage and want, by this awful visitation. They are all our neighbors. We are witnesses of their sufferings. They reach forth their hands and silently implore relief. Shall they not speedily and liberally receive it?

The case we present to you, fellow citizens, you will readily perceive is one of no common interest. The voice of ordinary suffering should not have been heard beyond the limits of its own immediate neighborhood. The sorrowing heart should have been made glad with the charity which doubles its value by the silence with which it dispenses its favors. But Providence has, in a manner, denied us this privilege, by the visitation of a calamity, which it surpasses the ordinary limits of our charities to repair. In an unexpected, and awful moment, the heavens burst upon our mountains, and terrors were precipitated throughout our valleys, bearing upon their bosom the labors of years, and sweeping in their desolating march, the treasures, the hopes, and the happiness of numbers to an untimely grave. It is for such sufferers that we plead. In their behalf we address a community, every individual of which, has been taught to regard himself but as the Steward of the goods which he possessed—to look on every human being as his brother and to feel that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." To such a community we feel a confident assurance that we shall not appeal in vain. Can you, fellow citizens, sit quietly in the midst of your possessions—in the enjoyments of your abundance while those sufferers raise their imploring eyes and look to you for relief? Heaven granted you an exemption from the horrors of that night. You were quietly and securely reposing upon your pillows, while your brethren were buffeting the raging element, and witnessing the sudden prostration of all their earthly hopes. Your bosoms were spared the pangs of an unlooked for separation from your dearest friends, amid the horrors of a midnight tempest, and a midnight inundation. Oh, how utterly valueless would you have then regarded the treasures you are now asked to give—indeed all the earthly possessions of which you can boast. Give then, we beseech you,—give a liberal portion of those treasures to relieve your suffering brethren, and to manifest your gratitude to the merciful Providence which kindly spared you the perils and the pangs of that dreadful hour.

Donations forwarded to either of the undersigned, will be faithfully appropriated under their joint direction to the benefit of the most needy of the sufferers.

KING OF ENGLAND.—The event so long anticipated has taken place—His Majesty George IV. died at Windsor on the 26th June, at quarter past 3 o'clock. He is succeeded by his brother, William Henry, Duke of Clarence, who assumes the title of William IV. He was born Aug. 12, 1765. The old ministers have been reappointed: and it is believed that the new king will pursue the political course of his brother. The New York Courier very justly remarks:—"The death of the King of England is not an event of deep interest to this country, as it neither affects its policy nor deranges its internal concerns; yet as Sovereign and Chief Magistrate of a country in amity with the United States, it is an event of more than ordinary importance, and must give rise to many speculations as to the result: it calls also upon us to offer our condolence to such of his subjects as consider his death a national calamity, and had cause to respect him while living."

ALGIERS.—The French papers contain advices from the Expedition to the 26th June, up to which time its movements had been successful. The Turks made an attack on the French army on the 24th, but were defeated and driven back. It is not improbable that the French are at this time, in possession of the city of Algiers. Six thousand Arabs voluntarily submitted to the French Army on the 20th; and on the following night another corps presented themselves, and made their submission.

CORRESPONDENTS.—We cannot perceive that any good is to result from a discussion of the subject suggested by our Brooklyn correspondent. The matter may perhaps be considered rather injudicious—as one of those sayings, which had been as well unsaid—though we do not consider it very "reprehensible," or very difficult of defence; because, in a figurative, if not in a literal sense it is true.—Should it become necessary, we may hereafter advert to the subject. The request to publish the "Address to the people of Plymouth County," shall be attended to next week.

COUNTERFEIT DETECTOR.—This is the title of a new paper published in Philadelphia by R. T. Bokenell. It contains a list of all the broken banks in the country; counterfeit bank notes; a price current, and such other information as is calculated to benefit storekeepers and men of business, to whom we take the liberty of recommending it.

ANTIMASONRY IN WARREN COUNTY.

It is probably known to most of our readers, that some time in June, the Antimasonic party here, issued their proclamation to the different townships, to meet on the 13th of this month, at the usual place of holding elections, & elect at least two representatives, in each township, to attend a county convention on the Monday following to tell the people who to vote for. Being ten townships, there would be at least twenty delegates. So on Monday last the delegates gathered in from the four winds, and went into convention, to lay down the rules to the people—to lay their plans to prostrate all before them. But, as Providence would have it, there were but four delegates, just enough for President, Vice President, and Secretary. But two townships represented, Sugar Grove and this, which, at the last general election gave five Antimasonic votes. What was done is unknown, as it was all done in secret, although, they say, good things should be done in public. What could they do? FOUR delegates! what an august assembly! Such a convention as the world never before saw. Behold them gravely sitting, each reading in the eye of the other the high purpose, the firm resolve—solemnly considering the mighty question, how shall we get into office!

GREECE.

A King for Greece!—a king for Greece!
—Wanted a "Sovereign Prince" for Greece!
For the recreant Knight
Hath broken his plight,
Some say from policy, some from fright,
Some say in hope to rule for his niece,
He hath refused to be King over Greece.

A King for Greece!—a King for Greece!
Where shall we find a King for Greece?
Score after score,
A hundred or more,

Candidates crowd round The Treasury door.
For Athens and Thebes, and the Peloponese,
All of them eager to reign over Greece.

Big O exclaims, "Be the diadem mine!
I sprang from chiefs of an illegant line,
The Mahonites swear,
If to stand I should dare,
I shall never again sit for the County of Clare.
Oh! what will I do should Parliament cease?
Oh! make me the Sovereign Prince of Greece!"

Now naye, now naye thou vagabond Dan,
In faith thou never may'st be the man,
Thou'lt cringe and cry,
And bully, and lie,
Yet shrink from danger whene'er it comes nigh!
A Skulker in war, a draggart in peace,
Thou never may'st be the Prince of Greece.

"Oh! I'll be King, and the Nation shall thrive,
And I'll make one half penny pass for five!
Subscribe! Subscribe!
Ye Chew bacon tribe,
Give Peel and Wellington each a bribe;
'Twill cost no more than a penny apiece,
To buy Will. Cobbett the Crown of Greece."

Now spare, now spare, thou grey-headed sinner
The poor man's purse for the poor man's dinner!
In vain thou'dst rob it,
To mob it, and job it,
Thou never may'st reign, thou wicked Will. Cobbett!
Traitor to all parties, all to fleecy,
A vampire were better than thou for Greece.

"Oh! I'll be King!—oh! I'll be King!
And the people for joy shall dance and sing,
For Lords shall mix
With Layers of bricks,
And chimney-sweeps ride in their coaches and six;
Then shout, boys, shout, nor your clamoring cease,
Till Henry Hunt is the Monarch of Greece."

Now naye, now naye, thou vain Blacking-man,
Thou wert fitter by far to be King of Japan;
Thy Reps, and Rapsallions,
And Tatterdemallions,
With their whitey-brown hats and their pewter medallions,
Fit subjects they for the new Police,
They never shall make thee the King of Greece!

"Now, tell me the price! now tell me the price!
Don't stand shilly-shally, nor be over nice;
No matter how high,
I'll buy, I'll buy!

Then who'll be so great or so grand as I?
In my diamond tiara and ermined pelisse,
No longer a Dutchess but Queen of Greece!"

Now naye, proud Dutchess, now naye, now naye,
No Queen, but Quean, which is spelt with an a!
Full shameful, I ween,
It were in a Queen

To booze on Kurseh Wasser and proof Maraschin,
Anoint thee, Witch!—thy maudlin caprice
Shall never, O never, give law to Greece!

A King for Greece?—Oh, who may he be?
—Ye'll just gie the Sovereign Croon to me!
The Siller's the thing
That makes a gode King;
To sic a fine pass the revenue I'll bring Ye'll see the whole tottle hoorly increase,
Gin ye'll mak Joey the King o' Greece!"

Now naye, now naye, thou pawkie and Scot,
Thy knaverie is not so soon forgot,
Thy tricks in the Loan
Are fare too well known,
Thou'dst "rob the Exchequer," and call it thine own!
Now naye, friend Joey, no'er think us such Geese,
That a Fox like thee, should be King over Greece.

Alas! for Greece!—Alas! for Greece!
We never shall find a fit King for Greece;
That Royal pair,
"Lance" and Chabert,
Are both of them a burning to blaze away three,
Like William and Mary on a half-crown piece,
With heads conjoined to reign over Greece.

That never may be!—That never may be Though Satan were joined to make Fire-Kings three;
No Quackified Gander,
Or red Salamander
May sit where sat Macedon's Great Alexander:
Oh! had we Sovereigns fiery as these
Who might intruse the safety of Greece!

Alas for Greece!—Our hopes decrease,—
We must look for a King among the Chinese!

There's Dumbrowsky,
And Poniatowsky,
Soltikoffs twenty,
And Romanoffs plenty,
Mastuchiwitz, Tchitchangoff,
(Enough to give a witch a cough),
Pole and Russ,
All making a fuss,
With Germans and Dutch,
The sceptre to clutch—
Van Rump, Van Frump,
Van Beest and Van Trump!
There's Prince Esterhazy,
So rich and so lazy;
There's Prince Emilius,
Looking so bilious;
And Count Capo d'Istery
Famous in history;
With Wirtemberg Paul,
And the Devil and all,

French, Swiss, Spanish and Piedmontese,
All of them mad to reign over Greece!

Oh, Jupiter! Sire of Gods and men,
To thine own Olympus return again!

Bring back Mercurious,
Thy son, though spurious,
And Phebus and Juno,
And Hebe, whom you know;
Sweet little Cupid,
With Bacchus and Venus,
And Pan and Silenus,

And the rest, who at School used so much to chagrin us!

Restore, once more,
To thy Classical Shore

Her "bright golden Age" and her "Glories of Yore!"
(Two phrases I've borrow'd from honest Tom Moore,)

From fierce Seraskiers,
Whisker'd up to the ears;
From Slaves,
And Knaves,
And Fools,
And Tools,

Thine own fair realm at length release,
And send us a Patriot Prince for Greece!

RUSTIC POLITENESS.—The father of the present Lord Abington, who was remarkable for the stateliness of his manners, one day riding through a village in the vicinity of Oxford met a lad dragging a calf along the road, who, when his lordship came up to him, made a stop, and stared him full in the face. His lordship asked the boy if he knew him. He replied, "Ees." "What is my name?" said his lordship. "Why, Lord Abington," replied the lad.—"Then why don't you take off your hat?" "So I will, zur," said the boy, "if ye'll hold the calf."

INTOXICATION.—A man in Maryland, who was addicted to drunkenness, hearing a considerable uproar in his kitchen one night, felt the curiosity to step to the door, to know what was the matter; when behold, his servants were indulging the most unbounded laughter at a couple of his negro boys, who were there mimicking himself, in his drunken fits, as how he reeled and staggered—how he looked and nodded—and hickupped and tumbled;—the pictures which these children of nature drew of him, and which held the rest with such inexhaustible merriment, struck him with so salutary a disgust, that from that night he became a perfectly sober man, to the great joy of his wife and children.

MOORE & SEVEY, 46, WASHINGTON ST.

HENRY P. LEWIS, PRINTER.

From the Hampshire Sentinel.

TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

RENOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.
No. 3.

Having, Sir, in my two previous epistles, considered somewhat at length some of your favorite apologies for secession, you will, now, permit me to examine, cursorily, some of your leading doctrines. And, Sir, I promise you, if these doctrines are found to be based on reason and truth, that I will forego my long cherished partialities for Masonry, and become a proselyte to your creed. But, if it shall appear that their basis is not thus secure, and permanently founded, but, on the contrary, that it rests in error and sophistry, false reasoning and perversion of the truth, what will become your duty, as an honest man?—most manifestly, to renounce your renunciation, recant your manifold slanders, repent of your seditious practices, take upon your lips the language of penitence, and raise your voice in earnest supplication for forgiveness, if, indeed, such monstrous guilt can be pardoned.

Your fundamental position is, that "Masonry is corrupt and corrupting," yet, you assert that "you have the same respect for Masons as ever," and that "some of the best and holiest men belong to the society." Here seems to me to be a most palpable contradiction; an avowal of sentiments utterly irreconcilable, and so diametrically opposite, that proving the truth of either, demonstrates the utter falsity of the other. Is it not so?—or, is my intellectual vision yet so obscured by the controlling influence of common sense and honest feeling, not having been illuminated by this "new light," as to perceive clearly the harmony and concordance of principles, naturally and necessarily repugnant? I have been taught, Sir, to judge a tree by its fruits, to pronounce upon the qualities of streams by ascertaining the properties of their fountain, to estimate men's characters by their conduct. Are not these safe rules? Are not these correct modes of forming opinions? Let us, then, test the purity and justness of your doctrines by this mode of examination. Do bitter fountains send forth sweet waters? Does the lily produce the thorn, or the rose the thistle? "Masonry," you allege, "is corrupt," yet admit its professors to be "honorable men." Corrupt causes, then, it would seem, have lost their usual power over men. Honest and honorable men may, it seems, with impunity, expose themselves to this dire contagion. Could you hope that even the veriest dupe would believe these assertions? Your audience had, indeed, a splendid example of corruption before them, but more than a solitary instance, however distinguished, would be requisite to convince the reflecting. Now, Sir, let me ask you in all soberness, can you hope ever to persuade men, that you are sincere in these assertions—that you yourself believe them true? Were it true that "Masonry is corrupt," would not its corrupting influence be manifest?—Could men continue for years, active and constant members of the institution, frequently participating in its secret labors, and constantly breathing its infected atmosphere, without exhibiting marks of growing depravity? Is it possible that they could be exposed to all this debasing and brutalizing influence, from which you have so happily and honorably escaped, during a long life, and remain, not only honest and honorable, but esteemed and honored for their virtues? A novel species of corruption truly, whose virus, I apprehend, operates solely on the predisposed. Is this the ordinary operation of corrupt causes? Can a man frequent the grogshop, day after day and year after year, without exhibiting its effects? Can he associate with gamblers and jockies, familiarly, for years, and contract none of their habits? Can he expose himself to any vice, unguardedly, and for a long time, without becoming more or less subject to its power? Can he heartily join in the anathemas of the infidel, patiently listen to the blasphemies of the profane, and mingle, cheerfully, in the bacchanalian's songs and revels and remain uninfected? You must acknowledge, even you cannot avoid the concession, that hitherto, these things have been unknown among men. "Evil communication corrupts good manners," and "men are prone to iniquity as the sparks are to fly upward," and if Masonry were as corrupt, as you represent it, no human power could prevent its votaries from becoming utterly abandoned and reprobate. It is, indeed, an irreversible law of nature, that a bitter tree shall produce bitter fruit, and that a corrupt fountain shall send forth impure waters. Before, then, you can establish the truth of your fundamental principles, you must reverse the established order of things, and introduce a new series of causes and effects. You perceive, Sir, the conclusion, to which, we are driven, by this course of reasoning. It is irresistible and must be conclusive.—Masons being, by your own admission, honorable and worthy men, negatives conclusively your assertion, that Masonry is corrupt, for if it were indeed corrupt, this corruption could not remain hid, but would manifest itself in the life and conduct of its votaries. Are not these premises correct—is not the conclusion justly deduced?—How, then, can you avoid confessing yourself guilty of deliberate and wilful misrepresentation? I regret, Sir, that any man of ordinary capacity should so degrade himself, as to proclaim such barefaced absurdities, much more, that the minister of reconciliation should assume upon himself the vile office of an inflammatory demagogue, and go from place to place, agitating the public mind, "for the sake of filthy lucre."

You and I, Sir, know full well the tenets, doctrines, tendencies, and duties of Masonry. Could you offer the plea of ignorance in extenuation of your guilt, I would most gladly receive it. It affords me no pleasure to trace depravity through its intricate windings, and hunt the lurking Pharisee from his fancied securities. You have no such apology to offer. We have together seen the high, and the reverend, and the venerable, gather around the altar of mutual fidelity, and pledge before God and man, their mutual faith. We have together kneeled before the dread presence of the Great I Am, and he, who lifted up his voice in our behalf, was a Judas. We have often listened to the solemn admonitions, "As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye the same unto them"—"strive to enter in at the straight gate"—"as you would stand in the latter day, bring ye forth works meet for repentance"—"in all things, approve yourselves unto God, and to one another"—"walk humbly, righteously and piously in this present world, presenting your soul and body a living sacrifice, which is your reasonable service." Fallen as you are, apostate as you are, you cannot, nay, you dare not deny, that the above are the legitimate and oft inculcated instructions of Masonry. When or where, Sir, have you ever heard in a lodge, that obedience to the civil authority was not a masonic duty? When or where, have you ever heard the sentiment inculcated, that repentance toward God was not a masonic duty? When or where, have you ever known of politics being discussed in a lodge, or political arrangements effected? When or where have you ever heard the doctrine that masonic obligation is paramount to the laws of the land? Certainly, not in any well regulated lodge. You never took a masonic obligation, where you were not distinctly informed, that it contained nothing affecting your religion, or allegiance to your country. Nor did you ever take any without formally consenting so to do. You were solemnly charged to be a quiet and peaceable citizen, to live peaceably with all men, and to cultivate and practice the virtues of piety, temperance, charity, justice and truth. And most earnestly do I hope that these solemn and oft repeated injunctions have not been as inoperative on many, as on yourself. "Cast not your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under foot, and turn again and rend you."

Yours, &c.

ANTIMASONIC WAYS AND MEANS.

It is a well known fact, that the Antimasonic Regency in this place, and we presume it is so in other places, consider themselves eminently skilful in deceiving the people, whereby the worst passions of the human heart are kept continually raging. To accomplish this primary object of the party, means are resorted to, disgraceful to human nature, and which none but the most abandoned demagogues would consent to use. As the party itself is without principle upon which to act, its object is disorganization and anarchy; and its practice indiscriminate proscription and individual persecution, the most cruel and unrelenting.

While the leaders of this party compose the most tyrannical—the most dictatorial of all aristocracies; while they assemble in secret midnight cabals, and by plots to excite and divide the people; while they openly make their boasts, that they can control the ignorant Farmers and Mechanics as they please, by raising the cry of murder just before election—while such is their conduct and such their opinion of the people, nothing is heard from their corrupt and prostituted presses but "Albany Regency"—Albany Dictation—secret societies—"murder and treason." Week after week this clamor is heard, blasphemously mingled with hypocritical professions of regard for the Christian religion, which they secretly despise and ridicule—of patriotism, of which they know not the meaning, and never felt the influence—of regard for our laws and political institutions, for which they care no more than did Cataline for the laws and institutions of Rome—of love for the people, whose liberties they would sell for a less sum than that for which the unfortunate Esau sold his birthright, or which tempted the traitor Arnold to barter away the infant liberties of the United States.

They possess all the ambition of those revolutionary tribunals of that bloody era—all their avarice—all their reckless desperation—and corruption of purpose, without their talents. Did they possess the talents, the very principles upon which they now act, would commit to the flames every book containing the Declaration of American Independence, and would substitute for it, that most infamous of all infamous productions, the "Antimasonic Declaration of Independence;" would erase from the pages of our country's history, every record of the Fourth of July, seventeen hundred and seventy six, and write in its place the 11th of September 1826; would substitute for our constitution the decrees of the Spanish Inquisition; and, in fact, annihilate the union. This, we say, would be the effect of the principles upon which they act, whatever may be their intentions.

We again repeat, that the people will yet be convinced, that it is not the masonic institution, the destruction of which is sought by these political leaders, but the ruin of every man, no matter what may be his moral or political worth, whether a Mason or not, who may chance to stand in the way of their political advancement. The people of this district will yet learn, that those who make the most ardent professions of attachment to their interest; those who are the most clamorous for their rights, and noisy to punish the violation of the laws, are not always the most sincere—that it is possible for a man to love his country and respect its laws and institutions, without constantly preaching it at the corners of streets, and sounding it from the house-tops.

CONVENTIONAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER III.

TO HON. THOMAS KENDALL.

ONE OF THE SUFFOLK MEMBERS OF THE ANTIMASONIC STATE CONVENTION OF MASSACHUSETTS.

SIR:

Uninfluenced by resentments arising from personal injury, or by feelings of personal enmity, and as I hope, equally uninfluenced by inclination to private slander or public abuse, I have thought it desirable that you should learn directly, without circumlocution of language and without equivocation of sentiment, the estimation in which your association with the Convention is held by some of your fellow citizens. Whatever justification you may find for your participation in that business, you may certainly derive some self gratulation in the marked distinction of this direction. At the same time, I acknowledge that some misgivings have presented themselves to my mind for this selection; not that your agency is unworthy of reprehension, but that your station may be supposed unworthy of the honor. Still, such was the composition of the Suffolk Delegates, that, however strange it may appear, no member more worthy of such distinction has presented himself as a subject of respectful address; and if the singularity of the selection should excite remark, the explanation makes the propriety of the measure, at once, apparent.

You was taken from a humble station in life, and, by the free act of your fellow citizens, placed among men, with whom neither experience nor hope could give you claim or expectation of honorable association. Having thus obtained a place and title of some distinction, you permit yourself to be made an instrument, in the hands of designing and unprincipled men, of promoting their desperate views. Did you not perceive, Sir, that the apparent respect shown you, was to obtain the temporary use of your civil title, and not from regard to your person? Could you be ignorant of the particular care to place your honorable designation in staring capitals on paper, while you was not honored by the chair of any one of your numerous Committees? It does, Sir, appear by the printed 'Proceedings of the Antimasonic State Convention,' and with some parade of capitals too, that, 'On motion of the Hon. THOS. KENDALL, of Suffolk, Voted, That Rev. MOSES THACHER, of Norfolk, Hon. THOMAS KENDALL, of Suffolk, and Gen. EPAPHRAS HOYT, Franklin, be a committee to prepare an address to the people of this State.'—A reported address, signed, 'MOSES THACHER, Per Order,' closes with a long extract from the 'Declaration of Independence,' by the Le Roy Convention. Some of the features of that adopted bantling are as follows:

'It (the Masonic Institution) assumes titles and dignities incompatible with a republican form of government, and enjoins an obedience to them derogatory to republican principles.'

'It destroys all principles of equality; by bestowing favors on its own members, to the exclusion of others equally meritorious and deserving.'

'It creates odious aristocracies by its obligations to support the interests of its members, in preference to others of equal qualifications.'

Without invention to form a series of charges sufficiently opprobrious, your Committee appropriate the basest calumnies of a foreign, proscriptive manifesto, and apply them in a manner that show the Committee as uninfluenced by the ordinary kindness of human life as they are unworthy of the respect and confidence of those they have abused. Whether it savors of arrogance, to adopt this bitter anathema; or want of kind affections, to put forth such wholesale denunciations; or absence of Christian liberality to stigmatize an Institution embracing on its catalogue of dead and living, men of the most devoted patriotism, exemplary pity and distinguished talents—men who have been honored for their public services and private virtues—is no longer a question. And whether such men are to be stricken from the grateful recollections and warm affections of the people, at the dictation of MOSES THACHER, THOMAS KENDALL and EPAPHRAS HOYT, remains to be seen. You, most assuredly, have entitled yourself to the merit of one quality for which no Mason will envy you: the merit of a degree of modest assurance, which might well become men of as humble expectations as yours, and of higher objects of ambition. Sir, that Committee, raised on your motion, has put forth a political manifesto that arraigns every member, even the humblest member, of the Masonic Institution, before the public tribunal of the whole American people. You stand forth as the public accuser, and make specifications of offences to which they are required, before that whole people, to plead guilty or not guilty. It has been more than intimated, that because the official organs of that Institution have not thought proper to answer those gross charges, therefore their silence is to be taken for conviction. Sir, is there no motive but guilt or timidity which you can charitably entertain? When you have shrunk from the disgusting and loathsome vices and characters of some of your Conventional associates, has it never occurred to you that contempt might be a prevailing feeling with those you had arraigned; and that their condescension would not submit to the self-degradation of answering those charges? Do you not know, Sir, that he who takes up the gage of the challenger admits his equality of respectability? I will not suppose that the silence of the official organs of the Institution can be any longer mistaken. But, Sir, one of the humblest members of that Institution now says to you, in your honorable capacity of public accuser, that he is not guilty; and if the manner of his plea shall evince more of indignation than you have been accustomed to witness, he declares, in the presence of that Great Being to whom you and he are equally accountable, that it is an honest expression, though perhaps more than the subject of his remarks, or the contents of 'the address,' deserves. If the spirit of his defence be to put his accuser on trial, remember, I say, Sir remember, the tribunal is of your own selection; the trial, your own voluntary seeking; and the verdict of that august tribunal will fix upon one of us forever, ay, Sir, forever, the mark of silent contempt—perhaps public scorn.

Of your conditors I shall say nothing. One is too degraded an object for animadversion; the other, too little known, at least to your correspondent. The defection of Moses Thacher is reason sufficient for his bitterness; and his political projects have fully developed his moral sensibilities. The motives of the other I know not. When it is considered that you had been associated with gentlemen, at the Senate board of the Commonwealth, it is somewhat inexplicable that you should so soon consent to mingle with what so closely approximates to the very lowest orders of society. Either you must have been surprised at your own good fortune, in your former association, or your natural inclination must have been gratified in your late descent. Although it may savor of a spirit and disposition to 'create odious aristocracies,' to boast of Patrician blood, it is no mark of honorable and elevated feeling to boast of Plebeian condescension. The proud spirit of our free institutions cannot well be grafted on that mean servility which submits to intimate association with men of degraded habits, debased principles, and dishonorable ambition.

Was you aware, Sir, that in sending forth that 'Report,' you criminated some of the ornaments of your own church—venerated fathers of your own communion? Did you perceive that its tendency was, to cast a shade on the characters of Christian Teachers of different denominations, who have the entire confidence of their people? That it exposed to obloquy and reproach men whose eminent usefulness it might well be your pride to emulate? Did you not perceive, Sir, that you was putting forth the hand of violence, to rend asunder some of the tenderest bonds that have united men in their social relations? However much you might be disposed to disregard the feelings and expectations of those who fell under your displeasure, it could not have been supposed that you would incautiously involve yourself in the hazardous schemes of a few political aspirants, who, without personal worth to command the respect and confidence of their fellow citizens, hoped to build their projects of aggrandizement on the treacherous foundation of a public excitement. It is said your standard of moral excellence is somewhat severe. In what then can you find any common bond to unite you with such men as hitherto have been distinguished agents in promoting that excitement? Look, Sir, at your Conventional constituents. Are they the men whose time and energies have been engrossed in improving the moral condition of the world? Are they the men, whom of all others, you would select as your companions in the work of breaking down an Institution of 'immoral tendencies?' What, Sir, have been the moral tendencies of their lives? Are gross libertinism, mean equivocation, open falsehood, domestic tyranny, marital infidelity, brutal passions, dishonest negotiations and illegal resorts—are these the recommendations to your confidence? Whatever ambition of honest fame may exist in your bosom, the gulf of moral impurities about you, in your new association, will swallow you up ere you are aware of its horrible influence. Be advised of your predicament. The voice that warns you can never in private friendship, receive your respectful attention; but now demands of you to weigh well the probable influence of your rash act on the public, as well as its less apparent but not less important influence on those you respect in private life.

You say in your report, that 'the Masonic Institution assumes titles and dignities incompatible with a republican form of government.' It is somewhat remarkable that your Committee, of all others, should denounce the use of titles. Sir, the chairman of your committee has, in the very 'Report' of your proceedings, a prefix to his name, which we never have learned is of baptismal origin, nor used in the holy Oracles of Inspiration, even in connexion with the reverend name of the Saviour, nor of his holy apostles. Whence, then does he derive the title of Reverend? Is it for his private virtue? Or is it a mere designating appellation of his clerical office, without reference to private virtues? Think you he will refuse his new title of Honorable? And yet, the fictitious titles of Reverend and Honorable may add nothing to the power of estimating private integrity or the degree of confidence the public have in those who assume them. And now, sir, as to your own title of Honorable, which appears with some degree of ostentatious parade in your 'Report of Proceedings' and 'Abstract of Debates.' In what part of the Constitution or laws of this commonwealth is that title recognized?—Or by what compact is it tendered to you? Do you know, Sir, it is of aristocratic origin, and somewhat inconsistent with our free institutions? Were I, Sir, to designate an association that 'assumes titles and dignities incompatible with a republican form of government,' I should name the Antimasonic Convention of which you was a member. Of civil titles, you enumerate in your 'Abstract of Proceedings,' seven Honorables and twenty-six Esquires. Of ecclesiastical titles, eight Reverends and six Deacons. Of military, three Generals, twelve Colonels, two Majors and eight Captains! I repeat, it is somewhat remarkable that your Committee should denounce the use of titles. Your Chairman is named in your 'Report of Proceedings' and 'Abstract of Debates' twelve times; and five times he has the distinguishing prefix of REVEREND. Mark you, that I am not objecting to the use of titles, but to the use of them by an objector. The Reverend and Honorable Moses Thacher, I dare say, has no objection to the use of titles that ornament his own name. Gen HOYT is named six times, and each time he has the formidable prefix of GENERAL. You, Sir, are named four times, and each time with the distinguishing appellation, HONORABLE.—Do you not perceive that your Committee have a gravity of titles, civil, military and ecclesiastical, that seldom fall to the lot of ordinary men? It comes with an ill grace from you to object to the use of titles by one portion of your fellow citizens, in mere social intercourse, while you and your associates gather your distinctive titles and dignities in such abundance. Sir, put this matter to your conscience; lay your hand on your heart, and honestly ask yourself, whether those who receive the distinctive titles of the Masonic Institution, are more exposed to arrogant pretensions unfavourable to the Republican Institutions of our country, than those, who, on all occasions, are characterized by the appellation of GENERAL, REVEREND or HONORABLE? I am, Sir, your fellow citizen,

ARCHITECTUS.

LORING SIMONDS.

Hitherto the citizens of Albany have only been acquainted with the black character of Antimasonry, by contemplating it at a distance, free from its polluting touch, undisturbed by its ravings, and unmoved by its ill-boding aspect. They have watched the murky cloud that has for four years hung in the occident, pregnant with moral pestilence, and overshadowing the fairest portions of the State, while their own sky has been clear and unclouded. They have heard of the devastations which prejudice, falsehood, and fanaticism, were producing in the west—of discord in the church, and hatred and enmity in the family circle, while they have knelt in peace and charity at their wonted altars, and concord and happiness reigned at their domestic hearths. Antimasonry, in fact, such as it is where political power has been given to it, and where it can exercise its natural disposition for tyranny and intolerance, has been unknown here; but the storm has at length reached us and in a shape calculated to render indignant every honest man in this community. Antimasonry has again entered the sanctuary of private life, and caused to bleed afresh, wounds of the heart which time had closed; it has opened the grave of the maniac, over whom the green turf had reposed undisturbed for 20 years; violated the sepulchre of the unfortunate, and insulted the memory of the dead!—To such work, however, it is peculiarly fitted; and altogether regardless are its votaries, whether they abuse and transform the dead, or libel, insult, and persecute the living, if their own base purposes may thereby be promoted—if they can thus add fierceness to the fires of fanaticism, or augment the delusion of their blind followers.

The citizens of Albany were on Saturday last insulted by the publication in the Antimasonic Evening Journal, edited by a celebrated personage of whisker notoriety, of an affidavit, signed by one Lemuel De Forrest, in relation to the death of Mr. Loring Simonds, who died suddenly in this city in the year 1809, and in which his death is distinctly charged upon the fraternity of Freemasons. The circumstances attending the death of Simonds, are so distinctly remembered, and so well known to all the older inhabitants of this city, that no contradiction would be interposed to the statements of De Forrest, if the circulation of his falsehoods could be confined to this community. But the affidavit was not intended for effect in Albany—it was got up abroad for the sake of being used where it could not be contradicted, and in perfect keeping with antimasonic morality, was published in the Evening Journal, for the sake of giving it a kind of negative authenticity, while at the same time the publishers believed, (as one of them has already acknowledged) if they did not know, the whole affidavit to be neither more nor less than a tissue of the most abject and vile falsehoods—many of which they could have contradicted on their own authority, and all of them upon the slightest inquiry. It is for them to settle this account with the public; and they certainly will not be surprised if the respectable relatives of the family of Mr. Simonds, with whom they are, and have been for a long period acquainted, hold them as men devoid of all sense of honor, and all regard for private feeling or public morality. They of course will not complain if the children despise them for heedlessly trampling upon the ashes of their father, and calling back to the memory of the widow the agony with which she witnessed the wreck of a husband's reason, or her misery when he was unexpectedly brought to his home cold and clammy in death. Such sacrilege as this will meet with its merited reward—the contempt and detestation of an honorable community.—Record.

STATE OF NEW-YORK, } ss
City and County of Albany.

HANNAH MUIER, of the City and County of Albany, being duly sworn, says, that she was the wife of Loring Simonds; and lived with him except during his temporary absence through derangement, after their marriage, until the day of his death: that she has read an affidavit purporting to have been made by one Lemuel De Forrest, of Livingston co. N. Y., containing various misstatements which she deems it her duty to correct, both from a respect to the memory of her deceased husband, and to disabuse the public mind in regard to an event with which she was necessarily closely connected, and which made a lasting and heavy impression upon her mind. This deponent distinctly recollects the various circumstances connected with the decease of the said Loring Simonds, and solemnly deposes that it appears from the record made in the family bible that it occurred at half past 10 o'clock on Friday evening, the 17th of November, 1809. The deceased was buried on the Monday following, and his remains were attended to the grave by a large number of the Masonic Fraternity, by the uniform Company of Albany Independent Volunteers, and by a large concourse of citizens. This deponent further saith, that the said Loring Simonds died at the Thespian Hotel, in North Pearl Street, then kept by a Mr. Ennals, who is now, as she believes a resident of the Village of Utica; and that within one hour after his death, he was removed to his own dwelling, within about fifty rods of the place of his decease, and very nearly opposite the boarding house of Mr. John Buckbee, in Van Schaick Street whence the funeral procession took place. He had been for two years previous to his death so much subject to mental derangement that he was unable to attend to any regular business. Immediately after his death, a consultation of several physicians was held over the body, among whom were Doct. Elias Willard, Dr. Low, Dr. Woodruff, and Dr. Kittridge, and as this deponent verily believes, no coroner's inquest was called on the occasion. Dr. Willard was of the opinion that his death was occasioned in consequence of taking Opium, of which he was in the habit of taking in large quantities; Dr. Low expresses his belief that he died of an epidemic which affected the brain, and of which Mr. Vanderheyden of Troy had then recently died. Simonds for some months previous to his death was seriously deranged, & was in the constant habit of representing himself as JESUS CHRIST, saying that he should die on Friday, and rise again on the third day. On the day previous to his death he appeared very fond of his two infant children, fondled them on his knees, and said that he should die on the morrow. At the suggestion of some of his personal friends, of whom few men possessed a larger number, the body was kept three days. Simonds at one period of his life had been in the service of the United States, but had left the army about seven years previous to his death; at which time, he was not a Mason. After his return to Albany his stock of money was reduced to about $140; and as this deponent believes, he never deposited any money with a friend. He borrowed money from Mr. Banyer, a warm personal friend, to assist him in completing a building which he was erecting, which money he afterwards paid. At the time of his death, his property was encumbered by a judgment in the amount of $800, given to a friend for the benefit of his infant children, and by a demand against it of $50. The person having the demand of $50, pressed for payment and the property was sold under the direction of Solomon Southwick, then Sheriff of the City and County of Albany. Col. Sebastian Vischer was the purchaser at $780, out of which Southwick paid the debt of $50, the judgment for $500, and the costs of sale, amounting to $10; for the balance $170, said Southwick never rendered any account. A part of the five hundred left for the benefit of the children, out of the sale, was lost some years afterwards, by the failure of the trustee, who was an American. Simonds was not a Mason until three years after his return to this city, and after he had erected his building; and the first intimation that this deponent ever received that there were suspicions entertained that Freemasonry or Freemasons, were in the least connected with his melancholy death, was about two years since, through the columns of a paper published by the said Solomon Southwick, former Sheriff of the City and County of Albany, and entitled the "National Observer," a charge which is to this deponent appeared so preposterous as not to require a contradiction. And this deponent further says, that the funeral expenses for said Simonds were paid by herself, and that no contribution was made for that purpose, or if any moneys were collected, he that collected them, must have kept the whole for his own use and behoof.

Sworn before me, this }

J. W. HYDE, Commissioner. &c.

An article is going the rounds of the Antimasonic papers purporting to be a communication from some one in this town, to the editor of an Anti paper in Boston, stating that a "Dr. Fo*st," or Dr. Fr*st," lately stated in this town, that the Masons had the government in their hands, and that in less than five years the man who dared to speak of Antimasonry, would have his head taken off! The writer expressed an opinion that this Dr. Fo*st was in the employ of Masons as their agent or spy. We do not intend to notice such foolish and slanderous reports—they will be admitted into papers of a given character, but when they are copied and given an extensive circulation, a passing notice of them may be a duty. We have never heard of any such person in this place, as is represented in Dr. Fo*st, above alluded to, or any person answering that description—neither have we ever heard of any such remarks imputed to the (ideal) Dr. Fo*st, or that there was any person here acting as agent or spy for Masons; and we cannot learn that any one has ever heard of any such person here; and we fully believe, if any such communication was made from this place, to the aforesaid paper, it was a base and malicious falsehood.—The writer made his Dr. Fo*st say "Antimasonry and the cold water society would produce a civil war in this country." This indicates that the whole is a fiction; for most of the Masons in this town are decided and efficient supporters of the cold water society, and have done as much to promote its object as any in the community. No Mason, or Masonic agent should here speak against it.—Belchertown Sentinel.

MASONIC PERSECUTION.—Sweet and Carp, the antimasonic showmen, who have been for some time engaged in holding antimasonic lodges in different parts of the country, and making antimasons at a shilling a head, have been arrested in the town of Champion, under the statute prohibiting idle shows, juggling, &c. This is, of course like every other attempt to enforce the laws against antimasons, converted into an act of rank persecution and as such is loudly complained of in the last "Sun."—If by virtue of antimasonry, they are above the operation of the laws, then, indeed, the persecution in the present instance is improper—but if, like other citizens, they are subject to the law and liable to its penalties, we can see no reason why they should not be enforced against them as well as against others, who may not have arrived at the enviable distinction of being antimasons. We regret, however, that they have been molested, for the worst enemies of antimasonry could not have wished them to pursue a course which would render their cause more odious, than this attempt to speculate upon the credulity of the public. The strongest feelings of disgust have been every where expressed, and many who have been the most zealous antimasons, have expressed their determination to have nothing more to do with it.—Water. Freeman:

AN ADDRESS

To the people of plymouth County, on political Antimasonry, adopted at a meeting held July 5, 1830, by the citizens of Bridgewater.

[The meeting, at which the following Address was adopted, was held agreeably to a general invitation requesting the citizens of Bridgewater to assemble, for the purpose of expressing their opinion on the subject of Political Antimasonry. SIMEON PRATT was called to the Chair, and LEWIS WASHBURN appointed Secretary.

ADDRESS.

Availing ourselves of a right, which we enjoy in common with all the citizens of this free land, we solicit your attention to the following remarks. The subject on which we address you, has recently excited much interest, in this and some other parts of our country. A new political party has recently arisen among us, and it is our purpose to examine the claims which it may have to our support. Feeling assured that no individual, that no class of individuals, has any peculiar right to control or guide public opinion, but that it is the duty, as well as the right of all citizens, to form with deliberation, and express with firmness, sentiments relative to public men and public measures; we make no apology for the following declaration of our principles. We shall speak with that candor which becoms men who dissent from the opinions of their brethren, but with that plainness which becomes freemen, and that earnestness which the interests of our country should ever call forth.

In free governments political parties are ever found to exist, for wherever men enjoy the right of forming and expressing their opinions with freedom, unanimity with respect to political measures cannot be expected. Though advantages often result from the collision of parties, the worst consequences are to be feared, when the spirit of faction becomes stronger than the love of country, and the interests of a party triumph over the public welfare. Whenever men are marshalled at the polls to put down one or raise up another, without reference to his qualifications for office, and without regard to the political course he is expected to follow; the interests of the public must suffer. Agents of the Commonwealth must be selected with reference to the business before them; or the trust will be abused. What, for instance, would be the result, were men selected for political office merely on account of their religious opinions? Far distant be the day, when the people of this land shall behold the monster of a theological political party.

We know not of any qualifications for civil trust and power but the following; capability, honesty, and the correct views of policy. It will be admitted that all other qualifications, compared with these, are of minor importance. We do not admit the propriety of elevating to office any man, in whom these recommendations are not found united, whatever may be his merit in other respects; neither do we admit the justice of excluding from places of trust and honor, because of some peculiarity in opinion or practice, any one in whom these qualifications are known to exist. We therefore view with disapprobation the attempts, which have lately been made in this section of our State, to proscribe, as unworthy of all public trust, persons who are connected with the masonic fraternity; for we are not aware that this class of men is destitute more than others, of the recommendation just mentioned.

Most of us have never had any connexion with the masonic society, and feel no interest in its concerns. We do not know that it has ever done us or our country, enough either of good or of evil, to create in our hearts any strong feeling of either approbation or censure. But, whatever may be the real character of the institution, we feel ourselves bound, both as American citizens and friends of justice, to form our opinions of those connected with it, as we do of other men, according to what we have known them to be, by mingling with them in all the varied relations of life.—We are not willing, merely for the sake of proving these men guilty, to throw by as worthless, the old fashioned maxim that 'the tree is known by its fruit.' Base and desperate individuals no doubt may be found among them; but where is the extensive association which has not its unworthy members? We do not acknowledge the propriety of punishing one man for another's transgressions; for it is contrary both to divine and human law. 'Every man shall bear his own sin.' It is the merciful spirit of our tribunals, 'that ten guilty men had better escape, than one innocent man suffer.' But is this the spirit of Antimasonry, which attempts to visit the crimes of a few deluded and abandoned men, upon tens of thousands of unoffending citizens, who condemn those very crimes?

It is not necessary now to repeat the story of the well known outrage and probable murder, which have given rise to this political commotion. How extensive soever may have been the conspiracy which deprived a person of liberty and life in the western part of New-York, it is needless to say, that none are responsible for those deeds, except those who were concerned in them. But, in order to justify the warfare which has been waged against every Freemason, we are told that every member of the fraternity is bound to act, in similar cases, as the murderers of Morgan acted. To show how futile this position is, it is only necessary to remark, that every thing which is known of those nefarious deeds, proves conclusively, that no one at first thought of putting Morgan to death.—It is equally manifest that few, very few, were implicated in that infamous transaction. For notwithstanding the extraordinary exertions made to ascertain the murderers, in which many seceding masons have zealously assisted, some in the very neighborhood where he was killed, and who, part of the time, had him in custody—it is not yet known who were the perpetrators of the deed.—The inference is irresistible, that the act was not committed by a rule of the institution, and with their general knowledge and consent, as we have been falsely told.

Many reasons on this subject, as though the murderers of this man must necessarily have acted in compliance with some obligation. It is a new doctrine to us, that no murder is ever committed, except in conformity with the rules of some association. Do not all the circumstances of this case rather prove, that he was murdered by some of those who had him in custody, that they might escape the punishment which awaited them, for having illegally dragged him away from his home and friends? Murder was the last resort for the concealment of former villainy. No one pretends that his abduction was in conformity to masonic law.

The circumstance, that masons in New York have thrown so many impediments in the way, to obstruct the course of justice relative to these offences, deserves the severest reprobation. But, whenever the spirit of party is allowed to interfere with the administration of justice, such unhappy results will always ensue. Many of us recollect an instance in this Commonwealth, during a time of high party excitement, when one half of the community were almost ready to hang a certain individual* accused of murder, without scarcely waiting for the forms of law; while the other half were equally zealous in persisting that he had committed no crime.

Fellow citizens, do not the principles of this new party strike at the very root of domestic peace and social quiet? Do they not inculcate universal suspicion, jealousy, and distrust? What better faults can they yield when a participation in the blackest crimes, or at least an obligation to commit them, is directly charged upon a large portion of the community containing, according to its numbers, as many men of the strictest purity both of principle and practice, as can be found in our country? Is it not setting at naught all the principles of correct reasoning, and substituting illusion instead, to lay down as the ground work of their whole system, that some of the purest patriots and ablest statesmen our country has known, lay themselves under obligations contradictory to the laws of God and the land; that many of our most spiritually minded and enlightened clergymen are united in a league, which has no respect for the duties and sanctions of religion; and that they add to their other crimes the meanness of falsehood, whenever they condescend to deny such unchristian and infamous charges? By the same course of reasoning you have a right to suspect, that the dearest friend you have on earth, is a traitor to your happiness.

One of the arts of antimasonry is, to regard all who oppose it, as the friends of masonry. But they are not. Those of us who are not masons, have no wish for the continuance of the order.—Nay, many of us, judging from the disclosures recently made, see much that we dislike, especially in the higher degrees. How far those disclosures are true, we pretend not to know.

We profess no love for masonry; but we do avow a decided hostility to political antimasonry, to antimasonry marshalled at the polls, to that indiscriminate proscription which denounces every man, who belongs to whatever people choose to call a secret society, as unfit for any public trust, no matter what may be his character, talents, or services. This is what we call Political Antimasonry; this is the basis of the new party, to a notice of whose principles we solicit your attention.

We are ready to acknowledge, that those of us who are not masons dissent, in several points, from the opinions of those who are. We likewise dissent from the opinions of many other men; and on various subjects we disagree with each other; but so long as this difference extends not to political principles, and fitness for political preferment, we will countenance no measures to exclude any men, for such reasons, from places of power and trust.—We know not how we could lay any claim to the name of republican, should we deny to any portion of our fellow citizens the right which we claim for ourselves, the right of forming their own opinions, and of managing their own affairs in their own way; so long as they interfere not with our privileges and the welfare of the State. Such a system of exclusion we regard as anti-republican.

unjust, and oppressive. Let such feelings be permitted to interfere in our elections, and it is undeniable, that the community will be sundered into factions, the peace of neighborhoods disturbed, confidence between man and man destroyed; and even individuals of the same family armed against each other with malignant bitterness. It is believed that many have acted with this party, who have not looked forward to the consequence. For why might not the same measure be adopted to put down a religious sect, or even Christianity itself? Error in religious sentiment, is, in the opinion of most men, a serious evil. Why may not then the opponents of the Methodists, for instance, of the Calvinists, or any other sect, raise against them the hue and cry, and rally their forces at the polls? Should the present scheme succeed, why may we not next hear of anti-Trinitarian or anti-Unitarian politics? In the laudable zeal which has been shown in the cause of temperance, why has it never occurred to the friends of that cause, that every man who will not sign a pledge of total abstinence, shall be pointed out as unfit for every office? Is it because masonry is a greater curse than drunkenness? We will insult no man's understanding by following up the parallel.

It is evident that some other object is in view, rather than the suppression of Freemasonry: for every man of common discernment knows, that the dissemination of truth, not a resort to the tal-lot box, is the proper means for expelling error. Arbitrary measures strengthen the cause against which they are directed. To compel men, is not the way to enlighten them. Even the Inquisition has nearly ceased to burn the heretic's body for the good of his soul. Is it not a singular page in the history of man, that, at the time when the bishops and lords of monarchical England are throwing off the shackles of a former age, and giving Catholics a place in their councils; that, at this very time, the people of the freest government on earth, are attempting to deprive a large portion of their fellow men of the common rights of citizens?

Another odious feature in this proscriptive system, is, that the same measure of punishment is dealt out to the most guilty, and to those who, according to its own admissions, are comparatively innocent. It is well known that there are few, perhaps not one in this State, who have been initiated into the higher and more objectionable grades of what is termed Freemasonry. Nevertheless the most exceptionable parts of these higher degrees are brought to bear against every man who ever set foot within the pale of the lodge, although by far the greater number of masons are no more responsible for them, than the infant is for the deeds of the man.

We have just remarked that similar means might be used to destroy the influence of any class or interest. Indeed the work is already going on. Not only masons, and those who refuse to join in the war against them, are marked out for disfranchised citizens, but the members of all secret societies. It has been declared by the pioneer and leader of antimasonry, that their object is, to amend the constitution so as to exclude not only masons, but the members of any secret society, from places of honor and emolument, and likewise from the jury box. How many societies of this kind there may be in our land, or what in fact constitutes one, antimasonic authorities have not yet informed us. Whether our literary and social clubs, our banking and trading companies, and those smaller societies which surround the domestic board, come under this description—for they all usually have their secrets—we are left to conjecture. One of these political reformers,* who rank high in the cause, has however, pointed out the Phi Beta Kappa association. He tells us, there is good reason to believe, if not positive proof, that it was formed for the promotion of Atheism!! If these men regard secrecy and confidence to be such serious evils, and talebearing one of the first of virtues, we envy them, neither their morals nor their sensibilities; but would refer them to the following and similar remarks of a man once called wise, 'discover not a secret to another, lest he to whom thou tell it, put thee to shame, and thine infamy turn not away.'

We know the Phi Beta Kappa, only as an association of literary men. We are told on good authority, that all their secrets and obligations might be communicated in one minute: but no matter for this; nine tenths of the most distinguished men, who have received the honors of our oldest colleges, must renounce and denounce the right of keeping a secret, of managing their own business as they think best, or fall under the indignation of our modern reformers. Whether we really need any secret society, is not the question before us; but whether men are to be allowed any discretion in judging and acting for themselves. All secret associations inconsistent with republics! Why, fellow citizens, the very government under which we live has its secret sessions, and our rulers are authorized to keep secret any thing which in their judgment requires it.

This party, not satisfied with denouncing every mason without regard to his private worth or public services, not content with prying into the sacred retreats of retirement and seclusion, profess a rule of action which they cannot comply with, unless they possess more than human discernment. For, if the secrets of an association be their crime, the greater the secrecy the greater the offence. They are therefore bound to visit with their severest vengeance the members of such associations as are secret in the true sense of the word, that is to say, such as conceal their very existence, and which these men can never know to exist, with all the spies and informers they may enlist in their ranks.

Could it be thought, that, after all this alarm on the subject of secret societies, antimasons themselves are guilty of secrecy? But it is even so.—We have been informed on antimasonic authority that they have their spies in the lodges of masons.† The special agent for the management of the Morgan trials, has lately complained, that the Governor of N. Y. has betrayed his secrets.

Three violent antimasonic papers in Pennsylvania have recently stopped for want of support. The papers of that State mention many secessions from that party weekly; and a late Greensburgh Republican contains the letters of six gentlemen, who had been appointed an antimasonic committee of vigilance:—they all explicitly renounce that party, and declare the appellation to be 'but a new name for an old and inveterate enemy of the democratic party.'

MISCELLANY.

AMUSING CURE FOR DRUNKENNESS.

The late Earl of Pembroke, who had many good qualities, but always persisted inflexibly in his own opinion, which as well as his conduct, was often very singular, thought of an expedient to prevent the exhortations and importunities of those about him. This was to feign himself deaf; and under pretence of hearing very imperfectly, he would always form his answer by what he desired to have said. Among other servants was one who had lived with him from a child, and served him with great fidelity and affection, till at length he became his coachman. This man by degrees got a habit of drinking, for which his lady often desired that he might be dismissed. My lord always answered, 'Yes, indeed, John is an excellent servant.' 'I say' replied the lady, 'he is continually drunk, and I desire that he might be turned off.' 'Aye,' said his lordship, 'he has lived with me from a child, and as you say, a trifle should not part us.' John, however, one evening, as he was driving from Kingston, overturned his lady in Hyde Park; she was not much hurt, but when she came home she began to rattle at the Earl. 'Here,' says she, 'is that beast of a John so drunk that he can hardly stand: he has overturned the coach and, if he is not discharged, may break our necks.' 'Aye,' says my lord: 'is poor John sick? Alas, I am sorrow for him,' 'I am complaining,' said my lady, 'that he is drunk, and overturned me.' 'Aye,' answered his lordship, 'to be sure he has behaved very well, and shall receive proper advice.' My lady finding it hopeless to remonstrate, went away in a pet; and my lord, having ordered John into his presence, addressed him very coolly in these words: 'John, you know I have a regard for you, and as long as you behave well you shall be taken care of in my family; my lady tells me you are taken ill, and indeed I see that you can hardly stand; go to bed, and I will take care that you have proper advice.'

John, being thus dismissed, was taken to bed, where by his lordship's order, a large blister was put upon his head, another between his shoulders, and sixteen ounces of blood taken from his arm. John found himself next morning in a woful plight, and was soon acquainted with the whole process, and the reason upon which it was commenced. He had no remedy, however, but to submit; for he would rather have incurred as many more blisters, than to loose his place. My lord sent very formally twice a day to know how he was, and frequently congratulated my lady upon John's recovery whom he directed to be fed only with water gruel, and to have no company but an old nurse. In about a week, John having constantly sent word that he was well, my lord thought fit to understand the messenger, and said, he was extremely glad the fever had left him, and desired to see him. When John came in, 'Well, John,' says he, 'I hope this is about over.' 'Ah, my lord,' says John, 'I humbly ask your lordship's pardon.' I promise never to commit the same fault again. 'Aye,' says my lord, 'you are right, nobody can prevent sickness, and if you should be sick again, John, I shall see to it, though perhaps you should not complain; and I promise you shall always have the same attendance that you have had now.'—'God bless your lordship,' says John, 'I hope there will be no need.' So do I too,' says his lordship, 'but as long as you do your duty towards me, never fear, I shall do mine towards you.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, AUGUST 21, 1830.

SAMUEL G. ANDERTON.

Some of our readers may think that we have already said enough relative to this miserable wretch:—enough, at least, to counteract whatever influence his infamous lie—his false oath—may have been calculated to exercise over the minds of the simple and credulous. This may be true. We care not a fig for Anderton. He is a miserable drunken scoundrel, incapable of harm, when left to act for himself. It is with the men who have dragged him from his infamous obscurity; from the haunts of the vile and abandoned; who have induced him to forswear himself; and who have voluntarily pledged their own characters for the truth of his false statement; who have, under the sanction of their own names, and after much "research and careful inquiry," declared to the public that the character of Anderton, "for truth and veracity, is such as to render his testimony worthy, fully to be believed." It is the meanness, the baseness and criminality of these men, that we would hold up to public contempt and execration. They alone are answerable to the public for the villany of Anderton. They have taken him under their protection; have constituted themselves his guardians. He is their tool, and they will be held responsible, by the community, for his acts. Whatever he does is done under their direction. He is as much the slave of the antimasonic cabal in this city, as the negro of the South is the slave of his master or owner. In reference to the recent movements at Marblehead, the Albany Record remarks:—"Our readers have not forgotten the infamous humbug, which originated with the Boston Antimasonic Committee, just previous to the Massachusetts Election last spring, and has since been kept alive by the panders of the faction, far and near, under the title of the 'Belfast Murder.' It has heretofore been met, and nailed like base coin to the counter; but the evil spirits who are endeavoring to urge on the excitement, cling to it as their last hold upon the gullibility of poor human nature, and notwithstanding the ridicule which has been heaped upon its contrivers, as well as the indignation expressed by every honest man, at this palpable subornation of perjury, and base attempt to practice deception and fraud upon the public—they are still endeavoring to sustain themselves and the story of Anderton. We see by the last Boston Mirror, that the vessel in which Anderton has been absent for the last four months, on a fishing voyage, had hardly found her moorings at Marblehead, before she was visited by two antimasonic committee men of Boston. These gentlemen with a promptness which would have done much credit to a custom house officer, were even before the owner of the vessel in visiting her; and their poor tool Anderton, had neither been on shore, or been informed of the general distrust in which his perjury was held by the public, before he was beleaguered by these men, whose only object must have been to induce the poor wretch, whose name has been so irretrievably given to infamy and disgrace, still further to increase the load of obloquy which now rests upon him. Haply they were for once disappointed; and instead of having the poor dupe, like an automaton at their control, they were compelled to put their questions in the presence of a third person, who has promptly given to the public the circumstances of the interview."

To the Record we are greatly indebted for the following extract from a BELFAST PAPER. It is proof positive of the villany of Anderton; and it must stamp with infamy and disgrace, the miscreants who have led the miserable wretch on to the commission of the high crime of moral perjury. The Record observes:—"It needed no further testimony to satisfy any man of the plainest reasoning, that this affair was from the very outset a shameless outrage against the moral sense of the community—an open attempt to prejudice and poison, by perjury and deceit, the minds of the weak and credulous, against a particular portion of our citizens. The contradictions and absurdities which have marked the different statements of Anderton, at once set the seal of falsehood upon the whole affair, and the little effect it might have had, even had it been consistent with itself, was soon lost altogether. An additional and conclusive evidence, however, that the whole affair is a sheer fabrication in all its parts, is to be given to our readers. We have now before us, the BELFAST NEWS LETTER, of May 25, 1830. This paper an esteemed friend has been at the pains to forward us. It contains the affidavit of Anderton, as originally published in the antimasonic papers in this country, and at once pronounces it an absurd and incredible hoax. The following are the remarks of the editor preceding the statement of Anderton as copied from the Philadelphia Sun, an antimasonic luminary.

"We alluded in a paragraph in the last number of the News Letter, to a narrative, which appears in the Sun, a Philadelphia paper, respecting the alleged murder of a William Miller of this town, in 1813, for having disclosed the secrets of Freemasonry. The truth of this narrative has been sworn to by the relator, Anderton, before the proper authorities in America, and is preceded in the Sun by a variety of testimonies as to the unimpeachable nature of his character; but notwithstanding all these corroborating circumstances, WE HAVE GOOD REASON TO BELIEVE THAT IT IS AN ABSOLUTE FABRICATION. WE HAVE REFERRED TO THE FILES OF THE NEWS LETTER, AND WE HAVE HAD THE CORONER'S BOOKS INSPECTED; BUT IN NEITHER THE ONE NOR THE OTHER CAN WE DISCOVER THE MOST DISTANT NOTICE OF THE DEATH OF ANY SUCH PERSON AS WILLIAM MILLER, though the narrator says his body was thrown into the Lime-Kiln-Dock, where it was afterwards found; and that subsequently an inquest was held on it! We, however, insert the story, which, we have no doubt, will be promptly investigated and exposed by the respectable body whose character it impugns."

For the amusement of our readers, and the better to illustrate the principles of the men, who have been engaged in this transaction, and the measures resorted to, we subjoin the report of a "special committee appointed at a numerous convention of the County and Ward committees, from all parts of the city of Boston, and other citizens assembled at Merchant's Hall, (antimasonic printing office,) on the 18th March" last. The committee.

REPORT.

That they have, within a few days past, seen and conversed with several persons of respectability, in the City of Boston, from Belfast, Ireland, who voluntarily state, in writing, to your committee, that they well recollect the fact of Mr. WILLIAM MILLER's murder—that he was a miller by trade—that his body was taken out of Lime-kiln Dock—that it lay on the wharf in the afternoon of the 5th of June, 1813. They state names, reasons, circumstances, &c. They express a readiness to testify that they saw the body themselves, and that hundreds of others saw it—that Mr. Miller was a respectable citizen, and that his death produced a considerable excitement. They well recollect that it was reported in Belfast at the time, that Mrs. Miller said her husband prepared to go to the Lodge the evening before, and as she supposed, went—and also that Christopher Greenlow, or as two of the witnesses call him, Christopher Greenwood, who kept the public house on the wharf at Lime-kiln Dock, said that "Miller came to his house the evening before, and went out again." This man they say was a mason—that the Lodge room was in the third story, and they all agree as to the description of the place. One man says he recollects seeing in a Belfast newspaper the account published, headed "ANOTHER MURDER," in large letters. They further say that several persons were taken up and imprisoned on suspicion, but were afterwards released for want of proof.

Your committee have full confidence in the statements of these persons. They have a good character for truth and veracity, so far as they have been able to ascertain: and your committee consider the testimony given by Mr. SAMUEL G. ANDERTON, corroborated and confirmed in such a manner as to leave no doubt as to its truth.

Your committee further REPORT, that as this subject is understood to be in a train to undergo judicial investigation, they deem it inexpedient, at this time, to give the names of the persons who have furnished the above information, to the public. All which is respectfully submitted.

JACOB HALL,
BENJ. W. LAMB, } Special Committee.
ISAAC PORTER,

Will the committee inform us who those "persons of respectability" are, "who voluntarily state in writing, that they well recollect the fact of Mr. William Miller's murder?" Who is the man that "recollects seeing in a Belfast newspaper, the account published!" Though every material point in the above "report" is false, we are not willing to believe that the committee, at the time of making their report, were certain of their being so. To remove all doubt, however, they should give their authority. If this be not done, the public will hold them personally responsible for the erroneous statement to which their names are affixed. Will they also inform us of the result of the "judicial investigation," referred to in the report?

WASHINGTON AND MASONRY.

In addition to the Masonic Correspondence of General Washington, heretofore published in the Mirror, a Pennsylvania paper furnishes the subjoined copy of an address presented by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania to Gen. Washington, and his reply, on the 27th December, 1776—four months and ten days after the publication of his "Farewell Address," wherein he is falsely and basely represented as cautioning his fellow-citizens to "beware of secret societies." It is evident says the Lancaster Journal, that the Grand Lodge did not consider themselves or their principles denounced, or even censured by any thing in the farewell address, as it is spoken of by them in terms of high admiration. The receipt of such an address would be sufficiently indicative of the sentiments of the General on this point, but the reply places the matter beyond all doubt.

DECEMBER 28, 1786.

Yesterday at 12 o'clock, a deputation from the Grand Lodge of the ancient and honorable fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons in Pennsylvania, waited on the President of the United States, when the following address was delivered to him by the Grand Master:—

TO GEORGE WASHINGTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE ADDRESS OF THE GRAND LODGE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Most Respected Sir and Brother:—

Having announced your intention to retire from public labor, to that refreshment to which your pre-eminent services for near half a century have so justly entitled you, permit the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, at this last feast of our evangelical Master, St. John, on which we can hope for an immediate communication with you, to join the grateful voice of our country, in acknowledging that you have carried forth the principles of the Lodge into every walk of your life, by your constant labors for the prosperity of that country; by your unremitting endeavors to promote order, union, and brotherly affection amongst us; and lastly, by the views of your Farewell Address to your brethren and fellow citizens; an address, which, we trust, our children and our children's children will ever look upon as a most invaluable legacy from a friend, a benefactor, and a father.

To these our grateful acknowledgments (leaving to the impartial pen of history to record the important events in which you have borne so illustrious a part) permit us to add our most fervent prayers, that after enjoying, to the utmost span of human life, every felicity which the terrestrial Lodge can afford, you may be received by the Great Master Builder of this world, and of worlds unnumbered, into the ample felicity of that celestial Lodge, in which alone distinguished virtues and distinguished labors can be eternally rewarded.

By the unanimous order of the

Dec. 27, 1796. WM. MOORE SMITH, G. M.

To which the President was pleased to reply.

Fellow Citizens and Brothers of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania:—

I have received your address with all the feelings of brotherly affection, mingled with those sentiments for the society which it was calculated to excite.

To have been in any degree an instrument in the hands of Providence to promote order and union, and erect upon a solid foundation, the true principles of government, is only to have shared with many others in a labor, the result of which, let us hope, will prove, through all ages, a Sanctuary for Brothers and a Lodge for the Virtues.

Permit me to reciprocate your prayers for my temporal happiness, and to supplicate that we may all meet hereafter, in that eternal temple, whose builder is the Great Architect of the Universe.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

In addition to the above, the Journal adds the following account of the meeting of Gen. Washington with the Alexandria Lodge, in April, 1797, on his retirement from the Presidency; and gives the address and reply, together with toasts drunk on the occasion, and asks attention to the toast of Gen. WASHINGTON—"THE LODGE OF ALEXANDRIA AND ALL MASONS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD." Comment is unnecessary.

Alexandria, April 4, 1797.

In consequence of an invitation from Ancient York Masons, of the Alexandria Lodge, No. 22, to Gen. George Washington, he joined the Brethren on Saturday last, when the following address was delivered, to which he made the subjoined reply. After which the Lodge went in procession from their room to Mr. Albert's Tavern, where they partook of an elegant dinner, prepared for the occasion, at which the utmost harmony and unanimity prevailed.

ADDRESS.

Most respected Brother:—

The Ancient York Masons of Lodge No. 22, offer you their warmest congratulations on your retirement from your useful labors. Under the supreme architect of the Universe, you have been the master-workmen in erecting the Temple of Liberty in the West, on the broad basis of equal rights. In your wise administration of the government of the United States for the space of eight years, you have kept within the compass of our happy constitution, and acted upon the square with foreign nations, and thereby preserved your country in peace, and promoted the prosperity and happiness of your fellow citizens. And now that you have retired from the labors of public life, to the refreshment of domestic tranquility, they ardently pray that you may long enjoy all the happiness which the terrestrial Lodge can afford, and finally be removed to that Celestial Lodge where love, peace, and harmony, forever reign, and where Cherubims and Seraphims shall hail you Brother.

By the unanimous desire of Lodge No. 22.

GEN. GEORGE WASHINGTON.

REPLY.

Brothers of the Ancient York Masons, of Lodge No. 22.

While my heart acknowledges, with brotherly love, your affectionate congratulations, on my retirement from the arduous details of past years, my gratitude is no less excited by your kind wishes for my future happiness.

It has pleased the Supreme Architect of the Universe to make me an humble instrument to promote the welfare and happiness of my fellow men, my exertions have been abundantly accompanied by the kind partiality with which they have been received—And the assurance you give me, of your belief that I have acted upon the square in my public capacity, will be among my principal enjoyments in this Terrestrial Lodge.

G. WASHINGTON.

TOASTS.

1. Prosperity to the most ancient and honorable craft.
2. All those who live within compass and square.

3. The Temple of Liberty—May its pillars be the poles, its canopy the heavens, and its votaries all mankind.

4. The virtuous Nine.

5. The United States of America.

6. The Grand Master of Virginia.

7. All oppressed and distressed—wherever dispersed.

8. Masons' wives and Masons' barns, and all who wish to lie in Masons' arms.

9. May brotherly love unite all nations.

BY BROTHER WASHINGTON.

"THE LODGE OF ALEXANDRIA, AND ALL MASONS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD"

After he had retired.

Our most respected brother George Washington—was drunk with Masonic honours.

"From the foregoing it is evident that through life Gen. Washington entertained the most favourable opinion of masons and masonry, and as it is a fixed and unalterable canon of the institution, that 'no mason can be interred with the formalities of the order, unless it be by his own special request,' communicated to the Master of the Lodge of which he died a member, foreigners and sojourners excepted," it is beyond a doubt that, as General Washington was buried with masonic honours, it must have been "by his own special request;" thus manifesting to the world, that in death he entertained the same favourable sentiments of the order which he had expressed and exhibited in his conduct thro' life."

For the Mirror.

MR. EDITOR,—I am neither Mason or Antimason, or rather I was not a few weeks since, but was among that number of the community here who quietly regarded the excitements at a distance as results of political or personal feeling, and, as the attempted bustle in this place was any thing but effectual, I rejoiced with the many, that our city had shown herself unmoved by the petty restlessness of such a lame minority, and still had sustained for herself what the light of education always bestows, a cool discrimination amidst such impassioned attempts. These abortions then appeared to me as such generally are, a half formed senseless thing, brought into the world without stamen, without vitality, without any sources of existence, an attempt

"Ex fumo dare lucem."

But at this time I was induced to visit an expose of Masonry, at Boylston Hall, by one Allyn, and was there with many who anticipated some outrageous transactions or silly ceremonies, but like many I returned with feelings solemnized at the development of the conferring of the Templar's Degree. It was impossible to extort a smile from the audience, except that of contempt for the dreadful atrocity of him, who had trampled on oaths so awful, who by so doing, must, in the minds of all unprejudiced persons, have sacrificed all principles of shame or character. I am not more acute on such points than others, but I must say, that the man who could do as that man did that evening, I should shun more than the midnight assassin or robber.—He used the vile and miserable subterfuge, "that he is ready to pay the poor penalty of his body," and adds, "let them come legally and demand it." But how will he pay the penalty to his God whom he so solemnly invoked to bear witness to his vows? Could he look any man in the face who then witnessed his expressions, as an honest man should? how can he even dwell for a moment on that hour when he shall be called to the scrutiny of the all seeing, the penalty of whose judgments he, on taking his masonic oaths, so directly called upon his head.

Yes, Sir, let him make such proselytes as those who that evening upheld him in his blasphemies, as an Antimasonic Committee; but fear not, a host of such as I there saw would be no addition to any association, such means must be followed by corresponding effects. There was one who witnessed this scene with no prejudiced eye, who became a convert, not to their purposes, but to the merits of that Institution of which he trusts ere long to become a more intimate admirer.

MERCATOR.

EXPULSION.—At a special meeting of Eden Lodge, holden in Ware, Mass. July 19th, 1830—The following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted.

Having ever been taught that Masonry inculcates the strictest observance of truth, faithfulness, honor and honesty; fidelity to our country and obedience to its laws; and having painful yet convincing evidence that Benjamin Paige has been guilty of grossly violating his Masonic obligations, in these and many other respects, thereby rendering himself unworthy of our confidence and fellowship: therefore,

Resolved, That our duty as Masons requires us forthwith to expel him from this Lodge, and cut him off from all the rights and privileges appertaining thereto. Whereupon voted, that the Master of Eden Lodge give notice hereof to the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, and cause a copy of the foregoing, together with this vote, to be published in the MASONIC MIRROR, that all persons interested may take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

Per order,

SAMUEL PHELPS, Master.

Attest, J. BOSWORTH, Secretary.

VERMONT.—The editor of the Chelsea Advocate, in a political talk with his readers, has the following remarks. The antimasons, during the past year have laboured with a zeal and industry worthy of a better cause. They have literally encompassed sea and land in order to make one proselyte. We can think of nothing which compares to the excitement against masonry, except the visionary schemes preached up by Peter the Hermit, during the crusades, for the recovery of the holy sepulchre. The antimasons have fully supplied the state with county, town, and school district committees. These have received their instructions from the state committee, to give no support to a candidate unless he avows himself to be a thorough going political antimason!—This code of proscription is but a shade or two removed from that which has given such an infamous notoriety to the Inquisition of Spain and Portugal. That the excitement is on the decline, we have reason to believe. It has passed its meridian, and is fast hastening towards the "receptacle of things lost on earth." Many who joined the party in its early stages, were doubtless actuated to the step by motives purely honest; they have since discovered that the excitement has not so much at heart the destruction of the order, as the leaders have for their own personal aggrandizement. This is apparent to every reflecting man.

LYNN MINERAL SPRING.—For a "Summer retreat," we know of no place in this State, possessing equal advantages with this establishment. The house has been recently repaired and improved, and is in the best order.—"The salubrious qualities of the waters of this celebrated Spring—the beautiful Pond adjoining the House, abounding with Fish of various descriptions, and surrounded by the most romantic scenery—a fine Sail Boat, and every convenience for fishing—a Bathing establishment on the margin of the Pond, where the cold or warm bath may at any time be taken—the pleasant situation of the House, with its comfortable and well furnished apartments—are attractions for those in pursuit of health or recreation, which are rarely exceeded, if equalled in any part of the country."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—An interview with "Mercator" would be gratifying to the editor of the Mirror.—His proffered kindness is acceptable.

"A subscriber" has our thanks for his friendly hint. The subject shall receive early attention.

[P] Francis Granger has been nominated by the antimasonic party, for Governor of the State of New York. The Boston Centinel says: "In this contest the Antis and the Clay party of New York will heartily co-operate!"

A black fellow, oppressed by heat, lately sat down upon the door step of a shoe store in New York. On rising, he felt so much better, that he carried away three pair of shoes, without distressing himself.

THE WREATH.

SYMPATHY.

A Knight and a lady once met in a grove,
Whilst each was in quest of a fugitive love;
A river ran mournfully murmuring by,
And they wept in its waters for sympathy.

'O never was knight such a sorrow that bore!
'O never was maid so deserted before!
'From life and its woes let us instantly fly,
And jump in together for company!'

They searched for an eddy that suited the deed—
But here was a bramble and there was a weed;
'How tiresome it is!' said the fair with a sigh;
So they sat down to rest them in company.

They gazed on each other, the maid and the knight;
How fair was her form and how goodly his height;
'One mournful embrace!' sobbed the youth, 'ere we die!
So kissing and crying kept company!

'O had I but loved such an angel as you!
'O had but my swain been a quarter as true!
'To miss such perfection how blinded was I!
Sure now they were excellent company!

At length spoke the lass 'twixt a smile and a tear,
'The weather is cold for a watery bier;
When summer returns we may easily die—
Till then let us sorrow in company.'

MISCELLANY.

MECHANICS.—It is gratifying to witness the progress of good sense in the just estimation formed of the worth and importance of the mechanical classes in this country. While the unmeaning phrase of gentlemen, (which so many have aspired after to their ruin) has become degraded to designate every useless fellow who lives by any means save honest labour; that of mechanic has been elevated to its true rank, as being appropriated to really one of the most independent and upright classes in society. An intelligent mechanic carries his capital in his head and hands, and even misfortune cannot deprive him of it. The man of wealth is wholly dependent for his consequence upon his money, which is daily liable to be wasted by his own folly, or lost by vicissitudes. The mechanic has only to avoid that one great destroyer, the spirit of an evil that enters men's mouths to steal away their brains, and with industry and health, he never can be otherwise than independent.

In this country the mechanics as a body hold the balance of power, and they have only to act on independent grounds to insure their legitimate influence being felt in society. The progress of information among them is steady and rapid. Associations throughout the country, are shedding upon them the lights of science. To them we must look, in a great degree, for the preservations of our institutions, our religion and public morals. Let every mechanic duly consider this, and take care how he throws away or perverts his influence, as a member of the whole, or bring a reproach upon the body. Let him beware of infidelity or a single approach to the fashionable vices that degrade too many, affecting to be of the highest order, to the level of the vilest.

THE FATE OF KINGS.—In the island of Great Britain we now instance in the royal line of Stuart, a race as steadily unfortunate as ever was recorded in history. Their misfortunes continued with unabated succession, during 390 years.

Robert III. broke his heart because his eldest son Robert was starved to death, and his youngest, James, was made a captive.

James I. after beheading three of his nearest kindred, was assassinated by his own uncle, who was tortured to death for it.

James II. was slain by the bursting of a piece of ordnance.

James III. when flying from the field of battle, was thrown from his horse, and murdered in a cottage, into which he had been carried for assistance.

James IV. fell in Flodden field.

James V. died of grief for the wilful ruin of his army at Solway Moss.

Henry Stuart, Lord Danley, was assassinated, and then blown up in his palace.

Mary Stuart was beheaded in England.

James I. and VI. died not without suspicion of being poisoned by lord Buckingham.

Charles I. beheaded at Whitehall.

Charles II. was exiled for many years.

James II. lost his crown, and died in banishment.

Anne, after a reign, which though glorious, was rendered unhappy by party disputes, died of a broken heart, occasioned by the quarrels of her favorite servants.

The posterity of James II. have remained wretched wanderers in foreign lands.

BOBTAIL.—It is related of the eccentric Lorenzo Dow, that preaching in a place on a certain occasion, where he was informed the people were so regardless of good order as to be in the habit of going out before the meeting was dismissed, he commenced his sermon in the following manner:—"What a multitude of people are collected here; I suppose of all classes, rich and poor, high and low, learned and ignorant, rag, shag and bobtail. You are all strangers to me. I don't know one of you from another, but I shall call the first one that goes out before meeting is dismissed, bobtail;"—No one being willing to be called by that name, they all remained attentive hearers for two hours. Happy would it be for some other places if there were no bobtails.

"HANG HUGH PETERS."

"After the restoration of the Stuarts, Charles, and several of his ministers and courtiers, were sitting one day, at their wine, regaling themselves with the thought of the recovery of their power, and making merry over the fate of their poor regicides, and republicans. "Well we've made cracking work with them," said one; "we've hung lawyers, doctors, generals—we've hung every thing but preachers." "What," said Charles "hav'nt we hung a preacher? That wont do; they were at the bottom of it; we must hang a preacher." "Well, who shall we hang?" said a third. "Why there's Hugh Peters," said Charles, "HANG HUGH PETERS." The order was executed. When Mr. Peters came to America, he found the colonists suffering from an entire depression of trade and business, and a great scarcity of money—a state of things resulting from the circumstance that they had nothing to export, in return for supplies received from the mother country. He instantly devised the remedy. He travelled through the settlements, producing, as Winthrop calls it, "a public frame of spirit," and raised, by contribution, here and in England, a sum of money, by means of which the people were enabled to construct and fit out vessels, which by his direction were engaged, then for the first time in the fishery; to erect mills, to establish, suitable manufactories, to plant hemp, and to raise many articles before unthought of. He told them that when they had cured their fish, and sawed their timber, and perfected their fabrics, and gathered in their harvest, they must put all that remained after their wants were supplied, into their vessels, and send them to the Southern settlements, to the West Indies, and wherever else they might find a market.—Thus, by the profits of these coasting and circuitous voyages, he enabled them to restore the balance of trade with the parent; thus, he brought back again the benefits of a circulating medium, and laid the foundations of the commercial maritime and internal prosperity of New England.—He introduced the implements of several of the mechanic arts, and by extending the division of labor, multiplied the comforts and accelerated the refinement of society. This does not look like the enthusiasm of the fanatic. It exhibits the sober judgment of the wise citizen, the profound reflection of the practical statesman."—Letters by Rev. Mr. Upham, of Salem, Mass. on the character of Hugh Peter's.

Travelling in the Air!—At the last sitting the Academy of Sciences in Paris, a paper was read on 'the means of navigation in the air.'

THE ESSAYIST.—This little semi monthly has reached its 20th number. It is designed for the encouragement of young writers. The following is from the pen of the editor, Mr. G. W. Light.

On seeing a group of Swiss children, following their parents through one of our crowded streets, full of merriment.

Are ye coming down the mount
Towering high in Switzerland—
Are ye walking by the fount
Gushing from the crystal sand?

Are ye walking by the lake
Reflecting heaven 'neath the hills,
Where the sparkling rivers break,
Greeted by a thousand rills

As they wander to the sea
Through the woodland, by the plain,
Flowing onward merrily,
Till they mingle with the main?

Or are ye on a foreign shore,
Treading o'er the stranger's land;
Asking pity at his door—
Say—where are ye, little band?

With your sisters now ye walk
Through the streets in merriment,
And with bosoms free ye talk
As if homeward ye were bent?

Think ye that your parents are
All ye need upon the earth;
Can ye leave your home afar,
And maintain your bosom mirth?

Wish ye not to see the hills
Whose tops are bathing in the sky—
Watch the leaping golden rills
While the sun is burning high?

Can I look upon ye, boys,
And not drop a single tear,
When the music of your joys
Strikes upon my startled ear?

Ye are like the stars of day—
Dimmed not, though the stranger's sun
O'er the heavens wheels his way—
Smiling—each a happy one!

TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

RENOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.

No. 4.

You graciously informed your audience, that you were apprized of the conspiracy to kidnap Wm. Morgan, and transport him into Canada, or put him on board a British Man of War, sometime previous to his abduction. You even went so far as to give the name of your informant. I say you imparted this information graciously, because I suppose, it is not expected even of an antimasonic lecturer, for hire, that he should damn himself to everlasting infamy by his own confessions. This was, however, probably a popular lure, for it would seem, that, the more infamous a man renders himself, the more he is esteemed by this party. The retiring Mason, who withdraws himself privately from the society, and refuses, for reasons best known to himself, to communicate with the fraternity, receives none of their respect, but is treated with rudeness and contumely. He must renounce, he must divulge, he must endorse the ten thousand slanders in circulation, he must assume the attitude and weapons of hostility to his best friends, the rare virtues of treason, moral perjury, studied vituperation, and frontless impudence must cluster thickly over and around him, before he can expect to receive their especial patronage and hearty support. You, Sir, are not deficient in shrewdness of a certain sort, and perhaps your sagacity suggested this precious confession, as a means of reaching the pockets of your generous audience, which it seems, were pretty liberally emptied in your behalf. Your zeal in this highly patriotic and disinterestedly benevolent cause, is almost equal to your former clamorous and blustering zeal in behalf of Masonry. And had you any honorary degrees at your disposal, you might, perhaps, enlist the ladies as strongly in your favor, and acquire again for yourself the distinguishing epithet of sugar Pease. Now, Sir, in all soberness, let me inquire, why, in the name of God, who will judge us, you did not sound the alarm, and publish abroad this information, and save your country from this foul disgrace, and a fellow citizen from ruthless violence? Why retain it in your own reverend bosom, festering at your heart? Did you approve the object? Did you sanction the means used to effect it? Did you aid by your counsel and advice, as well as assist the conspirators by refusing to expose them? Your answer will be, "I was bound by my obligations to secrecy; I 'groaned' over this information, I 'wept in secret,' I 'could not sleep nights,' yet the awful penalties of my oaths wrapt my tongue in silence." How happens it that you can so comfortably tell all these things now, and with an air of triumph? What obligations! It is your bounden duty both as a Mason and as a man, to prevent the commission of crime. I defy you to put your finger upon the chapter and verse of any masonic obligation, that requires the concealment of crime, or of conspiracy to commit crime. What obligations restrained you? It was your duty as a good citizen to prevent a breach of the peace, and as a christian minister to have used your influence with your headstrong brethren, to prevent their engaging in scenes of riot and bloodshed. Ah, but I was bound to keep a brother's secrets as my own. Admit for my present purpose that you were so bound. Was this disclosure of the fact of an organized conspiracy to kidnap, and, perhaps, to murder a fellow citizen, a personal secret of a brother? Even your wonderful tact at inventing apologies and pretences will fail to satisfy the public, that any thing else than personal secrets are intended to be kept. How perfectly easy would it have been for you, consistently, with the strictest construction of your obligation to preserve a brother's secrets as your own, to have informed the unhappy Morgan, or his friends, of his intended fate, and have retained the source of your information a profound secret? Had you been disposed, how easily could you by letters, or a personal interview, have prevented the consummation of this foul conspiracy against the rights of a citizen? This, permit me to say, it was your masonic duty to have done, for you are bound to apprise a brother of approaching danger. This, every honest man would have done. He would not have contented himself with "weeping in secret," but would have proclaimed it aloud and afar. He could not have remained quiet, secretly consenting to this atrocious outrage. Is it true, Sir, that you were so informed from a credible source? Did you believe the information? I know you so affirm; but I am extremely loth to believe it. Was it not an afterthought? Intur nos,—did you not think it would be a fine embellishment of your story, and be well calculated to awaken the prejudices, and gratify the whims of your enlightened hearers? Can it be, that you were, indeed, apprized of the conspiracy? Is it possible, that the anointed apostle of peace can calmly witness the preparations for murder, and cheer on the perpetrators by his ghostly smiles and countenance? Is it possible, that the herald of salvation can witness the organization of a ruffian band, and hear them disclose their nefarious designs, and still hold his peace? Sir, I take you at your word—the mildest construction that can be put upon your confession, viz. that it proves you an accessory before the fact, and in establishing the fact that Morgan was murdered, you so far establish your own guilt as accessory. I heartily congratulate the fraternity on your secession. The only regret I feel, is, that you did not come out of it sooner, before it had fed, and clothed, and sustained you. Would to God, that every other member of the institution, if any such there be, who is an approver of murder, a concealer of conspiracies, or an abettor of crimes of any sort, would follow your example, and publicly secede, and, if he please, become an itinerant slanderer of the worthy members who remain. The party, of which, you are a leader, has need of such worthies. Your front rank is becoming thin. The Rev. Mr. Sanbourn has followed throughout strictly the example of his illustrious prototype, and hung himself. The two Greys, father and son, of 'Le Roy Convention memory, are condemned for murder. Dr. Wolf, the famous lecturer, and bosom companion of H. D. Ward, is qualifying himself for further usefulness in the Connecticut State Prison, convicted of the truly antimasonic crime, a rape on the person of a deaf and dumb girl. The illustrious St. Green is sweetening his disposition by inhaling the odours of putrescent eggs. I might add to this catalogue other distinguished names, but I forbear, from respect to my readers. Now, Sir, show me, if you can from among the whole number of Masons, during the long existence of the society, as much infamy and guilt as is embraced in the above catalogue. Taking into the account, the legitimate consequences of the excitement you and your coadjutors occasion, the malignant aspersions, the damning falsehoods, the cold and cruel scandals, and the dark designing insinuations, and you cannot deny, that antimasonry, during its short reign, has done infinitely more mischief than Masonry ever did, or ever will. Masons, it is true, with shame I acknowledge it, were guilty of the atrocious outrage on Morgan. The Rev. David Pease and S. D. Green, testify of this fact, and confess, furthermore, that they were duly apprized of the intentions of the conspirators, and very honestly and honorably kept it a perfect secret. What illustrious patriots! You even eclipse Arnold's glories. What distinguished saints! You throw the merits of Simon Magus far into the back ground, and become proud compeers of Judas, and rivals of his high honors.

In taking my leave of you, Sir, at this time, permit me to introduce you to your late audience, as an accessory, by your own confession, to the Morgan outrage. How dare you raise to heaven the suppliant eye, while the dark stains of this guilt are upon your conscience, and black drops of Morgan's blood upon your skirts. You say your neck has been disgraced by the cable-tow of Masonry: if your confession be true, it might well be honored by the cable-tow of justice.

Was it Demas' fault that influenced your secession? Was it that that occasioned your late visit. I should think that no ordinary cupidity could have induced you to stand up among your former acquaintance, and pour out the slanderous ebullitions of your bile against your benefactors. You say your Master left you while a Mason. It is to be presumed that you found him again, "for like the swine that was washed, you have returned to your wallowing in the mire." I hope the Master you now serve will leave all Masons, leave them both now and forever; Beelzebub, the father of lies, and the friend of traitors, and the patron of conspiracies, and the promoter of excitements, has neither my love, nor respect, nor veneration.

Yours, &c.

ROYAL ARCH.

EXTRACT

From an Address delivered before Constellation Lodge, at Dedham, Mass. on the 24th of June, 1829, by NAHUM CAPEN, Esq.

Antimasonic writers, pretend to remember with feelings of respect and veneration, the distinguished members of our institution. They 'do not forget that Washington was of our order'—they 'do not forget, that Franklin, Warren, Lafayette, Gridley, and Clinton were of our order'—Good Heaven! what evidence is there that they 'do not forget? Do they not revile what Washington considered was designed 'to promote the happiness of the human race,' and encouraged, by establishing lodges in the tented field? Do they not ridicule that institution in which our illustrious Franklin was actively engaged, and, according to the records of the Grand Lodge, was the most constant and punctual member ever known in this country? Do they not cry 'murder' and 'treason' against that institution of which Lafayette said, 'from its harmony and respectability throughout this country it might well be regarded as affording an important pillar of support and union to its free institutions, and happy form of government?'

Having these examples, and many others of the same character and weight constantly before them, of what avail are these exceptions? Is he less a murderer who speaks with a smile, before he stabs? If they honor so much these men, whose names they utter with such profound respect, heaven grant they may also soon be brought to honor their principles.

Claiming that candor which is due from one man to another, and the exercise of that reason which is naturally dictated by self-respect, I appeal to those who are not of our order.

Do you object to the principles of masonry? they are the principles contained in the book of God. Do you object to masonic obligations? they are but vows to heaven, that we will faithfully answer the requirements of justice, charity, and benevolence. Do you dislike our forms and ceremonies? we are bound to preserve them unchanged, for the security of our privileges as Masons, and against the intrusion of impostors. Do you object to our badges and jewels? they are but the keys to our treasures, and masonic emblems of duty. Do you object to the elegance of our halls, or the richness of our dresses? operating upon the associating principle of the mind, they have a tendency to give a pleasing character to the exercise of the christian virtues. Do you object against the secrets of the institution? first, know the secrets and their use, and then you would see the importance of preserving them. The secrets of our institution constitute its peculiarities, and to these are to be attributed its permanency and usefulness. Do you doubt that the human heart is of vital importance to the existence of man? And are you so lost to reason as to suppose that their importance would be increased by dissecting it and exposing its facts to the gaze of the world? The same important relation which exists between the human heart and the body exist between the secrets of masonry and the Institution. Do you object to its charity being confined to its members? Would you have us, by engaging to do too much, be able to do nothing? It is not sufficient to silence this objection, forever, that there is not, on the face of the habitable globe, an institution (save that of christianity) dispensing one hundredth part so much for the relief and happiness of man? And aside from this, are not your masonic neighbors as liberal to the contribution box as you are? Shame, shame, on this unfortunate disposition to envy! And, 'though last, not least,' do our fairer friends complain that they are debarred the privileges of initiation? the duties, peculiar to every station to which you are liable to be called, render it unexpedient for yourselves and the institution. Be assured, however, could you but know the masonic provision for your protection, reputation and happiness, your characteristic perseverance would induce your fathers, brothers, husbands, and friends to entitle themselves to the knowledge of masonry, to study its principles and practice them.

In the language of another, 'I would ask you my auditors, for I address those capable of judging, whether it is not in your opinion more probable that these enemies of masonry, who are now so furious, in this moment of excitement, are wrong, absolutely wrong, in their conjectures, suspicions and denunciations, than that so many great and good men, patriots, christians, philosophers, statesmen and scholars, should have attempted to deceive the world through so many ages and nations, and that too, without any possible object? Could saints, and cardinals, kings, bishops, philosophers, republicans, philanthropists, and men of good, strong common sense in every walk of life, from the humblest to the most elevated, be wrong, be wicked, traitorous, and murderous, and the sagacious never yet have found it out, until within two years past? And then the discovery be made by those who never were known for having discovered any thing else.'

That the tyrant should condemn masonry, for its equalizing power; that the bigot should decry it heresy and treason, for its liberal influence; that the bad should revile it for its moral corrections and restraints; that the superstitious should fear it, from a perverted construction of its mysteries, is not strange, as they are all actuated by motives of selfishness and governed by prejudice and passion. But, that honest and good men; men who before have been respected for their charitable and benevolent designs and deeds; men who have been justly esteemed candid and reasonable in their opinions and judgments, should declare hostility to an Institution, whose grand object is the best good and happiness of the human race, is to me, truly strange and unaccountable.

That they should denounce all connexion with a neighbor, a friend, a brother, or a father, with whom they have passed their days of infancy, shared their sports and privileges, and entered upon the labors and cares of manhood, because he is a member of the oldest and one of the most respectable Institutions in the world! To be willing to slander and detract from its merits; to persecute and stigmatize its members, because a few individuals of malicious character, and self-condemned perjurers, have set the example!

Could you but see the good Mason treading his round of duty, 'dispensing charity, protecting chastity, and facing the proud in defence of the humble; kindly sustaining the feeble, guiding the blind; feeding the hungry and clothing the naked, raising up the trodden down, and being a father to the orphan; refreshing and informing the stranger, guarding the altar, protecting the government, encouraging wisdom, loving man, and adoring God!'—your sad delusion would be seen, and the tongue, that now gives utterance to malice and reproach, would speak in tones of admiring approbation.

Brethren and Companions, now that the enemies of our order are in motion against us, the eye of the world is turned upon your conduct. Be firm, and steadfast; act in accordance with the masonic principles of charity and forbearance, and remember the worthy example of the venerable Molay, who, before he would turn traitor against an innocent institution of which he was a distinguished member, submitted to death with all its horrors by fire.

If the son of God, holy, pure, and free from all reproach, found traitors to his cause, is it strange that we, full of imperfections and errors, should find men, untrue!

What though the storms of passion and the poisoned breath of slander assail us, we remain unmoved; storms and darkness may for a while obscure the fair face of day, but,

'The sun, brighter bursts from the cloud,
When the tempest is swept from the sky.'

Be true to yourselves, be faithful to your institution, and you will sustain the principles of justice, and fulfil the commandments of heaven.

PITTSBURGH, (Penn.) July 28.

MASONIC HALL. On Monday, the new Masonic Hall in this city, was thrown open for the first time, for the admission of the fraternity. It was the day appointed for its dedication, and the numerous assemblage of citizens evinced the interest and curiosity which the event excited. The procession was larger than any that ever convened in this city. Members of the institution attended from Wheeling, Steubenville, Beaver, Washington, Brownsville, Butler, Meadville, Blairsville, Kittanning, &c. &c. and swelled the numbers beyond what had been anticipated. They assembled at 11 o'clock, formed in procession, and marched to the methodist meeting house. When arrived at church, the ceremonies opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Brown; after which Judge Shaler delivered an address, which received the highest commendation from all who heard it. After the procession and ceremonies had concluded, the members partook of a sumptuous entertainment, served up in a splendid style at Mr. Bond's Assembly Room.

"Employment is the guardian of female innocence; do not allow women to be idle; Let them be the first dressed and the last undressed all the year round."

"The pearls and precious stones, the silk and glory with which a coquette so studiously bedecks herself, are as transparent varnish, which make all their defects the more apparent."

OBITUARY.

Died in Chelsea, Vermont, on the 11th inst Mr. RALPH HASFORD. The following remarks were made at the grave of the deceased.

I am directed by the relatives of the deceased and by the Masonic Society to which he belonged, to express to you their thanks, for the respect you have this day shown to his memory.

And especially am I directed to present their warm acknowledgements, to those who with affectionate solicitude watched over him in his sickness; endeavoured to alleviate the sufferings they could not remove; and made his dying couch

"Feel soft as downy pillows are."

Few individuals within the compass of our acquaintance, have been the subjects of as deep and extensive a sympathy as our deceased brother. The anxious inquiring look, and the constantly repeated question, showed how earnestly his recovery was desired by all classes of our people.—Indeed, it is rarely the case, that an individual at his age is connected with the community by such strong and numerous ties. His family connections were unusually extensive and respectable. The public at large had expressed their entire confidence in his integrity and his worth; and the masonic society beheld in him a member who would have exposed his breast to the storm, if the arrows of calumny had been levelled at the institution ten fold thicker than they have ever yet been. On his dying bed, he gave his solemn testimony to the truth and purity of the masonic principles.

Yet, with all the generous and ardent energies of his character; with a keen relish for all the rational enjoyments of life; and notwithstanding all the anxiety of his relatives, of his masonic brethren, and of the public, our brother and companion has descended to the grave. And the examination of his body since his decease, has shewn, that for a long time, the arrows of death must have been fastened in his vitals. While he was yet unconscious of disease—while he was forming his plans for future life—or ardently engaged in their execution,—relentless disease has undermined the organ essential to life. And no doubt, many of us, who are counting on the enjoyment of long life, are the subjects of some lurking disorder, that will soon be developed, and that will not cease its ravages, till it has reduced us to the condition of him, whom you have now consigned to the earth. A striking admonition, that "in the midst of life we are in death."

But my brethren, our departed friend has left to our affectionate sympathy, a widow, and an orphan infant.—A widow, whose whole powers of thought and feeling must as yet be unequal to appreciate her irreparable loss—and an infant, who is ignorant that it has sustained any loss.—Poor innocent! it never can know the extent of its misfortune.

You cannot at present comfort these mourners. The world is, to this widow as one wide unpeopled desert. It is to her, as if the whole human family had descended before her eyes into one vast sepulchre. Her world is dead, and buried. But the time may come, when these sorrows may admit of some amelioration. And then, the certain knowledge that the friends of her husband are her friends; that those who were bound to him by the most solemn ties, are bound by ties equally solemn, to befriend her, and her fatherless child will, be a balm to her wounded spirit. The blessings of Providence on the exertions of the deceased, has placed these objects of your benevolent sympathies in a situation in which they will not be likely to need the pecuniary relief which we are bound to administer to the needy.

But there are other duties, which we owe to the widow and the fatherless, and for the performance of which our vows are registered in Heaven. And God so judge you, as you perform those duties. No part of masonic duty is more strongly enjoined than that which relates to our conduct towards the widows and the orphans of our brethren. Let us hope, that in this case, these injunctions will not be disregarded.

CONVENTIONAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER IV.

TO JOHN D. WILLIAMS.

SIR :

Your Conventional friends not having acceded to you any title in your 'Abstract of Proceedings,' I was at some loss as to the style of address properly due you, but have determined to use the unadorned simplicity in which you appeared on that occasion. The fact is, perhaps, worthy of remark, especially as you are deemed not unworthy of notice. There are so few persons, deserving such consideration, on the list where you appear, by courtesy of rank, as leader, that, for the credit of old Suffolk, one can hardly pass you without a nod of recognition, particularly after having glanced over a column of names as little known to the intelligent part of our community, as they are to honest fame.

In practising on your credulity, and enlisting you into the ranks of a faction, there is more of selfish design than your self love will permit you to comprehend. Had you been a poor man, you would not have been honored by being placed at the head of the list of delegates for Suffolk County. The honorable names that succeeded yours would not have been thrown into the shades of a lower rank for even the fairest integrity and highest intelligence connected with honest poverty. The design of this artificial arrangement may have escaped your observation, but the fact could not. It was so flattering to yourself esteem, that you permitted yourself to stand primary in the catalogue that puts your titled friends in secondary consideration. The result for bidding for places would, probably, have produced the same pecuniary amount, unless the gratuity of the honor has been more amply repaid by gratuities of a more substantial form.

The cost of your honors might afford some curious comments on the force of ambition, and some curious speculation for a metaphysical inquirer. And yet, it is said you are not an ambitious man. But to be insensible to flattery you must be immeasurably above or below all the ordinary qualities of humanity. To you, the temptation was novel: the honor not to be resisted. The avowed object of the combination was probably met, on your part, by some predisposing influences. Your personal feelings could therefore be gratified. I impute to you none of the external influences that might be put in operation. But such influences have been abroad; from the political orator who boldly violates the ordinary observances of life, by his inflammatory harangues, down to the needy mountebank who retails his buffoonery for a precarious emolument. I would not willingly name you in such a connexion, as you have a reputation, it is said, beyond such influences. This would be discreditable to your integrity. The supposition that you might be influenced by the distinguished honor before alluded to, would merely render questionable the soundness of your discretion: a distinction as great as between a crime and a folly. The voice of your fellow citizens cheerfully deny for you the former, although they will not acquit you of the latter.

You will, probably, one day perceive, as others have perceived, where this tornado has spent its force, that it is wholly and entirely made up of crime and folly.—Crime, in those, who, for sinister purposes, have created or continued this feverish excitement; and folly, in those who have been unwittingly drawn within its influence. You, Sir, will readily agree with me, that he, who, for the purpose of obtaining public office or private benefit or emolument, so far disregards the peace of the community, or the rights of individuals, as to raise himself on their ruin by treachery and falsehood, is indeed criminal. Look about you. Has it never occurred to you that the same selfish motives that have influenced men since their creation, still influence them? The profligate and the needy always seize upon such occasions to produce some change in their condition. It is the very essence of revolution: the invariable motive to public disturbance. I do most solemnly appeal to the ordinary convictions of common sense reasoning. I conjure you to pause, and put it to your conscience, whether you intend to look calmly on, and suffer one portion of your fellow citizens to be proscribed and persecuted, by a combination of abandoned and unprincipled men who look to you for countenance and support. It is not enough that the political conspirator should deny applying the lighted torch of discord, with his own hand, to the combustible materials of society. He who furnishes the means is tainted with moral guilt as great, if not greater, than he who consummates the deed. In your pecuniary acquisition, under the blessing of Divine Providence, you hold committed to you a trust which you are to discharge with an honest conscience. Your means of becoming a blessing to your fellow citizens will render you deservedly an object of abhorrence, if those means be appropriated to the base purposes of scattering discord, jealousies and divisions. It is a matter of general notoriety, that papers of a highly exciting and inflammatory nature have been scattered, with diligent profusion, among those classes of citizens which might be most easily operated upon, through their passions. Whether you have or have not had any agency, or even knowledge, of these transactions, is unknown to the writer. But there is a fearful responsibility in the distinction accorded to you by your associates, which makes you amenable not only to society, but also to individuals, in the right of plain, but respectful remark. It is the discharge of a high, social duty: it is to be done fearlessly.

It is somewhat remarkable that your debut on the political arena should unite you with men whose habits are so entirely unlike your own. But perhaps the merit of industry and perseverance in their pursuit has caused you to overlook the infamy of their object. You have entered into the cabals of a party, at a period in life when most men become tired with the fatigues of a political race-course, and disgusted with its intrigues. Age, which commonly moderates the desire of dabbling in the details of partizan operations, seems to have produced in you a new passion which overcomes even parsimony, the common and increasing vice of age. Your young ambition will probably soon be satisfied; for when grafted on the stock of declining years, it commonly withers for want of natural vigor to sustain it. Besides, your patriotism will not probably sustain the frequent contributions that will be required. It has usually been supposed that the mature reflection and experience of age were required to correct the overzealous acts of inexperienced youth. But the converse of the rule seems now to prevail; and the zealous effervescence of excited age is appropriated by young and unprincipled ambition to accomplish its sinister purposes.

You are acquitted, Sir, of projecting an unprincipled combination; you are acquitted of the base purpose of throwing society into confusion; but you are not acquitted of the imputation of surrendering your influence into the hands of men as far below you in their moral habits as they are in honest intentions. I take it, Sir, as granted, that you are an upright, honest man; and there is no disposition on my part to diminish the value of your reputation. But even honesty will not shield you from indignant observation, while you permit yourself to be made an instrument in the hands of a faction. Your friends would probably be unwilling to apologize for you on the score of mental imbecility or feebleness of age; and even those who suffer under the displeasure of your Conventional associates, will charitably entertain the supposition that you are suffering under some strange delusion. Sir, the good sense of an intelligent community will set right all the differences of our opinions; and although you and I may pass down the vale of years, in the full measure of age, and leave the agitations of this life to other hands, still, posterity will do ample justice to an Institution that you disapprove. The time will come, when it will be universally acknowledged, that the world has been made better by its principles, and its miseries mitigated by its charities.

I am, Sir, a friend of liberal institutions.

ARCHITECTUS.

CHESEBRO.—The Erie Gazette has an article purporting to have been taken from the Albany Journal of the 25th June, in which it is stated that Mr. Chesebro, who has been punished for the participation in the Morgan outrage, attended the masonic celebration at Catskill on the 24th June. Mr. Chesebro states that he took the steam boat at Albany for New York, and did not land at Catskill. Here is one falsehood nailed to the wall, and we will place another beside it. The same (Albany) paper says:

'What fellow-citizens, has been the conduct of the fraternity towards Mr. Chesebro? Do they deny him their fellowship? Was he expelled from the Lodge and Chapter? By no means! He is now an ornament to Freemasonry.'

The truth is, that Chesebro was suspended from the Lodge and Chapter to which he belonged, immediately after it was ascertained that he was concerned in Morgan's abduction, and he informed us last spring that he had never attended a meeting of masons since his suspension. Every member of the Canandaigua Lodge and Chapter, who was in any way implicated in that affair, was immediately deprived of 'fellowship,' which is the extent of the power possessed by any masonic body over its members.

We have felt it due to the persecuted masons in this region to contradict these falsehoods; and we believe in so doing we shall also subserve the cause of morality. A party which owes its very existence to the propagation of such glaring falsehoods, cannot but exert a baneful influence upon the morals of the people.—Erie Observer.

We have lately been favored with the perusal of a letter from a gentleman in the state of New York, to his friend, a Presbyterian Clergyman, now residing in Medina County, dated Pompey 26th Dec. 1829, from which we make the following extracts.—Ohio pa.

'The excitement rages in churches, separating and destroying as it proceeds. All preachers of the Gospel who are Masons, have the only alternative presented to them: To renounce the institution or leave their flocks!! This remark is, however, applicable to but a few districts in this state. But with all this gloomy intelligence I have to inform you that their still remain hopes of a reaction. I confidently believe that this state of things will not long remain.—The excitement appears to be like a raging fever, forming a crisis, and God only knows how the disease will terminate; whether in a gradual convalescence; or in the immediate death of the patient—but I sincerely hope that the state of New-York will, like the convalescent patient rapidly recover from the disastrous effects of the dire disease—Antimasonry.'

The following anecdote is related of a Clergyman of the town of Cicero. It has set some people a thinking. He has recently renounced the fraternity. A young widow, whose husband was a Mason, had received pecuniary aid from the lodge of which he died a member. Soon after the excitement began in this town, this widow was appealed to, to know whether she had received any money from the Masons, to which she replied that she had, frequently and several times, through the hands of the Rev. Mr. ——— together with his assurance that the institution was a good one, and instituted for charitable purposes; this she said he often repeated. Now, soon after this gentleman's secession, he as usual visited this widow lady she being a member of his church, when she demanded of him an explanation; for says she 'Elder not long since you told me that the institution was a good one and intended for charitable purposes &c. now you have come out and published to the world that it is bad, and that you have belonged to it 20 years: Now as you have certainly lied in one assertion or the other, all I wish to know is this; did you lie when you told me it was good, or was it when you told the world it was bad? The gentleman was confounded and left the house.'

GRAND ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER OF MASS.

NOTICE is hereby given that the annual meeting of the M. E. Grand Royal Arch Chapter of this Commonwealth will be held at Masons Hall, on Tuesday the 7th of Sept. next at 6 o'clock, P. AN ADDRESS

To the People of Plymouth County, on Political Antimasonry, adopted at a meeting held July 5, 1830, by the citizens of Bridgewater.

[The meeting, at which the following Address was adopted, was held agreeably to a general invitation requesting the citizens of Bridgewater to assemble, for the purpose of expressing their opinion on the subject of Political Antimasonry. SIMON PRATT was called to the Chair, and LEWIS WASHBURN appointed Secretary.

ADDRESS.

(Concluded.)

Though it is not our intention to lay before you a vindication of the masonic fraternity, for most of us, as we have already said, have no connexion with it; yet permit us to ask, have you found its members to be worse than other men in the various relations of life, or have you found them different from those around them, either in principle or practice, religion or politics? What but credulity itself can believe, that an institution is hostile to liberty which is ready to receive within its number, men of all professions, employments, ranks, political and religious opinions, on the ground of equality? Who ever heard of a conspiracy against the rights of the public, when the preliminaries were, 'that every conspirator should possess a fair moral character, that he should come without solicitation, that he should take upon himself no obligation interfering with his allegiance to the state, or with the principles of his religious faith, that he must be a quiet and peaceable subject, true to his government and just to his country, that he must do good unto all, and that every human being has a claim on him for his kind offices?' Among all the discoveries of this inquiring age, that such principles are hostile to liberty, is surely the most marvellous.

Since nothing can be shown in the conduct of these men, which calls for their indiscriminate proscription, we are referred to what are said to be their secret obligations. But is it your practice always to judge men by their obligations and professions alone? If you will not give them credit for all the good they profess, when their conduct contradicts the language of their lips, why is the sentence of condemnation to be passed upon these people, for what we hear are their secret engagements, while the language both of their lips and their lives appeals to us with irresistible power in vindication of their integrity? Admitting that the literal language of some of their obligations is objectionable; what reason have you to believe that they interpret them literally, and that they consider them paramount to all others? Do not the conditions on which they take them, and the principles just referred to, contradict such an inference? If they are sometimes abused to the perpetration or concealment of crime, it is the fate of every thing in the hands of man. How long ago would not Christianity itself have ceased to exist, if judged by a similar rule; for this has been abused to the murder of myriads! However, we who know their obligations and oaths only from the books of their enemies, find much which we cannot approve. But, we would inquire, does not the usual administration of oaths throughout our country, lie under a similar objection? Are there not forms in our judicial proceedings, accompanied by the solemnity of an oath, in which much of the language, if we regard the literal import of the words, is unmeaning? And is there not a useless multiplication of oaths connected with the tenure of unimportant offices? Of some Masonic obligations no man can read the language, and in his sober senses give it a literal meaning. But, whatever censure may be attached to several of the higher degrees, Masons in this State have no connexion with them, and are in no manner responsible for them.

Let us remember, fellow citizens, that in this controversy, we are peculiarly liable to be deceived; for nearly all the evidence in this case is from one side of the question. This fact alone will account in a great measure for whatever success has attended the exertions of this new party. You are fully aware what a false coloring is often given by interested partisans, even with the most honest intentions. Most of us can look back to seasons of party virulence, which we hoped had gone by, not soon to return, when every incident of a political nature, if viewed as right by one party, was sure to be condemned by the other, as entirely wrong. What opportunity was there to arrive at the truth, by receiving the statements of one of those parties, without knowing what could be said in reply? This is precisely the state of the present controversy. All our information concerning the ceremonies and oaths of freemasonry is derived from its professed enemies, from those who have declared that the institution must, and shall, go down. Are the representations of such men, however honest, to be received without any allowance for the coloring which human weakness and prejudice, under such circumstances, will never fail to give? It is well known, that their obligations to secrecy forbid the fraternity from entering on a full discussion of these objectionable points. Pitiful indeed must be the skill of the archer, if, with his poisoned arrows and choice of position, he can inflict no wound upon his pinioned adversary. For ourselves, we beg to be excused from rallying forth in such a crusade.

Not only is all the evidence in this case from an interested party, but it is from men whose conduct is not the least mysterious part of this strange business. That opinions may honestly change, that they ought to change with the increase of years and wisdom, we admit, but, that a man of any principle or discretion should lay himself under obligation, by the most solemn bonds, to commit perjury, murder, and blasphemy, and remain quiet in that state of things for five, ten, or twenty years, never warn his fellow men against so nefarious an institution, and never, till recently, ever become sensible that he was doing wrong—is more than we can comprehend. The idle talk of their fearing masonic vengeance, is but a sorry compliment to either their firmness or principle, and certainly cannot enhance the value of their testimony. But let it be noted that the number of these men is comparatively small. Where one has seceded, hundreds still adhere, second to no men in our country for integrity, talent, and piety. We believe, however, that there are many who regard the institution as of little or no value in the present state of the world; but who will not, and ought not, to give up their rights to clamor and persecution.

Before we conclude our remarks, we will mention, that nothing of a political nature strikes so directly at the root of social and domestic quiet, as the details of this new party; for they are well fitted to find their way into the family circle, to stimulate and gratify the appetite of a morbid curiosity. Hence many have found in them a system of politics well adapted to their comprehension and taste, who were never before so fortunate. But what must be the fruits of such a cause? If you are taught to regard your neighbor, whom you have ever had cause to respect and esteem, as leagued with kidnappers and murderers, ready to justify their deeds and conceal their crimes, and sworn to utter the grossest falsehoods; is there no danger that the heart of many a one will be filled with those dark suspicions, with that hatred of one's brother without a cause which the highest of all authority has declared to be the very spirit of murder?

Again, who could foretell the fate which would likewise await our national interests, were the qualifications of our legislators to be all summed up in the single point of their hatred of masonry? Who could predict the course of their policy relative to the complicated concerns of our domestic affairs and our foreign relations, were all other considerations made subordinate to the destruction of this institution? Let the attention of our readers be diverted from its proper object, the general welfare, let them be elected for the purpose of hunting down a particular order of men, let all things else be cast into the shade, that they may go in chase of a meteor conjured up by a distempered state of the public mind, and we cannot too soon prepare for the ruin of our fortunes.

Perhaps you may think, fellow citizens, that we give this subject more importance than it deserves. Perhaps you may regard antimasonry as only a local and short lived delusion, unworthy of general notice. We do indeed believe the American people too well informed to become the prey of such a party. But the public mind must be awake. The soldier must not sleep at his post, with whatever security he may view his foe. Each citizen must feel his own responsibility, or the best commonwealth might fall into the hands of any busy and designing faction. Perhaps it is not generally known to you, that wherever this new party can get a foothold, they have their county, town, and even neighborhood committees of vigilance. The time to resist evil is at the beginning; to withstand oppression, when it first attempts to lay its grasp upon us. In a few towns in this county they have already obtained majorities, and in a neighboring county have succeeded in electing a senator. And are you willing that such a party should, through your negligence and apathy, continue to extend its power? You know its origin and principles: and can you expect the fruit to be any better than the tree? A spirit which would regard such men as Warren, Franklin, Washington, and La Fayette, as unworthy to fill even a town office, is a spirit which every good man must condemn, every friend to our liberties must deplore.

In view of these considerations we will not give countenance to political antimasonry, whatever may be our respective opinions of the masonic institution. We will continue to regard our masonic fellow citizens, as we have done in times past, and as we still do other men, from what we know them to be, rather than from what we are told. We call on you, fellow citizens, to unite with us in all fair measures for preventing the spread of this delusion, which we cannot view otherwise, than as disreputable to this section of our State, and opposed to the welfare of our civil institutions. We call on you to resist the measures of this new party, as you prize the right of private judgment and the liberty of conscience; as you value confidence between man and man, and the peace of families and neighborhoods; as you respect the memory of friends and relatives who have gone before you; as you revere the sainted spirit of the father of your country; as you value the purity of elections, the administration of justice; and in fine, as you prize all those blessings of which this day's anniversary reminds you.

We now commit these remarks to your candid notice, and with deep regret, that we are compelled to dissent so widely from the opinions of many of our friends and neighbors, for whom we entertain the highest respect. But the controversy is not of our seeking. It has been forced upon us. The alternative is, Political Antimasonry on the one hand, with the proscription of our brethren and ourselves, we know not to what extent; or republicanism with equal right on the other; and we make our choice without a moment's hesitation.

SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

THEORIES OF THE EARTH.

Whiston derived the material of creation from the atmosphere of one comet, and found the elements of destruction in the tail of another.—Woodward suspended the principle of cohesion, and dissolved the whole terrene mass into a muddy matrix of organization. Dr. Burnet's theory covered the abyss with a superficial crust, constituting the exterior of the globe. At the Deluge, this was broken up, forming the mountains by its fragments and the seas by its collapse. Descartes and Leibnitz represented the Earth as an extinguished and vitrified sun, first exhaling, and then condensing the vapors, which in their present state compose our oceans. De Maillet imagined the actual condition of the Earth to be the result of the gradual secession of the waters which originally covered it. All animals were primarily inhabitants of this 'vast deep;' and man himself is nothing more than a civilized fish, having, by a slow adaptation of his habits to his new domicile, gradually laid aside his fins and tail. The sun, according to Buffon, supplied the elements of our planets, as well as those of his revolving system, through the concussion of a comet, which struck off from it, a sufficient number of fragments to furnish him with his present satellites.

Other writers, with Kepler, have considered the globe, itself, as possessed of vital faculties.—According to them, a vital fluid circulates in it; a process of assimilation goes on in it, as well as in animated bodies; every particle of it is alive: it possesses instinct and volition, even to the most elementary molecules, which attract and repel each other according to sympathies, and antipathies. Each kind of mineral has the power of converting immense masses into its own nature, as we convert our food into flesh and blood. The mountains are the respiratory organs of the globe and the shifts its organs of secretion: it is by these latter, that it decomposes the water of the sea, in order to produce the matter ejected by volcanoes. The veins are carious sores, abscesses of the mineral kingdom; and the metals are the products of rotteness and disease, which is the reason that almost all of them have so bad a smell.

'Crystallization—detritus, pressure and caloric, the successive lapse of minor seas—the effects of immense tides—the accretion of meteoric stones—a traversing loadstone shifting the centre of gravity—these and many other imaginations have been at different periods put forward by men of no mean name as sufficient to account for the structure and vicissitudes of the Earth. After all, however, that the vanity of human science has grasped at, and the restlessness of human curiosity achieved, we have not got beyond our first lesson; 'In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth.' The matter is as simple as an infant's task, if we will take the Creator's account of his own work, but is pressed down with an atlas-load of difficulties, when we entangle ourselves with the 'oppositions of science falsely so called.' We first make contradictions and then wondering at our own perverse ingenuity, set them down as insurmountable. We begin by multiplying fantastic obstacles, and finish by standing aghast at hinderances of our own invention. It is taken tacitly for granted, that we are so far in possession of the master key of nature, as that there can remain no very important agents yet undetected by the keen, and persevering researches of scientific men, whereas they may exist active and interior elements, of which the operations now in view, are but the faint and extreme vibrations. The central secrets of nature are yet unviolated. We stand but on the threshold of the great Temple of Creation, and it may be the work of Eternity to explore its mysteries.'

HORRID INSECTS.—Opposite the venda was an open copse, covered with brushwood. Here I entered to collect insects which abounded in it; but I was called back and warned of danger. I thought of serpents, and made a precipitate retreat; but I found the danger was from a smaller, though nearly as serious a cause. Among the insects of the country is a kind of a tick called carapatoo. This is exceedingly venomous; it has six hooked or sharp claws, with which it readily clings to any passing object, and it is furnished with a proboscis of a singular structure. It consists of a pencil of bristles, serrated inwards, forming a terebo or piercer, with which it instantly penetrates the flesh of any animal, to which it has adhered by its claws, and burrows its head in the wound. When entering, the bristles expand, forming a triangle, of which the base was inside, so that it opposes a resistance to extraction, which it is sometimes quite impossible to overcome. If it is suffered to remain, it gorges itself with blood, till it becomes bloated to an enormous size; if it be extracted forcibly, so as to separate the head it remains festering in the wound, and as it is exceedingly irritating and acrid in its quality, it causes violent inflammation, which degenerates in a low and dangerous ulcer. The late King suffered severely from a carapatoo.—These horrid insects, which are the plague of the country, are sometimes so abundant, that the cattle perish by their attacks. They are so tough that they cannot be bruised, so vivacious that they cannot be drowned, and so adhesive that they cannot be separated; so that it was in vain to place the cattle in water, or use any other expedient.—When I came out of the wood, one was found on my neck, in the act of perforating the flesh with its proboscis, but it had not time, and it was easily extracted. It was about the size of a large bug, with a gray mottled skin which was so coriaceous and leathery, that no bruising would kill it, and it escaped.—Walsh's Travels in Brazil.

THE ADVANTAGES OF EDUCATION TO THE WORKING CLASSES. The moral good, which results from the acquisition of knowledge, is chiefly this; that, by multiplying the mental resources, it has a tendency to exalt the character, and, in some measure, to correct and reduce the taste for gross sensuality. It enables the possessor to beguile his leisure moments (and every man has such) in an innocent, at least, if not an useful manner. The poor man who can read, can find entertainment at home, without being tempted to repair to the ale house for that purpose. His mind can find employment when his body is at rest; he does not lie prostrate and reflect on the current of incidents, liable to be carried whithersoever the impulse of appetite may direct. In the mind of such a man, there is an intellectual spring, urging him to the pursuit of mental good; and if the minds of his family are also a little cultivated, his conversation becomes the more interesting, and thus the sphere of his domestic enjoyment is enlarged; the pleasures which lay open to him at the gates of knowledge, put him in a disposition to relish, more exquisitely, the tranquil delight inseparable from the indulgence of conjugal and parental affection: thus he becomes more respectable in the eyes of his family than he who can teach them nothing; he will be naturally induced to cultivate whatever may preserve, & shun whatever would impair that respect. Inured to reflection, he will thus carry his views beyond the present hour; he will extend his prospects a little into futurity, and be disposed to make some provision for his approaching wants, whence will result an increased motive to industry, together with a care to husband his earnings and to avoid unnecessary expense. The poor man who gains a taste for good books, will, in all likelihood, become thoughtful; and when you have once given the poor man the habit of thinking, you have conferred on him a much greater favor than by the gift of a large sum of money, since you have put into use the principle of all legitimate prosperity; for, according to our great philosopher Bacon, 'knowledge is power.'—London Mechan. Mag.

THINKING.—To think, is the highest exercise of the mind; to say what you think, the boldest effort of moral courage; and both these things are required for a really powerful writer. Eloquence, without thoughts is a mere parade of words; and no man can express with spirit and vigor any thoughts but his own. This was the secret of the eloquence of Rousseau. The principal of the Jesuit's college one day inquired of him by what art he had been able to write so well. 'I said what I thought,' replied the unceremonious Genevan—conveying in these few words the bitterest satire on the system of the Jesuits and the best explanation of his own.

A young artist, named Bernard Dunford, has invented an improvement in Lithography, which consists in substituting diamond points for the needles hitherto used in tracing out the letters on the stone. The diamonds are fixed in a handle, and the principal advantage derived from the use of them is, that the hard veins, which, in many instances, intersect the stones, are cut through with as much ease as the softer parts.

Qu.? Why is a man, up stairs, whipping his wife, like a good man?

Ans. Because he is above doing a bad action!

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, AUGUST 28, 1830.

ANTIMASONIC VILLANY EXPOSED.

READ—THEN JUDGE.

The attention of the public is respectfully invited to the annexed document. It will be seen that it is derived from a source that entitles it to implicit credit. The calumny of which it is a satisfactory refutation, charged upon the masonic fraternity of Belfast, a crime of the most damning character. But its object was not limited to the implication of a particular number of individuals, or of a particular Lodge. It was designed to bring contumely and disgrace upon the whole masonic fraternity, throughout the world. It arraigned before the public tribunal, two hundred thousand of our own citizens! It charged them with being the supporters of an institution, whose laws require the sacrifice of the lives of its apostate members!! The charge was one of serious importance. If true, it ought to consign over to infamy and perdition every member of that institution; but it is false. It has not the shadow of truth to sustain it. Conscious of the correctness of this remark, we were prompt to meet the base imputation; and to prove, by the best evidence the nature of the case would then admit of, its entire falsity. How far we were successful in this, we leave to the decision of our readers. All the circumstances connected with the Anderton affidavit, are fresh in the minds of those who have marked the progress of the controversy. The interest which it created is not yet subsided; and there are undoubtedly many persons in the community who are not yet satisfied that the whole statement is a foul and base fabrication. There are many who have suspended their opinion on the implied pledge of the 'Investigating Committee,' that the subject should receive a 'judicial investigation.' They have waited with much patience, for the result of this promised investigation. That pledge has never been redeemed; nor is it probable that it ever will be. If any measures have been taken by the committee, to ascertain the truth of Anderton's statement, the result of those measures has been, to them, wholly unsatisfactory. We say, to them unsatisfactory; because we do not believe that they have honor or magnanimity enough to induce them to correct a false statement, even of their own making. It will appear from this remark that we have not a very exalted opinion of the moral character of the committee. We candidly own that we have not. We look upon them as a combination of unprincipled office seekers; men who would sacrifice one half of the community; if, by so doing, they could secure their own political ascendancy.

We again invite the attention of the public to the subjoined document. We received it by the James & Mary, at Halifax, N. S., from Belfast. It was published in the BELFAST GUARDIAN, of the 1st of June, 1830. The editor of which, remarks:—'We publish with great satisfaction, the following strong refutation of the MALIGNANT FABRICATION respecting a murder, alleged to have been committed in a Masonic Lodge in Belfast, in 1813.' The committee will readily perceive that it is emphatically, a 'strong refutation' of one of the basest calumnies and vilest slanders that ever emanated from that most infamous of all receptacles of moral depravity—an antimasonic secret committee room. It is a full and perfect refutation of a calumny, in the propagation and dissemination of which, the committee have been, in a greater or less degree, instrumental. We do not charge them with a preknowledge of Anderton's villany. We do not charge them with subornation of perjury. If that charge rightly attaches to them, even in a moral point of view, we do not make the application. But we do charge them with a want of common discernment, or of common honesty, in not detecting and exposing or checking the vile imposture. So far from their having acted, in this transaction, like fair and candid men, it is a notorious fact, that they, or their constituents, peremptorily refused to permit a disinterested individual, who was present at the farcical examination of Anderton, to propose any questions tending to elicit the truth, or to detect the imposition. It is further known that they did countenance, aid, and assist Anderton in arranging and preparing the false, scandalous and libellous publication to which he made oath. They, or their associates, still continue to afford him their encouragement and support, probably in consideration of the valuable services he has, by perjury and blasphemy, rendered them and their cause. Whether or not they have in this way become particeps criminis, and are therefore equally culpable as the principal himself, we leave to the decision of a candid and discerning public. We leave that public, too, to estimate the goodness of a cause which requires such infamous means to sustain it.

REFUTATION
OF A FOUL AND UNFOUNDED CALUMNY AGAINST FREEMASONRY.

County of Antrim, } The voluntary deposition of HEN-
TO WIT. } RY ALLEN, of Belfast, in the county of Antrim, in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, called Ireland, Esq. who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists, upon his oath, saith, that he was appointed a Coroner for said County in March, 1813, and hath regularly resided in Belfast since that period, and been the only Coroner resident therein; and saith, he has carefully examined his register of inquests, and that he never did hold an inquest on any person of the name of WILLIAM MILLER, nor did he ever hear of a person of that name having been found dead in Belfast, or of an inquest having been held on any person of that name; and deponent hath presided at every inquest held in Belfast since he was appointed Coroner except one, on the bodies of two men, named Grimes and Menary, who were shot in a riot in North-street, Belfast, on the 12th of July, 1813.

And the further voluntary deposition of Robert M'Cann, weaver, aged 88 years, Francis Wilson, currier, aged 68 years, Rowland M'Corley, bricklayer, aged 53 years, William Harper, shoemaker, aged 50 years, John Morrow, painter, aged 39 years, Charles Daly, bricklayer, aged 38 years, and William Shiels, bricklayer, aged 38 years, all of Belfast, and County of Antrim aforesaid, and John M'Clune, of Braniel, farmer, aged 72, and James Kennedy, of Ballymacarrett, farmer, aged 42 years, both in the County of Down, who, being severally sworn on the Holy Evangelists, make oath, and say, each for himself, and not for the other, that they were respectively members (except deponent Robert M'Cann, who was tyler) of the Masonic Lodge, number 272, which was called the TRUE BLUE, (and not the NEW BLUE) and that they respectively never knew a person of the name of WM. MILLER, as a member of that Lodge, nor does any of them ever recollect a person of that name having been a visiter in that Lodge; and deponents say, that they never knew any person of the name of SAMUEL G. ANDERTON, to have been admitted as a Mason in that Lodge, or as a visiter in it, nor did they ever know a person of the name of Anderton either as a Mason or otherwise.

Deponent, Francis Wilson, saith, that he was one of the two first members admitted into that Lodge, after its revival in 1811; and that the deponent, James Kennedy, was the other member; and deponent, Francis Wilson, was that night appointed Secretary to the Lodge, and held that office from that time till January, 1814; and he positively saith, that there was no man either of the name of ANDERTON or MILLER admitted into the Lodge during the period of his Secretaryship. And same deponent saith, that, during that period, the books of the Lodge were kept by him in his own handwriting: and that he hath this day carefully examined the said books, and that there does not appear on the face of said books any person of the name of Kennedy, except deponent, James Kennedy, who was admitted the same night along with the deponent as aforesaid mentioned.

Deponent, James Kennedy, saith he is the person who was admitted a member of said Lodge along with deponent, Francis Wilson, in 1811, and was a member of that Lodge for about ten years; deponent saith, that he never was acquainted with any person of the name of ANDERTON, either before or after deponent was admitted a Mason; nor was this deponent ever acquainted with any person of the name of WILLIAM MILLER, who was by trade a miller; nor with any man of that name who is dead, though deponent knows two men of that name who are living. The several deponents say they have seen a printed paper, headed thus:—

"MASONRY THE SAME ALL OVER THE WORLD.
ANOTHER MASONIC

purporting to be an affidavit sworn by a person of the name of SAM. G. ANDERTON, of the city of Boston, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in the United States of America, and purporting to have been sworn on the 15th day of March last, before John W. Quincy, Notary Public and Justice of the Peace. And deponents severally say, they have heard the said paper distinctly read by Henry Barr, of Belfast, aforesaid, writing clerk; and deponents, all but Henry Allen, severally swear that the statements made in said affidavit respecting the said SAMUEL G. ANDERTON, having been admitted a member of said Lodge, number 272, and respecting the murder of a person named WILLIAM MILLER in that Lodge, are in all respects and in every particular gross, infamous, and unfounded falsehoods, as far as these deponents are concerned, and as far as these deponents know, or have heard, no such transactions having ever taken place.

Henry Allen, Coroner, County of Antrim, Robert M'Cann, Francis Wilson, Rowland M'Corley, Wm. Harper, John Morrow, Charles Daly, Wm. Shiels, John M'Clune, Jas. Kennedy.

Signed in my presence (being first truly read to deponents by me,)

HENRY BARR.

Sworn at Belfast, County Antrim, this 31st May, 1830, before us, and we have also sworn Henry Barr that he read the said printed paper and this deposition to the several deponents, and saw them sign this deposition.

C. M. SKINNER, Police Magistrate for Belfast.
HENDERSON BLACK, J. P. County Antrim.
ROBERT THOMPSON, J. P. County Antrim.

[P] The Harrisburg Pen. Intelligencer, a leading antimasonic paper, intimates that it may not be prudent in the Convention about to assemble at Philadelphia, to nominate a candidate for the Presidency, and asks if 'an antimasonic candidate for the Vice Presidency is nominated by the friends of HENRY CLAY, who can doubt for a moment the triumph of the ticket?' We will accept of Clay, who is a Mason, for President, if you will give us an antimasonic Vice President!—That is, Clay may mount the antimasonic beast, if he will permit our candidate to mount him! An old fox is seldom caught twice in the same trap.

CAPTURE OF ALGIERS.—By an arrival at New-Haven, from St. Barts, we learn that the French captured the city of Algiers, by assault, on the 4th of July. This intelligence was received at St. Barts, by a Swedish ship, in a short passage from Gibraltar. Capt. B. states that the French were repulsed in the first assault, but ultimately prevailed, with the loss of 3,500 men killed—the Algerine loss supposed to be 6000. The Dey had retreated to the interior.

SALEM TRIALS.—John Francis Knapp has been convicted of the murder; or rather of being present and aiding in the murder of JOSEPH WHITE, Esq. of Salem. Sentence of death has been pronounced upon him. The time of execution is to be fixed by the Governor and Council. After receiving the verdict of the jury, the Court asked the prisoner the usual question, whether he had ought to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him? to which he replied:—'I have only to say, that I am innocent of the charge which has been brought against me—and I now declare to the world, that I shall die innocent of the charge for which I am to suffer.'

WILSON—THE MAIL ROBBER.

The reader will recollect that a few weeks since, we adverted to the malicious scandal heaped upon the head of the President of the United States, in consequence of his having exercised the 'pardoning power' in the case of George Wilson, one of the persons recently convicted, in Philadelphia, of robbing the mail. The editor of an infamous antimasonic thing, printed in Philadelphia, boldly declared that Wilson was pardoned in consequence of his being a Mason! Thus basely charging the President with the commission of the crime of perjury!! This miserable calumniator knew that Wilson could not, from the character of his life, have entered a Masonic Lodge. He knew that the charge was a wilful and malicious falsehood, not having the shadow of truth to warrant or sustain it. The President is known to be a Mason, and this act of mercy is seized upon by the bloodhounds of antimasonry, to bring him into disrepute, on that account. But the shaft falls harmless at his feet. The editor of the United States Telegraph has furnished a brief explanation of the circumstances which led to the pardon of Wilson. The following is a copy of a letter addressed to the President by Rev. Mr. Skinner, a distinguished minister of Philadelphia, who had been called to attend the prisoner in his confinement.

To His Excellency the President of the United States.

Sir: Soon after the sentence of death was pronounced upon George Wilson, one of the mail robbers ordered for execution on the second day of July next, he sent for me as a minister of religion. I found him a youth of about 22 years, in appearance, and was struck with no mark of villany in his countenance, and with nothing disagreeable in his spirit and manner in conversation. On the contrary, he seemed submissive to his dreadful sentence, confessed his guilt, in respect to both his country and his God; and while he anticipated nothing but the execution of justice from the former, cast himself upon the boundless mercy of the latter. Such seems to be the present state of his mind, such it has seemed to be in all my conferences with him. I am not the proper person to represent to your Excellency the extenuating circumstances of his case; but those circumstances, and not blind compassion, have induced me to raise my supplication to you in his behalf. Regard for public justice, and veneration for the law, especially as administered in this country, would have prevented me from requesting, or even desiring, the remission of any part of its sentence in the present instance, but from a very strong conviction that it has no common claims to Executive commiseration. It is this conviction which makes me an humble and a very earnest petitioner to your Excellency for the life of Wilson.

'I am, with the highest consideration,

'Your Excellency's obt. servt.

'Philadelphia, June 11th, 1830.'

Similar assurances were received from various quarters. Anxious to preserve the life of a fellow creature, if such an act of benevolence should be found compatible with the faithful discharge of his official duty, the President sought and obtained information from other sources; from the officers of justice, from the Agent of the Post-Office, who had been engaged in his apprehension, who had visited him in his confinement, and freely communed with him from the time of arrest. They confirmed these favorable representations. There was moreover, sufficient evidence to show that promises of pardon had been held out to Wilson, not, indeed, by Mr. Jeffers, who arrested him, but by another. That officer bore testimony to the frankness with which Wilson confessed his participation in the robbery, and, in his statement, now before us, thus expresses himself. "It is my opinion, that, without the facts communicated by Wilson, neither he, nor Porter, would have been convicted."

"It would no doubt have been grateful to the President, if the case of Porter had been presented to him under circumstances equally favorable. Such was not the fact. A very inconsiderable number of persons subscribed his petition for pardon. It does not appear that a single alleviating circumstance was brought to the notice of the President, to palliate the admitted atrocity of his conduct. On the contrary, he was represented, and we believe truly, to have planned this flagitious enterprise; to have taken the lead in its execution; and to have evinced neither penitence, nor submission, when the arm of justice had overtaken him. We think there is no one who has perused the report of his trial, and that of Wilson, and the published journal of the Rev. Thomas Porter, one of the attending ministers, who can doubt the correctness of this representation. Let the testimony of Potest, the accomplice; of Jeffers, the Police Officer; and of Reeside, the agent of the General Post Office, be examined. It will be seen that Porter proposed this among other schemes of robbery; that he threatened Wilson, when his resolution faltered; that he (Porter) got the powder and ball, and loaded all the pistols; that he commenced the onset by springing to the horses; that he tied and robbed the passengers, and was manifestly the leader in the enterprise; that, flushed with his success, he proposed to attack the 6 o'clock stage, just after this robbery was completed; and denounced Wilson as a coward, because he refused to join him. When arrested and deprived of his pistols by the Police Officer, Stewart, the spirit of Porter was unsubdued. Looking sternly at him, he said, 'I am in hopes I shall live to see the day when I'll buy another pair for some body.' During his confinement he manifested the same indomitable spirit, the same reckless impetuosity, as we learn from the journal of the Rev. Mr. Porter. When urged to prepare for futurity, he said it was too late for him to think about these things. The Rev. Mr. Patterson, engaged in the benevolent offices of his religion, was completely unmanned by his levity. To the Rev. Mr. Porter, after ascertaining that the keeper was not in hearing, he said, that they would have nothing to boast of his honorable death. When informed that great concern was manifested by Christians in behalf of his spiritual life, he replied that he would rather they were concerned for his natural life. Again, when he was told that many prayers were offered up to God in his behalf, he said if they would give him his life they might have their prayers. He thought only of pardon and not of repentance: for he said, he would not believe he was a going to be hung even if he were ascending the scaffold. On the Sunday morning, preceding his execution, an aged man of God, as we are informed in the journal before referred to, attended to pray for him. When he had finished, Porter remarked to the inner keeper, that the gentleman made a good prayer; and in the midst of a fervent exhortation from the same individual, he (Porter) burst into a fit of laughter, for which he afterwards apologized by saying it was a disease which caused him to laugh. He in effect admitted the propriety of the discrimination between Wilson and himself.

THE ANT-BEAR.—One of these rare and curious animals is now on exhibition in this city. The proprietor calls it the 'Great Ant-eater.' This in one sense is true; but, though the ant-eater is of the same species, this is not the animal to which naturalists have given that name.—There are many animals both in Africa and America that live upon ants. The Pangolin of Guinea, is among the number in Africa; but there are a greater number in America. M. Buffon has classed them into the larger and smaller Tamandua, and the Ant-eater. The one now in this city, is of the largest kind. He is about four feet long, from the tip of the snout to the insertion of the tail; his legs are short, and armed with four strong claws; his tail is long and tufted, and when he lies down he throws it on his back, like the squirrel; it is sufficiently large to conceal the body, and he seems to be very proud of it. The smaller Tamandua is not above eighteen inches long; the tail is without hair, and it sweeps the ground as the animal moves. The Ant-eater, which is the third variety, is not above seven inches from the tip of the snout to the insertion of the tail, and its colour is of a beautiful reddish, mixed with yellow. The Ant-Bear is usually of a brownish colour. The one here is of a greyish colour, with stripes and spots of black and white intermixed, which add to his beauty. Though they differ in figure, these animals all resemble each other in one peculiarity, which is the extreme slenderness of their snout, and the amazing length of their tongue.—The snout is produced in so disproportionate a manner, that the length of it makes near a fourth part of the whole figure. It is almost round and cylindrical, is extremely slender, and scarce thicker near the eyes than at its extremity. The mouth is very small, the nostrils are close to each other; the eyes are little in proportion to the length of the nose; the ears are also very small. The neck is short, and the tongue is extremely long, slender, and flattened on both sides, except at the end, which is nearly round; this it keeps generally doubled up in the mouth, and is the only instrument by which it finds subsistence; for the whole of this tribe are without teeth. It is a native only of the new continent, and is entirely unknown to the old. Its retreats are in the most barren and uncultivated parts of South America. It lives chiefly in the woods, and conceals itself under the fallen leaves. It seldom ventures from its retreats, and consequently is seldom seen or taken. Its manner of procuring its prey is one of the most singular in all natural history. In countries where it is bred, ants are found in great abundance: they often build themselves hills five or six feet high, where they live in community. When this animal approaches an ant-hill, it creeps slowly forward on its belly, taking every precaution to keep itself concealed, till it comes within a proper distance of the place where it intends to make its banquet; it then thrusts forth its long red tongue, often two feet in length, across the path of these busy insects, and there lets it lie motionless for several minutes together. The ants, some of which are half an inch long, taking it for flesh accidentally thrown before them, come forth and swarm upon it in great numbers; but wherever they touch they stick; it being covered with a slimy fluid, which, like bird-lime, entangles every creature that lights upon it. When it has secured a sufficient number for one morsel, it draws in its tongue and instantly devours its prey. After its hunger is appeased, it retires to its hiding place, where it continues in indolent existence, till again excited by the calls of hunger.

Helpless as this animal is, (for it has no teeth, and its legs are too short to fit it for flight,) when driven to an extremity, it will fight with its claws with great obstinacy.—With these arms alone it has often been found to oppose the dog, and even the jaguar. It throws itself upon its back, fastens upon its enemy with all its claws, sticks with great strength and perseverance, and even after killing its invader, which is sometimes the case, does not quit its hold, but remains fastened upon it with vindictive desperation. The present one is the first ever brought to the United States; and the lover of natural history will find it worthy of his examination. It measures about six feet from the tip of the trunk to the extremity of the tail. It frequently runs out its tongue from ten to sixteen inches.—It is to be seen at the Washington Garden.

NEW MASONIC TEMPLE—BOSTON.

Our brethren will be gratified to learn that the Grand Lodge of this Commonwealth has recently purchased that eligible lot of land next south of St. Paul's Church, Tremont-street, for the erection of a MASONIC TEMPLE.—The workmen will probably 'break ground' early in the ensuing week. Seasonable notice will be given of the 'laying of the corner stone.'

It is said that some antimasons held a meeting at Fanenil Hall on Thursday evening last. If this be true, it only proves that the 'Cradle of Liberty' has been again prostituted to the base purposes of a contemptible seditious faction.

The antimasonic jackanapes of this city, have discovered that Samuel Dexter, in 1798, wrote a communication for the Palladium and Mercury against the French Illuminism! Prodigious!

The antimasons of Vermont have nominated Wm. A. Palmer for Governor of that State. Mr Palmer, when in Congress, was an advocate for slavery! The free-men of Vermont will not have such a man to rule over them.

THE UNFEELING FATHER:

A TALE OF TRUTH.

"Does Nature then refuse to plead, or is her plea too wild?

Oh, do not let me kneel in vain! dear father, hear thy child!

Look on this alter'd brow, my sire, then listen to my prayer;

Oh, let it not unheeded pass upon the chill night-air!

Say, on this brow dost thou not mark stern sorrow's blanching trace—

Dost thou not view my mother's smile upon this care-worn face?

Nay! thou canst never bid me go!—Stay! stay! one moment stay!

Does Nature plead my prayer in vain!—Oh, turn me not away!"

"Does Nature plead thy prayer in vain?" ungrateful girl, dost ask?

Fond Nature's sacred tie is broke! she scorns thy wretched task!

Think ye she 'll plead! away! away! I know thee not false one!

Where is the wretch who from thy sire his fondest treasure won?

For whom thou leftst thy father's house, thy mother's tender care?

Thy father, when thou leftst him, girl, then breathed a solemn prayer!—

He curs'd his child!—the ling'ring tear was quickly brush'd away!—

'Thou 'st heard me, wretch!—hence!—near these doors again ne'er dare to stray!"

"Oh, father, turn not thus away!—I do deserve thy hate;

But listen to thy sinful child—hear what has been her fate! Oh, do not from thy wretched child in anger turn away!

An heav'nly Father doth forgive the wicked when they pray,

And shall an earthly one deny the charitable boon!—Nay! father, Death will close my weary eyelids soon!

Oh, look upon my wretched babes! alas! what have they done?

They ne'er have fled a parent's love! they have no deeds to shun!

Oh take them to thy tender care, and when they prance with glee—

Then tell my smiling orphan babes to cast one thought on me!

Oh pity them! and I will bow me down and meet my fate;

But, dearest parent, do not let them feel thy deadly hate! See! see!—my boy is laughing now, and joy is in his eye!—

Oh! would that I were in my grave! and yet, I dare not die!"

"Begone! begone! I 'll hear no more!—I care not for thy tears!

Go!—get thee hence, then brood upon thy idle speech and fears!

Go teach thy brats to whine and fret! then wipe thy guilty brow—

Now hark thee, girl,—tears will not change an injured father's vow!

I leave thee to thy wretched fate—'t is just that thou shouldst feel

A portion of that torment I have nurs'd, and yet conceal! 'T is just that thou shouldst feel the sting of mis'ry's chast'ning rod!

Away! away! ungrateful wretch, I leave thee to thy God!"

He closed the door!—Bernalde's heart was steel'd to pity's call—

He paced his chambers' gloomy depth, then sought the festive hall;

But as the wind went whist'ing through each crevice and each crack

Bernaldo wish'd that he could bring his wretched daughter back!

The parent's heart forgave its child, when passion's reign was o'er—

And oft he wish'd, throughout that night, he had not clos'd his door!

She saw her father leave the porch!—a tear fell down her cheek;—

Her heart was full to bursting then—she did not dare to speak!

But there she knelt in secret prayer—while fast pour'd down the rain—

She pray'd that God would pity her; but ne'er did she complain!

She kiss'd her babes—she nearer press'd her infants to her breast—

Then laid her down upon that floor, where oft she 'd been caress'd.—

—The morning came—its feeble light upon her face was shed—

Her clay-cold form was sleeping there—the stricken soul had fled!

They found her—still her helpless babes were pillow'd there at rest,

Sleeping she sleep of innocence upon her lifeless breast!

—Bernaldo came!—he gazed—he scream'd—and fell upon the floor:—

One groan he gave!—he breathed her name!—but never spake he more!

MISCELLANY.

A STRIKING SITUATION. Be it known then, that I was one of a crowd of skirmishers who were enabling the French to carry the news of their own defeat through a thick wood, at an infantry canter, when I found myself, all at once, within a few yards of one of their regiments in line, which opened such a fire, that, had I not, rifleman like, taken instant advantage of the cover of a good fir tree, my name would have been transferred to posterity by that night's Gazette. And, however opposed it may be to the new system of drill, I will maintain, from that day's experience, that, the cleverest method of teaching a recruit to stand attention, is to place him behind a tree and fire balls at him; as, had our late worthy disciplinarian Sir David Dundas himself been looking on, I think that even he would have admitted that he never saw any one stand so fiercely upright as I did behind mine, while the balls were rapping into it as if a fellow had been hammering a nail on the opposite side, not to mention the number that were whistling past, within the eighth of an inch of every part of my body, particularly in the vicinity of my nose, for which the upper part of the tree could barely afford protection.—Kincaid's Adventures.

EXTRAORDINARY EXORDIUM AND PERORATION. A young man was produced in the Court of Sessions on Friday, as witness against a person charged with stealing a pair of shoes. He gave his testimony in the following manner, suiting the action to the word, and the word to the action: "May it please his honor the recorder, the honorable members of the common council, you gentlemen of the jury, and the gentlemen of the bar here present—I stand here to certify what I know of this man—I saw him with the shoes on."

N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

"NOTHING CERTAIN BUT UNCERTAINTY."—So said the Poet Daniel. The late Chief Baron Thompson, being at an amaze dinner, where there was a tipping dignity of the Church, remarked that the wine was very good. "Yes, my Lord, it is so," said the Clergyman, "and I think a certain quantity of such beverage cannot possibly do a man any harm, after a good dinner." "Oh, no, sir, by no means," replied the Baron, "it's the uncertain quantity that does all the mischief."

A BAG-PIPER AND WOLVES.—A Scotch bag-piper on his travels, opened his wallet by a wood-side, and sat down to dinner; no sooner had he said grace, but three wolves came about him; to one he threw bread, to another meat, till his provender was all gone; at length he took up his bag-pipes and began to play, at which the wolves ran away. "The deed saw me," said Sawney, "an I had kenn'd you lea'd music so weel, you should hae taen it before dianer."

The keeper of a Scotch ale house, having on his sign, after his name "M. D. F. R. S." a physician of the Royal Society asked him how he presumed to affix these letters to his name. "Why, sir, (said the publican) I have as good a right to them as you have." "What do you mean you scoundrel?" replied the Doctor. "I mean sir, (returned the other) that I was Drum Major of the Royal Scotch Fusiliers."

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

From the Hampshire Sentinel.
TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

ANNOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.
No. 5.

SIR—You formerly dwelt much upon your religious experience, and often detailed to your people your mental exercises. Your hope of heaven seemed to be unwavering, and your title to that blessed inheritance unquestionable. You often talked of your freedom from mental depression, and of the excellency and clearness of your spiritual views. You professed to have a conscience 'void of offence towards God and man.' There were no traces of secret sorrow in your countenance—no marks of deep, corroding grief—no symptoms of 'weeping in private' and 'groaning in spirit.' No, the colourless visage of the Elder was without a wrinkle, and the smile of self-approbation almost always played upon his lips. Now, Sir, let me inquire, if this were all pretence? Was this done because it is easier to talk of one's self than to discuss understandingly a foreign subject—because an hour could be consumed in egotistical remarks, with less previous preparation than any leading doctrine of our religion could be illustrated, or any urgent duty enforced? Is it true, that the 'undying worm' had coiled himself in your bosom, and was constantly stinging your conscience, while you so openly and so frequently proclaimed the most confident assurance of your adoption? You now declare, in the presence of God and your former hearers, that you 'wept in private' and 'groaned in spirit' during your Masonic delusion. That its atrocious wickedness often oppressed your conscience, and alarmed your fears, inasmuch that 'you could not sleep nights.' This, Sir, is another illustration of the maxim, that guilt, however wise in its conceptions, is always inconsistent in its executions. Memory reverts to this period, and recognizes it as the precise time when you were most lavish of self-commendations, and abounded most in proclamations of your own holiness. How can this monstrous inconsistency be reconciled, and your character for truth be preserved? Which story, Sir, will you have us believe? They are utterly irreconcilable, and convict their author of gross, and intentional, and deliberate prevarication. All avenues of retreat you have forever closed. No mistake, or misapprehension, or improper construction, or unenlightened belief, can be pleaded in extenuation of your offence. You confess yourself guilty of full knowledge of its wickedness, at the very first step of your progress, and that you deliberately persevered in ascending its dark and gloomy heights of enormity to their summit; and from the topmost stone spread out your hands, and hypocritically proclaimed, that it was unexceptionable and praiseworthy; that it was the 'handmaid of religion,' and the spotless fountain of virtue. Take your choice, Sir, of the horns of this dilemma. Were you in truth, regenerate, and a child of grace, when you so confidently talked of your title to the heavenly inheritance, were you honest in your professions at that time, and sincere in your declarations, then it follows with the certainty of demonstration, that you are now changed throughout your moral character, or, you stand convicted of misrepresentation and untruth. For you then said you maintained a 'conscience void of offence toward God and man,' and you now declare, that at that very period you were stung with remorse, that you 'wept in secret,' and 'groaned in spirit!' Are you honest in your latter declarations—is it true, that you 'groaned and wept secretly' when you boasted of your singleness of heart and sinlessness of life, then, indeed, you stand convicted, by your own confession, of gross hypocrisy. Could you, Sir, have been a Christian at that time? Do you pretend any moral change since? Is the same depravity that prompted you to raise your voice in solemn prayer in behalf of Masonry, present with you, inciting in you the same zeal and earnestness for her destruction? 'If the righteous scarcely be saved' where shall the changeling, the hypocrite, the traitor appear?—David Pease, the zealous Mason, and David Pease the zealous antimason, are as opposite in their characters as Lucifer in heaven and Lucifer in hell—as the sinless archangel at the right hand of the Majesty on high, and the same fallen spirit presiding as the prince of darkness. It is impossible, Sir, in the nature of things, that honesty and truth could have governed your conduct at both these periods. Take your choice of the times, and the conclusion remains the same. Hypocrisy, misrepresentation, wanton slander, and cold-blooded malignity, thickly cluster around either period, and together constitute a chaplet well fitted to adorn the brows of the preacher of sedition, the nullifier of promises, and the patron of moral treason.

You remarked with much apparent feeling, 'that you were astonished that you should ever have been pleased with a thing so trifling and nonsensical as Masonry, and that you should as soon think of studying Tom Thumb as a science.' Wonderful, Sir David! You astonished! I am amazed that you should be astonished at any thing. One would think that the chameleon changes of your life, and the crocodile affections of your heart, would have divested you of the capacity of being astonished, and would have prepared you to witness any inconsistency, or any degree of guilt, unmoved. You were pleased with it then, wicked, and trifling, and nonsensical as it may be. 'Hear Oh heavens, and give ear, oh earth!'—The illustrious Sir David Pease, late Most Excellent High Priest of the infamous order of Masonry, declareth and saith, that he was pleased with that wicked and abominable institution, and kindly affectioned toward its deluded and hapless votaries! The stars and ribbons which now 'glare in the distance,' and dazzle his vision, are more fascinating and attractive than the sober habiliments of Masonry. The M. E. High Priest may have heard the sound of the trumpet, and dreamed of purple and fine linen, but he will be astonished that he was ever pleased with a thing so outrageous and diabolical as antimasonry, before he arrive at this goal of his hopes. Periodical tirades and antimasonic contributions may partially supply the 'aching void,' but a day of repentance is inevitable, a season of earnest groans and tears is fast approaching. Hypocritical cants, and pharisaical groans will then avail little. The worm that never dies will spring into action and vigorous exercise. By the way, Sir David, do you remember asking a contribution from your people to enable you to preach to the destitute, and that you went post haste, to take further Masonic degrees? Do you recollect the regret of a pious old lady of your congregation, that she was unable to bestow more on this holy undertaking? What followed the disclosure of these facts to your people, you are left to relate yourself, or may employ the jackanapes who sometimes accompanies your lionship in the capacity of jackall. I refer to the worthy, and talented, and eloquent gentleman, who closed the farce here, by praying that Masonic vengeance might not overtake your reverence. 'The wicked flee when no man pursueth.' Sir, dismiss your fears, you are in no danger, a hair of your head will not be injured. Masons will avoid you as carefully as they do a certain other little spotted animal, that often rewards favors with wanton attacks, and kindnesses, with fatid aspersions. Disgust, unmingled disgust, is the only emotion they can consistently indulge towards your reverence. Paul shook from his hand, into the fire, unharmed, the deadly viper, so Masonry casts off this foul excrement. We should be happy to hear your edition of this story, especially if it be as ingenious and as true as your representations of Masonry. All I have the happiness of knowing is that you were soon found journeying toward the East, not, indeed, 'duly and truly prepared' to pass the Master's scrutiny, nor as yet 'properly vouched for.' This artifice, looks, I confess, much like being astonished—that you were ever pleased with this foolish thing—so does the fact that you travelled six hundred miles, to take the orders of knighthood—so, also, the fact, that you have taken successively fifteen or twenty degrees. A man does not often use duplicity to accomplish an object, or travel three hundred miles to gratify his desires, or approve the known wishes of his friends, unless he feel some interest in the undertaking, and expect pleasure or profit from it. I am astonished, Sir David, perhaps, as much so as thyself. I do, indeed, marvel that such a bundle of inconsistencies could be found among men. I think it wondrous strange, that any man of ordinary capacity, should be so far lost to duty and self-respect, as to wallow in such a slough of contradictions. It is to me utterly incomprehensible, how a man can claim to be honest and sincere and benevolent in his feelings, and philanthropic in his views, while every word and act contradicts and impugns the whole history of his former life.

'You would as soon think of studying Tom Thumb, as a science, as Masonry.' I am happy to discover any symptoms of sane mind and memory. We all will agree that Tom Thumb is eminently suited to your taste and talents. It is not to be expected that the capacious powers of your mighty mind could be concentrated on so 'trifling and nonsensical' a subject as Masonry. The elevated topics of discussion, and profound theories of Tom Thumb, are much better calculated to engross its wonderful faculties, and call forth its mighty energies. I commend you, Sir, to your favorite; study it with attention, consider it with candor, and applaud it with sincerity, for similarity of minds is a fruitful source of friendship.

Yours, &c.

AN ILL-TIMED MEASURE.—The Lockport antimasonic paper publishes a letter from Edward Giddins, stating his reason for running away during the session of the court at that place; which reason is, that his opinions on religious matters have undergone no change, and he did not wish to suffer the mortification [!] of being again rejected as a witness unworthy of belief. This is a shallow subterfuge. If he has no other reason, why does he and his antimasonic colleagues conceal the place of his retreat? The court has adjourned—why does he not return? The truth is, the sceptre has been wrested from the Morgan Committee; they have no longer the power to determine who shall and who shall not be tried—favoritism in these matters is at an end, and Edward Giddins fears the consequences.

But the disclosure of the fact that Giddins is yet in being, and that his absence is voluntary, has disconcerted the antics very much. They had just got an excitement under headway, to invigorate the flagging spirits of their dupes, and the wicked Masons were to suffer another scorching for carrying off and murdering Edward Giddins. We learn that quite a flame has been raised in some parts of Michigan. In this quarter there had been some emissions of smoke, and the managers were gathering fuel for a glorious combustion; but the letter of Giddins, like an untimely shower, has extinguished every glimmering spark and smothered the fire in its very embryo. Why does not the Gazette publish Giddins's vindication of himself.

MASONRY AND WASHINGTON.

The extraordinary persecution which has for a few years past, been carried on against the peaceable and unoffending Masons of this state, we have always considered of a character so hateful and malicious, so repugnant to the principles of our free institutions, that we have thought it necessary to say but little in relation to it, believing that the good sense of the people would discover that this unholy persecution, from whatever cause commenced, was continued only as a political machine to elevate to power, men, whose character or talents had not been such as to win for them the confidence and affection of the people.

We feel confident that we are not mistaken in our reliance upon the discernment of the people, and feel every assurance, that the day is not far distant, when any man, having pretensions to respectability and information, will regret his connection with this antirepublican attempt to persecute for opinion's sake. But some of our disappointed and desperate politicians, anxious to take advantage of the supposed majority of the antimasonic party in this county, in order to get into office, knowing the desperate situation of their cause, have attempted to bolster it up with the name and the sanction of our beloved and ever to be revered brother, George Washington. They have even gone so far in the very teeth of all history and knowledge, as to claim him as an Antimason !!!

They admit that General Washington was a Mason, but, assert, that long previous to his death, convinced of the pernicious principles of the order, he not only abandoned it; but denounced it to the people of the United States in the following paragraph of his farewell address, of 17th September, 1786.

'All obstruction to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under what plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force—to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation, the will of a party, often small but enterprising minority of the community; and according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans; digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.'

This shallow artifice can only impose upon the ignorant, for there is no one at all acquainted with the political movements of that day, or who has endeavoured to inform himself of the political history of his country, and must know that the allusion in the above extract from the farewell address, was to certain political societies, then formed and forming in this country, (after the example of some in Europe,) for the dissemination of principles and the support of measures not in unison with those of the then administration of the government.

CONVENTIONAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER V.

TO HON. JACOB HALL.

ONE OF THE SUFFOLK MEMBERS OF THE ANTI-MASONIC STATE CONVENTION OF MASSACHUSETTS.
SIR:

I suppose that an ambitious partizan, like an ambitious author, next to absolute praise, prefers absolute censure. The cold contempt of silence is the lowest grade in his scale of preferences. I shall not fail, therefore, to receive from you the acknowledgment of rescuing you from the mortification of silent contempt, and of advancing you one grade in your degrees. If I fail in setting forth your merits, I beg you to understand, that I have a strong disposition to do you ample justice, and, that a solution of the difficulty may be found in the infrequency of contemplating similar characteristics, and the novelty of using appropriate coloring.

It has been supposed, that your inefficiency, during the sittings of your Convention, was not wholly satisfactory to your associates, and that some demonstration was required from you, to show your attachment to the cause. Sir, you have redeemed your credit; at least, with your associates. Whether you stand better with the community, is quite another affair.

The distinguished part you took in the antimasonic celebration of the 4th of July 1830, in the prominent station of Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements and the unusual course adopted, to insure a decent show of attendance on that occasion, would be a sufficient apology, if apology were needed, for the distinction of addressing you on this occasion. You have the merit of harnessing yourself, manfully, to the car of antimasonry: whether you shall be able to draw it from the mire that surrounds it, remains yet to be seen. In what, Sir, do you perceive the fitness of celebrating the orgies of antimasonry on the birthday of American Independence? Did you, in your imagination, deem it necessary to cast a shade on the names of the sainted heroes who nobly contended for your liberties? Or was you so ignorant of the times, and of that glorious contest, as not to know that nearly every General Officer, in the Revolutionary Army, was a member of the Institution you so zealously defame? Surely, your hardihood must have outrun your discretion, or you would never have dared to venture on the experiment, to try how far the sons of those departed worthies would patiently bear the odium attempted, by you and your coadjutors, to be heaped on the memory of their fathers. For such base and unprincipled distinction, you may well claim a large portion of merit, for few, very few, will have the temerity to share it with you. In what, Sir, did you suppose, consisted the appropriate celebration of that august day? Was it by a recurrence to those principles of civil liberty, which we hold as our dearest birthright? Was it in contemplating, in the proud glow of patriotism, the energy, firmness and integrity of those self-devoted men who contended successfully for their rights, and secured yours? And what is civil liberty now, and what the rights of their descendants, that the best men, I say, Sir, the best men, should be publicly reproached with participation in crimes of so foul a nature as to be past endurance? Did you, Sir, verily believe, that the birth-day of our National Independence was to be appropriately celebrated, by indulgence in heated passions and other apposite stimuli? Still, in the contemplation of that gross outrage on the feelings of a respectable portion of the community, there is one gratifying consideration; that although you and your congregated coadjutors celebrated your political, antimasonic festival in Boston, in the old cradle of Liberty, you were compelled to import Colonel Pliny Merrick to do the dirty work to which no decent man in Boston would descend.

But, Sir, you have entitled yourself to some degree of notoriety in another affair: I mean the very peculiar circumstances attending the taking the deposition of Mrs. Bell. No one could, for a moment, have supposed, that he, who had held the grave and honorable station of Executive Councillor, would so readily assume the office of Inquisitor, in conducting an investigation founded on gross, detected falsehood, and attempted to be bolstered into some degree of decency by the extorted and distorted testimony of an agitated, unsuspecting, and almost friendless woman. Under other circumstances, a less disgraceful transaction might have exposed you to a degree of inconvenience sometimes witnessed, as a proper reward to those who promote neighborhood gossip and village scandal. You may deem yourself particularly fortunate, having gone through the experiment, in all its details, and escaped public disgrace, through the lenity of the parties concerned. You may congratulate yourself with having the low and disgraceful merit of intruding on the quiet of private life with impunity. Of the worthless men who assisted you, little else could be expected; and their participation, in an infamous affair, occasioned no surprise, as their agency was in keeping with their characters. Your anxiety to sustain the detected and exposed imposition, commonly called 'the Belfast murder,' will not soon be forgotten; and the names of Samuel G. Anderton and Jacob Hall will be associated, as long as honorable ambition could desire, and longer than your honorable recollections will require.

It is somewhat remarkable, that the fiery zeal you discover, to correct the moral abuses of Masons, should be kindled wholly on the evidence of abandoned seceders, who, by their own declaration, commenced their honest work by a violation of moral obligation—by the most degrading treachery. You presume, you take it as conclusively proved, that the whole body of Masons are guilty of crimes, on the declaration of such men as Pliny Merrick and Moses Thacher—men who have violated their faith to their old friends, and stipulate for credit with their new friends, by the humiliating declaration of their own infamy. Among a band of outlaws, such events might be supposed to occur; for the proof of moral depravity would be a passport to criminal confidence. In the ordinary affairs of life, you might perceive how dangerous it would be to place much reliance on the declaration of those who measure the quality and amount of their testimony, with careful exactness, to the equivalent by which they are to be compensated. Sir, the price of treachery, the reward of perjury, takes all that variety of shape and coloring which can influence passion, pride or ambition. The paltry modicum that pays a worthless, degraded being, by furnishing the temporary means of sensual gratification, has no temptation for those who grasp at distinctive titles and honors. Nor could the glittering bauble of temporary distinction influence him whose highest enjoyment is found in the quieting preparation that steeps his senses and his conscience in forgetfulness. Although the particular motive which should operate on Pliny Merrick and Moses Thacher, should fail to influence Samuel G. Anderton, still, each have their price—the equivalent remains. To one, an honorable name, without the reality of honor: to another, a stimulating equivalent truly, but whose temporary influence has passed away; while the honors of the third are not yet gathered. I say, Sir, the equivalent remains. The draught that intoxicates the senses of one, and the prospective honor that intoxicates the imagination of the others, have their equality of influence, and produce their equality of result, in the same measure of self-degradation and violated faith. Moses Thacher has gathered his honors, Samuel G. Anderton has received his reward, and Pliny Merrick impatiently awaits his moment of remuneration.

It was reserved for your anomalous association to show how shameless may be the terms of a combination of men, and yet how far that combination may be tolerated in an orderly and well regulated community. In almost any other country, where public sentiment and popular feeling should be as grossly outraged, as by the unwarrantable measures of your association, public justice would have put in operation an influence which would long since have lowered the tone of your proceedings. We boast of civil liberty. It is indeed carried to the very verge of licentiousness. The political gamblers of the day find security in the forbearance of a free people. The impunity of public disorganizers, is part of the price which the people pay for their rights. It is the shameless license of associations, such as that to which you have attached yourself, that gives the first intimation of the necessity of distinguishing between liberty and licentiousness. Liberty! What can be his attachment to civil liberty who outrages its very first principles, by an attack on that free charter God has placed in the breast of every man, to exercise the right of private judgment! What can be his abhorrence to licentiousness, who openly forms association with men of equivocal integrity and doubtful morals; men who defame and persecute others as far above them in moral purity, in private worth and public confidence, as in disposition to resort to their disgraceful measures!

I am, Sir a Freeman and a Freemason.

THE MEETING.

He that spitteth against the wind spitteth in his own face.—DR. FRANKLIN.

We wonder if this has not recently entered the minds of certain persons who are over anxious to enlighten the good people of Boston on the subject of Masonry; or, in other words antimasonry. After repeated meetings of disorder and confusion, what has been accomplished? What new light has been thrown upon the subject, and how much nearer prostrated are the Masons now than before? What disclosures have been made that could not just as well have appeared in print, and thus saved these riotous proceedings? In fact, I know of nothing, with the exception of Mr. Dexter's letter, that has not already appeared. If those opposed to the institution, have any thing to offer worthy of consideration, every person whose opinion is worth having, will weigh it according to its merits, and it matters not to them by what medium it reaches them, whether by the press or by a public meeting. Is not this all the antimasonry want? I suspect this is rather a hard question. Reasoning, will not take with the mob, and some measures must be taken that will. Hence meetings must be had.—But the difficulty does not end here. It is well known that there is not a man who has espoused the cause here, of decent talents as a speaker; and but little more can be said, as a writer, or a man of talents and influence in any way. It is necessary to resort to neighboring counties and states to supply the deficiency. And after all this 'toil and trouble' what are the advantages derived from it? Are they commensurate, gentlemen, with the trouble, time, expense and vexations it has caused you? Do you believe that the Citizens of Boston, or of Massachusetts will be any wiser or better for what has recently taken place? I would ask the Rev. gentleman who has figured in this business, if he does not some times feel a thrilling sense of degradation at the idea of a professed minister of Christ's so far prostituting his clerical dignity as to take a part in the low and disgusting business of producing a mob? I say producing because there would have been none, had there been no meeting called; and, as was before observed nothing was disclosed, but what might just as well have been done in print. It is well known that in every community there are numbers who delight in such exhibitions, and who are always ready to take a part almost any way, for the sake of what they emphatically term a row; and we are not among the number who think—(it may be singular) that any great advantage is to be derived from them. I would ask Mr. Dexter if he cannot find any better business than to travel from Michigan and assisted in these periodical fermentations; and whether as a lawyer,—a judge and a gentleman, he can find no business more dignified and profitable than apouting to a mob? Has anything been seen on the part of Masons in Massachusetts that make such measures necessary or proper? Are there not intelligent citizens enough in our own State who are not masons, that are capable of watching over their own rights and interests, and of seeing what those rights and interests are, and of sounding the alarm when they are invaded or trampled upon? If we were actually in danger, it would be very kind in foreigners and interlopers to come to our assistance; but when the trumpet has been sounded, and echoed and reechoed, until nearly all respectable people are sickened and disgusted with the sound, it would seem an act of clarity and of honour at least—if not of decency, to let us remain quiet for a time. We believe it to be a mistake into which some very good people seem to have fallen, in the idea that the good citizens of Boston, renowned for their intelligence and patriotism, are incapable of taking care of themselves, and are obliged therefore to send to Michigan and other places for assistance. To such however as have volunteered their kind assistance, we would return our grateful acknowledgments, and beg them to give themselves no farther trouble until requested by persons of some talents, character and influence. There are in this place no persons who have enlisted in the antimasonic ranks to take an active part, of any just pretensions to either; and those who come among them from a distance must have rather poor optics—a low estimation of themselves, or they would be ashamed to be seen in and more especially to court such company.

But let us turn our attention to the 'considerations' of the meeting. In the first place they were unfortunate in the selection of their chairman. Secondly, in that of the speakers, and, Thirdly, in the cause in which they were engaged. The first had not sense enough: the second, not life enough—pretty important requisites for the successful management of a cause. The chairman was waspish and scolded considerable, and did not appear to possess ease, dignity and grace, and those conciliating manners as well as patience with which we have sometimes seen the chair filled. The latter he will learn no doubt by taking a few more lessons. I said the speaker had not life enough. To this however there was one exception. On Tuesday when the noise and tumult was such that no one could be heard, Mr. Williams (who by the way is an excellent judge of West India Goods) rose, pale as a sheet, his eyes in a 'fine phreny rolling,' his features much distorted, his hair as stiff as porcupines' quills, his gestures and emphasis to correspond when such a volley, nay such a torrent of eloquence never before proceeded from the mouth of man or beast. It was spoken feelingly, and Cassius would say, neither wanted 'action or utterance.' I did not before suppose that the man had so much grammar in his head.—I will not pretend to give the words, for I know no one could do them justice. It was eloquent, differing altogether from that of Cicero, Demosthenes or Webster; but no less original, or difficult to describe. He sat down nearly exhausted, trembling as though he had half recovered from a fit of the ague. Mr. Walker, the everlasting Amasa Walker, who is spoken of as the next best among the speakers, and who delivered a speech on the first evening, I did not hear. It was not however his fault, for on Monday evening after Mr. Ward had attempted unsuccessfully to be heard for half an hour, Amasa jumped from his seat; modestly and politely beckoned to Mr. Ward to give him the floor. He then came forward with a dozen or two of most bewitching bows, a graceful flourish of the hand, and a countenance beaming with intellectual treasures, in which attitude he stood for some minutes; but, to the astonishment of all, the tumult continued as loud as ever. He attempted to proceed, but in vain; and we were left to conjecture, (as in the case of the Martyr in the justly celebrated and popular Tragedy of Bombastes Furioso,) what he 'would have said,' provided the villanous Masons had let them proceed.

With regard to Mr. Ward, there can be but little doubt that he might on Tuesday have proceeded without molestation had he been content to confine himself to the question. But the recollections of the evening previous rankled (as Mr Hayne would say) in his bosom, and a few strictures must be thrown out. This, which a very little magnanimity would have overlooked and forgotten, had the effect, as might have been foreseen, to excite a corresponding organ, and in a moment the hall was in an uproar, which continued until the meeting was finally dissolved.—Thus were the citizens of Boston deprived of the light which he would otherwise have communicated—I am no Mason, and attended with an earnest desire to hear what he had to say; but when he left his subject, and descended to let off a little bile, I felt but very little sympathy for his fate. He will return to New York, we presume, satisfied that it is not always expedient, whatever may be the inclination, to attempt to 'spit against the wind'. Towards the others, we felt but little more sympathy at their total discomfiture. We believe that the goodly people of this metropolis are quite as well satisfied that honest and intelligent Masons should fill some offices in our government; as that they should be occupied exclusively by those who so disinterestedly wish to take them into their own hands; but we trust that they will not be slow to avail themselves of their kind proffers whenever they shall be satisfied it is for their own advantage so to do.

Mr. Brown in his history of the antimasonic excitement gives us the episode of one Thomas Hamilton, whose history affords an apt illustration of the state of the public feeling. He pretended to be acquainted with the particulars of Morgan's death, and that he was afraid of being assassinated in consequence by the Masons. At first he appeared in the character of a Methodist preacher, and levied some money on the good people of Batavia. When this imposture was worn threadbare, he went about declaiming against Masonry, and soliciting charity at the same time. He was afterwards taken up and imprisoned as a vagrant. He came out of prison, of course, a martyr, and his antimasonic labours prospered exceedingly.—'Deacons and elders of the church,' says Mr. Brown, 'united in prayers for his safety, and the name of Hamilton was echoed and re-echoed throughout the land.'

After one of his lectures at Avon, in the county of Livingston, he unfortunately got so drunk, as was frequently the case, that he was supposed to be at the point of death. It was forthwith given out that he was poisoned, of course by the Masons; the antimasons cried out that he was a martyr; the antimasonic papers echoed the cry, and the whole country rung with this new and bloody tragedy.—Unfortunately for the great cause, Hamilton slept himself sober, and departed the next day for Buffalo. A few days after his arrival, the body of one Norman Fay, who had been drowned in Tonnewanda creek, was found by some of the neighbors, and decently buried. Hamilton had disappeared in Buffalo, some little time before. During this seclusion, the body of a stranger had been discovered, as just related. It was immediately rumored that it was the body of the unfortunate Hamilton, who, having escaped poisoning, was at length drowned by the Freemasons. A concourse of people proceeded to the place where poor Norman Fay had been buried; the body was disinterred, and underwent a close examination. What might have been the decision in this case is doubtful, if Hamilton had not just at the moment crawled forth from a grog shop, where he had remained in riotous privacy, besotting himself all this time.

Hamilton shortly afterwards departed for the county of Ontario, where he was received into the house of a zealous antimason, upon whose daughter, a girl nine years old, he attempted a rape, and closed his career in the cause of morals and religion, in the state prison at Auburn.

The alleged object of Masonry, (although there is no truth in the allegation) constitutes the pretended ground of opposition to it—that is the mark upon his forehead which bids the anties slay it. Suppose for a moment that Masonry be political. What is antimasonry, and if it should prevail what shall it benefit the public? Antimasonry is openly and avowedly political. If, therefore, Masonry be destroyed by antimasonry, you only destroy one political engine, while you raise up in its stead another of ten times the power and danger. To use a trite expression, it would be 'jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire.' Fellow citizens, think of these things ere you cross the Rubicon.

'Employment is the guardian of female innocence; do not allow women to be idle; let them be the first dressed and the last undressed all the year round.'

'The pearls and precious stones, the silk and glory with which a coquette so studiously bedecks herself, are as transparent varnish, which make all her defects the more apparent.'

MASONIC MIRROR.

Letters purporting to have been written in 1798 by General Washington to a certain Reverend Mr. Snyder, of Fredricktown, Maryland are pompously paraded in the antimasonic papers, as though they were to work miracles. Now suppose for a moment that the letter be genuine, (a matter, by the bye, that we have reason to doubt, both on account of the multiplicity of forgeries that are daily issuing from the antimasonic presses, and of the character of the gentleman to whom it is said they were written.) what do they show? Why they show that in '98 Washington did not preside over a Lodge, and that he had not been in a Lodge more than once or twice for thirty years, but that, notwithstanding, he believed that none of the Lodges in this country are contaminated with the principles ascribed Illuminati—that individuals of them might have been.

Now we have merely admitted these letters to be genuine, for the sake of argument, and if they were genuine, they evince on the part of General Washington the opinion, that Masonry had nothing to do with the Illuminati, but that some individual might—and so might professors of religion—ministers of the Cross—for there have been in both, traitors and hypocrites—even among the chosen twelve there was a Judas. But we do not admit that they are genuine—we believe they are forgeries; because, as we said before, forgeries are issuing daily, and almost hourly, from the antimasonic presses—because the declaration ascribed to Washington that he was not in a Lodge more than once or twice in thirty years, is not in accordance with his subsequent declarations, or with known and established facts, and because we believe that Snyder is not a man of such a character as General Washington would correspond with.—As it regards the last point, we shall endeavor to be better informed hereafter; but in the mean time, we beg leave to ask of the Examiner a question or two, which we suppose it may be enabled to answer.

Is, or is not, this Mr. Snyder, the same Reverend Gentleman who formerly lived in Albany, and preached in one of the churches in that city, but in consequence of——was dismissed by his congregation?

Is he, or is he not, the same gentleman who afterwards preached in Fredricktown, and was dismissed by his congregation?

Who succeeded the Rev. Mr. Snyder at Fredricktown?

This last question is asked, not out of any disrespect to the successor of Mr. Snyder, but merely for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Examiner be acquainted with at least some part of the history of the Rev. Mr. Snyder.—Rep.

General Washington's replies to the addresses of Masonic Lodges were dictated rather by politeness towards the addressers, rather than by any sincere regard he felt for Masonry!!

We have not the Examiner at our command, at this moment, but we believe the above is the sentiment, if not the precise language, which it used last week. When we read it we were somewhat surprised; for the Editor of that paper, in his editorial columns at least, has thus far conducted himself with a degree of liberality and gentility, not often found, if ever, with antimasonic Editors, and we were therefore expecting better things from him. What is the meaning of it, giving it the fairest construction? Why that General Washington was a HYPOCRITE!! that he used language and expressed sentiments that he did not feel!!!

Washington was no such man. He was an honest man. He spoke as he thought, and his thoughts were wise. If we could be brought to believe that he was a hypocrite—that he wrote and spoke sentiments from POLITENESS, that he did not really feel and entertain, instead of revering his memory, we should despise it, for a hypocrite we do most cordially despise. Washington was a Mason—an ardent and zealous Mason, up to the hour of his lamented death. He never filled any office, or joined any institution, the principles of which he did not understand, or the duties of which he did not assiduously perform, it is therefore idle, foolish and slanderous, to say that he did not understand the principles of Masonry, and that he did not perform its sacred offices. Masonry is founded upon just such benevolent and pure principles—inculcates just such doctrines, and leads to just such results, as the mind and heart of that great and good man would be likely to adopt, advocate, approve of, and promote.—Lan. Rep.

FRANKLIN COUNTY.

WHAT HAS BECOME OF ANTIMASONRY? This question has been repeated so often that it has become rather stale. We have lately conversed with several brother Jacks from different towns, who assure us that antimasons have but little to say. Those who belong to that party from principle, are not materially affected by the movements of partizans of any hue; and they remain friendly to all, except a certain species of two-legged wild animals, who endeavor to annoy them, by calling them Jacks. But instead of a reproach, they consider this a title, which only serves to distinguish them from the inferior race by whom it is bestowed, and with whom they would otherwise be chronicled. As for antimasonry, it is where it always has been. It consists of nothing more than an opinion, that all secret societies are liable to become injurious to the well being of social society and republican government, and in a temperate opposition to them, as secret societies. These antimasons, however, have recently been denounced by those who wish to go the 'whole hog.' They wish to raise the sword of persecution; to carry their avowed principles into every election, and rigidly exclude every man from office, who will not zealously advocate their cause, swear to every falsehood they utter, and hunt down and vilify every man who cherishes a doubt as to the piety, purity and perfection of poor Sam Anderson.—These, the real, no mistake, political antimasons, have been so very fortunate as to receive into their ranks, some very pious clergymen. One has been lecturing in many places, whose former villany is yet fresh and green in the recollection of the public;—another has been in a neighboring town, who renounced Masonry to appease his antimasonic society;—and another might perhaps be found, at one time annoying his neighbors by occupying their firesides and reading their newspapers, and at another preaching, for the compensation of a half bushel of potatoes, or riding about the country, with a half-starved horse, creating discord in society, dragging out a miserable existence, heartily despised by all men of high-minded and honorable principles. This is too well known to require further explanation. The names of any of these reverend worthies, it would not be proper here to mention. They are at present held sacred. They are, and should be, unanswered and unanswerable riddles. But we seriously believe that the infatuation which has been manifested on this subject is rapidly subsiding, and that reason and common sense will once again be restored to its deluded victims.—Freedom's Sentinel

CHARACTER.

CHIEF JUSTICE PARKER.—Many of the Boston Clergymen, Sunday before last, noticed, with suitable reflections, the sudden death of the late Chief Justice Parker. The following paragraphs are from the discourse of Rev. Mr. Young; and were first published in the Christian Register.

A pillar in the temple of Justice has fallen, and the people mourn. They mourn the loss of one who sprung from the midst of them;—a man emphatically the child of the people;—whom the people ever delighted to respect and honor; and who during a long juridical career, devoted to their services, with singular diligence and fidelity, the rich endowments of superior mind, and the extensive acquirements of laborious study. They mourn the sudden prostration of a Magistrate whose integrity was not only without reproach but beyond the reach of suspicion; whose impartiality was neither warped by personal preferences, nor by the artificial distinctions of society where independence never covered before the clamors of a faction or the menaces of a sect; and whose judgment of truth and right was never dazzled by the splendid fascinations of forensic eloquence. Forgetful of himself, the Chief Justice lived only for the Commonwealth, and at last died a victim on the altar of public duty. He has gone bequeathing nothing to his family but his good name and the memory of his virtues. To the people he has left a precious legacy; the sanctity of the ermine unallied by a single stain, and the recorded decisions of his legal wisdom. The people conscious of the loss they have sustained in the removal of such a Magistrate, are emulous to do honor to his memory, and, to a man, rise up, and with one voice pronounce him blessed.

When such a Magistrate falls, the people mourn. For an impartial, incorruptible Judiciary, is the palladium of their liberties; the safeguard of their personal rights and domestic blessings.—What the Bench remains uncorrupt and independent, we can afford to have sometimes an imbecile Executive or an ignorant Legislature. What we have an intelligent, upright, impartial Judiciary, we may smile at the scramble of aspirants for office and scorn the denunciation of blustering demagogues. Having the fruits of their labors guaranteed to them by the sovereignty of the Courts, the mass of the people may sit down under their shadow, in peace and security, having none to molest or make them afraid. But let the breath of suspicion stain the purity of judicial integrity; let partiality and corruption gain admission to our Courts, and the 'pillared firmament' of public security and private happiness totters to its fall. It matters not, whether we live under a republican or a monarchical form of government, if we have not a high-minded, fearless, incorruptible Judiciary, our liberty is but a name and a shadow. When, therefore, one of the learned expositors of the Law, one of the watchful guardians of their rights is taken away, well may the people mourn. The Chief Justice was taken away suddenly, and, some will say, prematurely. He was cut down before age had wrinkled his brow, or furrowed his cheek, or blanched his hair. Yet it should be remembered that 'honorable age is not that which standeth in length of time, nor that is measured by the number of years. But wisdom is the gray hair unto man, and an unpotted life is old age.' He did not alas, live long enough for the affection of his family, for the satisfaction of his friends, or for the good of the community. But he lived long enough for glory; long enough for the great end of human existence, the trial of principle and the formation of character. His life was filled up with useful and honorable labors. And when death called, he found him at his post. He died, as every wise and good man would wish to die, devoting his unimpaired faculties to the service of his fellow-men.

The awful suddenness of this afflictive event has invested it with peculiar interest. It speaks to us in solemn tones of our insecurity, and bids us be also ready. But yesterday the Judge was seated on the bench, invested with all the majesty of the laws, surrounded by wise counsellors and eloquent advocates, and the accused were arraigned before him in anxiety and awe, to stand trial for their lives. To-day, he is himself gone to appear before a higher tribunal, to answer for himself at the bar of Heaven, to give account of his own life at the judgment seat of God. Brethren, it is a solemn contrast. Language cannot depict it, nor render the simple thought more impressive. May we be incited by it to fill up our lives with usefulness and virtue. Let us remember that a good life is the best preparation for death, and that we can never die too soon, if we are prepared to die. Let us be useful and worthy, and we shall die respected; our memory on earth will be precious, and our reward will be great in heaven.

SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

From the New York Courier.

STEAM BOAT FUEL.—Since the introduction of Steam Boats, Pine wood has rapidly disappeared from the shores of our navigable streams, and the scarcity of this article, has necessarily enhanced its value. All who have reflected upon the subject, have long since been satisfied that the time is not far distant, when coal must be substituted for wood; and the question has been asked, what coal can be produced which will ignite sufficiently easy, to produce steam as fast as required? Repeated experiments have been made with the Anthracite coal, but without success. Within the last month, the Sydney Coal from Nova Scotia, has attracted the attention of the navigators of our steam boats, and the result of their investigations are such as cannot fail to give satisfaction to all who wish to see navigation by steam prosecuted at the present reasonable rates.

The first experiments were made in the small Steam Boat used by the Dry Dock Company, in towing vessels to their railway. We were of the number who witnessed the result of this experiment, and were astonished to find, that without any alteration in the furnace which is used for wood, a fire was kindled of this coal with a common lamp, which in about a half an hour enabled the boat to get under way, and then supplied as much steam as could be used. It was believed by all, even the most sanguine, that with an ordinary wood furnace, the draught would not be sufficient to generate steam as fast as required, and their astonishment and gratification at the result may be easily imagined.

In consequence of the first attempt, the agent of the Mining Company in this City, proposed to Capt. Bunker, of the Benjamin Franklin, to take in a supply of coal and use it instead of wood on his trip to Providence and back. He did so, and became so satisfied not only of its practical usefulness, but of its superiority over wood, that he endeavored at once to have his furnace altered for the purpose of using it to more advantage. It was found however, that the time required for altering the furnace would compel the boat to lose so many trips that it ceased to become an object to use it during the present season. All furnaces constructed for burning wood, are necessarily larger than would be required for coal, which is so much less bulky, and consequently the blaze is too far distant from the bottom of the boiler. To remedy this evil it is only necessary to raise the lower part of the furnaces now in use.

The facility with which this coal ignites, and its consequent capabilities of producing steam, having been fairly tested, the next question is—What are the advantages to be gained by introducing it into general use? We answer, first the great saving in room occupied by the fuel: second, by the saving in the cost of fuel: third, by the saving in the weight of fuel: fourth, by the saving in labor in handling the fuel and feeding the furnace: and fifth, by the absence of sparks and cinders, by which the clothes of passengers are destroyed, and the awnings of our boats set on fire.

We give the following as the result of the different experiments which have been made:

One chaldron of Sydney coal measures 44 cubic feet.

One cord of pine wood measures 128 cubic feet.

One chaldron of coal will jet as much water into steam in the same space of time, as three cords of pine wood.—Supposing the Benjamin Franklin to require 45 cords of wood per trip, to and from Providence, the space thus occupied by wood is 5,760 cubic feet. Fifteen chaldrons of Sydney coal will produce the same quantity of steam in the same period of time, and occupy but 660 cubic feet, or about one ninth of the space required for the wood!

The wholesale price of Sydney Coal,

New York measure, is per chaldron, $ 9 00

The wholesale price of 3 cords of wood at $4, is 12 00

This will show a saving in the cost of fuel in favor of Coal, of $3 1-2 per cent, or of $55 00 on every trip to Providence!

One chaldron of Sydney coal New ton wt. gr.

York measure, weighs 1 2 1

One cord of pine wood weighs 1 2 3

The weight of the Franklin's wood, therefore, is 51 tons 5 cwt. If she used coal, her fuel would weigh 16 tons 13 cwt. and 3 qrs.!

The coal being less bulky, will require a less number of persons to handle it, and the saving in this respect, added to the safety of awnings and the clothes of passengers from sparks, will be far from inconsiderable.

We have neither time nor space to pursue this subject to-day, but consider it of so much importance that we shall refer to it again at our leisure. The only really important question which ever could rise in relation to coal—that is, will it generate steam sufficiently fast? has been satisfactorily tested, and this being the case, the value of it for steam navigation is apparent to the most casual observer.

SAFETY PUMP.

For detecting and removing the noxious gas found in wells. Invented by the Rev. J. F. Schroeder.

Having particularly examined into the advantages that may result from this improved pump, it being given to the world without an application for a patent, or any reward whatever, by its scientific, ingenious and humane inventor; we cheerfully recommend it to the notice of our citizens. It may be useful for ventilating sick rooms, churches, and crowded assemblies, by constantly pouring into them a current of fresh air, and expelling at the same time that which is impure and rendered unhealthy and offensive by being breathed through the lungs of the audience.

A new well, in the rear of Union Church, at the north-east corner of Orange and Spring streets, in this city, was infected with a most deadly gas. On Friday, July 16th, a man attempting to descend into it, was instantaneously deprived of life; and a few moments afterward, another shared the same miserable fate, in an attempt to rescue his unfortunate companion. On the following Tuesday morning, the Rev. Mr. Schroeder, in company with some friends, visited the melancholy scene of the calamity. They found the well, by actual measurement, to be thirty nine feet deep. On lowering a lighted candle into it, the flame, when it was six feet from the surface of the earth, was suddenly extinguished. Impure air, it was inferred, occupied the remaining space of twenty-five feet below.

The safety pump was placed on a bench near the mouth of the well; a conduit, attached to the inhaling pipe, extended to the bottom of the well; and another conduit, ten feet long, attached to the exhaling pipe, extended to an adjoining vacant lot of ground.

The pump was then worked. Some of the vitiated air was obtained in a glass receiver, placed at the end of the exhaling pipe; and by the application of the usual chemical tests, this vitiated air was proved to be carbonic acid gas, or what is commonly termed choke damp.

The safety pump had been in operation for the space of seven minutes, when a lighted candle was again let down; and the flame was not extinguished until it had descended nearly twelve feet further than before. The safety pump was then worked again for ten minutes; and the candle, being then let down to the very bottom of the well, burned with a clear flame. In seventeen minutes, all the deadly gas had been entirely expelled.

This experiment was made before a company of gentlemen, one of whom, Dr. Stephen B. Whiting, after the above operation of the safety pump, went to the bottom of the well, and remained there for a time, without any injury or inconvenience.—N. Y. Lancet.

EXTRACT OF PENNYROYAL.—Farmers might easily save the flesh of horses and cows, and confer great kindness on their animals in preventing the usual annoyance of the flies, by simply washing the parts with the extract of pennyroyal. Flies will not light a moment on the spot to which this has been applied. Every man who is compassionate to his beasts, ought to know this simple remedy, and every livery stable and country inn, ought to have a supply at hand for travellers.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 4, 1830.

TRIUMPH OF PUBLIC OPINION.

The peace of the city of Boston has again been disturbed by a brace of antimasonic missionaries! The sanctity of the birth-place of American freedom has again been profaned by the presence of a combination of civil and political disorganizers, whose aim is the demolition of the temple of our religious and political rights: by the unhonored panders of a banditti, who, with the spirit of demons, would blot from earth one half the human race, that they might rise to temporary power and infamous notoriety.—Yes! one of the most disgraceful scenes that ever occurred in the city of Boston, was enacted in ‘Old Faneuil Hall’ on Monday evening and Tuesday morning last! We there saw the first fruits of the infernal spirit of antimasonry; we there saw the monster in his hideous deformity; and a disgusting, loathsome object he appeared. Our citizens did not like him, and they exercised the right of freemen to express their dislike. If they exceeded the bounds of strict propriety, in the expression of their resentment for the indignity offered to them, they nevertheless exercised greater forbearance than any other equal number of people on earth could have done under similar circumstances. They were publicly insulted; their fathers, their brothers and friends were abused and slandered, and charged with the commission of the most damnable crimes on the catalogue of infamy! The sepulchres of the honored dead were profanely thrown open, and the memories of the illustrious of other days, vilified and traduced! Bostonians could not quietly listen to this. The spirit of indignation was aroused, and it burst forth. For the consequences, those who called it forth are responsible. The antimasonic cabal of this city were the cause, and they must answer for the effect. We took no notes of the proceedings; and shall not, therefore, attempt to give a report of them. A concise statement of facts, as they occurred, is all that we shall attempt, and all that is necessary to a proper understanding of the subject.

It appears from the best information we have been able to collect, that a man by the name of Ward, the reputed editor of an obscure scurrilous pamphlet printed somewhere in the state of New York, in company with a fellow of the name of Dexter, a kind of political antimasonic missionary from Michigan, arrived in this city, the early part of last week. To afford this brace of worthies an opportunity to exhibit their persons and talents before a Boston audience, their antimasonic brethren called a public meeting at Faneuil Hall on Thursday evening following their arrival. At this, Doctor Abner Phelps presided, and Mr. Amasa Walker played the part of Scribe. The question proposed for discussion was, ‘Can any man under the influence of Masonic oaths, discharge with fidelity the duties of any important office in the gift of the people, according to the true nature of our free institutions?’ Perhaps a more ridiculous question was never proposed for public discussion. It was not entitled to one moment’s consideration; and the proposers of it must have taken the people to be as great blockheads as themselves, or they would not have presumed to have offered it for public consideration. To show its total absurdity, it is only necessary to put it in its proper shape. It should read, ‘Has any man, while under the influence of Masonic oaths, discharged with fidelity,’ &c. In this way the question ought to have been proposed. Any man, not absolutely non compos, can see its absurdity, and the ridiculous fallacy of calling a public meeting to discuss it. It is only necessary to appeal to the history of the past for a satisfactory answer. Did not Washington, and Lafayette, and Warren, and Franklin, discharge their public duties with fidelity? If Masons have discharged the duties of office with fidelity, no man, except he be an antimasonic political office seeker, will be foolhardy enough to contend that they cannot do it again. But, to return to our subject—JOHN W. WHITMAN, Esq. opened the discussion, in the affirmative. He stated that he appeared there on his own responsibility, and contrary to the wishes and desires of his Masonic friends. He contended for the constitutional rights and privileges of all classes of his fellow citizens; objected to foreign interference and foreign dictation, and thought that ‘Boston Boys’ could manage their own concerns without the aid of political judges or political jugglers. And be it known that the first indication of disturbance and opposition proceeded from the antimasons themselves. Indeed, if they did not make all the disturbance, they were the original cause, and must answer for the consequences. They have attempted to throw it upon the Masons; but, no Masons were concerned in it. There was no occasion for them to take any steps in the business, if they were so disposed. The community was for them; and what had they to fear from the puerile efforts of a band of miscreants, without talent or weight of character to sustain them? We repeat it, the Masons took no part in the discussion or in the disturbance, except the part Mr. Whitman voluntarily and unsolicitedly took in the debate, nor is it necessary that they should give themselves any uneasiness about the calumny that the miserable clan of anties in this city may attempt to cast upon them. The people have now come forward to protect them in their rights as citizens and as men; and Masons may pursue the even tenor of their way, regardless of the yelpings of antimasonic puppies. Mr. Whitman was followed by the Mr. Dexter above named, who attempted, for the nine-hundred-and-ninety-ninth time, to read the awful history of the very awful fate of the monstrously awful Morgan! But the citizens would not hear him: they could not restrain their feelings of indignation, while such a man was slandering their friends and neighbors. How very uncivil! Mr. Walker, the Scribe, next rose to enlighten the unlettered multitude of this our benighted city. He prated a little about Masonic charities, and was hissed down! In the midst of noise and tumult, the meeting was adjourned to Monday evening.

On Monday evening the hall was filled at an early hour. The Reverend Moses Thacher, rose amid the shouts and hisses of the citizens assembled, and opened the debate. Though he spoke very loud, it was difficult, in consequence of the noise, to hear him. He stated that he had taken several Masonic oaths; but forgot to state that, he took them on the Holy Evangelists, and called upon his God to witness the sincerity of his heart and the purity of his purpose. He acknowledged that he had violated those oaths; and he therefore stood before the citizens of Boston, guilty of moral perjury! Is it strange then that they would not hear him? that they hissed and hooted at him? His dishonored title of Reverend could not shield him from the indignation of honest men. He sat down amid the contemptuous sneers of an insulted people. Mr. Whitman followed, and in a strain of cutting satire, occupied the meeting for nearly an hour. He handled the Reverend seceder without gloves; without much respect for his surplice or his official dignity. He said that he made no sectarian or party distinctions; that he had respect for men of all parties, even for the antimason, if he were honest. He would trust his life with the Mason, with the orthodox, the unitarian, or the antimason. He would trust his life with any of his fellow citizens, except the seceder! Here some one on the floor rather uncivilly called upon the Reverend Parson to hold up his head! This was an unkind cut; for if the Reverend gentleman felt ashamed of his face, charity required that he should be permitted to hide his head. After Mr. Whitman had concluded his remarks, Mr. Henry Dana Ward attempted to address the meeting; but he met with no better success than did his coadjutor, from Michigan. The people would not hear him. They would not listen to foreign dictation, nor did they stand in need of foreign counsel.—The hallooing, shouting, stamping and hissing at this time, was tremendous. The citizens had heard enough, and they would hear no more. A dissolution of the meeting was called for, and carried. It was doubted, however, and the chairman declared the meeting adjourned until the next morning at 9 o’clock, remarking that those who were in favor of the object of the meeting could attend, and those who were opposed to it could stay away! The citizens however, chose to act their own pleasure in this particular. Bostonians will not submit to the dictatorial mandates of Doctor Abner Phelps, or any other man of equal eminence and notoriety.

Agreeably to adjournment, a considerable number of citizens assembled at 9 o’clock on Tuesday morning. H. D. Ward again took the floor. He had not fairly taken his stand before the noise commenced. The citizens were determined not to hear him, at any events; and the sound of his voice was lost amid the uproar, the hissing and shouting which ensued. Old Faneuil Hall, for the first time, and we trust in heaven that it may be the last, was made to vie, in ‘confusion of tongues,’ with the Babel of antiquity.—Bostonians, who have been stigmatized by antimasonic poltroons, as Jacks, saw the consecrated hall where their fathers first raised the voice of American Independence, prostituted to the seditious purposes of a proscriptive faction; and, moved by the proud spirit of freemen, they indignantly resisted this insult. They used no violence; but they boldly told their foreign advisers, that the city of Boston was not the place for them; and they must not come to teach Bostonians their duty; that they were not slaves and did not require task-masters. This language the gentlemen from ‘parts unknown,’ would not understand. They obstinately and impudently persisted in their purpose until the citizens were nearly excited to open violence. To avoid the consequences of such an event, they despatched their emissaries to the Mayor of the city, to solicit his aid in suppressing the apprehended riot. The Mayor very properly told them to return and dissolve their meeting, and assured them that the people would then disperse satisfied. They objected to this on the ground that it would give triumph to the other party! The Mayor replied that he knew nothing of any party; that the hall was not granted for party purposes. He then repaired to the hall; on entering which, the Chairman, a Doctor Abner Phelps, requested that he would take a seat by his honorable side! The Mayor, with his usual politeness, declined the intended honor, observing that he preferred to stand where he then was, if it were equally agreeable to the gentleman! The Mayor then addressed the meeting; stated the manner and object for which the hall had been procured, and declared that so long as he held a seat at the Board of Aldermen, he would never again consent to its being granted for a similar purpose! This declaration, though a death-blow to antimasonry in this city, was received with great applause. He then advised an indefinite postponement of the subject before the meeting. The Chairman evinced much anxiety to take the vote on the main question, and made an attempt to do so, but could not succeed. The Mayor again interceded and requested, or rather required the Chairman to put the question for a dissolution of the meeting, remarking that there was no chance for him to gain a single proselyte, for public opinion was against him! This had a terrible effect on the little band of patriots shut up in the square box! However, the worthy Chairman thought it better quietly to submit to the necessity of the time; and he accordingly put the question called for, which was carried by a large majority. The vote was doubted, however, and the Chairman gave it as his opinion that it was not a vote; but for the sake of peace he was willing to let it go as a vote! The citizens would not receive it on such terms, and demanded to have it again put, on which it was carried by a majority of twenty to one! The antimasonic disturbers then took themselves out of the hall, amid the hisses and shouts of an indignant and insulted people. Thus ended this infamous attempt to proscribe and disfranchise a large and respectable class of the community.

We are credibly assured that the hall was procured through fraud and deception. We do not speak unadvisedly when we say that several of the individuals who signed the petition to the Mayor and Aldermen, signed it, under false impressions. They had not the most distant idea that they were petitioning for the hall for antimasonic purposes. They would not have done so, had they been correctly informed; and we have very good reasons, for believing that the word anti was intentionally omitted in the petition at the time it was presented to certain gentlemen for their signatures; and that it was subsequently added. We are well assured that one gentleman, at least, signed it under the impression that the meeting was to be a Masonic meeting. We do not believe that there are one hundred persons, (the requisite number of petitioners to procure the hall,) who would be willing to present their names to the Mayor and Aldermen of the city of Boston, in the character of antimasons.—It is a disgraceful faction; and though many political aspirants may be willing to profit by the weakness and folly of the credulous and superannuated, but few are willing to hazard their characters on the success or failure of so infamous a cause. The party never was of any consequence in this city, and it is now morally certain that it never can be. It has sunk into its native slough; and neither Michigan eloquence, nor New-York erudition, will be able to revive it.

These men profess to be influenced purely by patriotic motives!—Love of country!! Disinterested patriotism moves them onward!!! There was nothing sinister in the recent disgraceful meeting! There was nothing to be gained by producing an effect abroad! True it might answer very well to proclaim in the Convention at Philadelphia, that 'the citizens of Boston in public meeting assembled, had declared that Masons are unfit to hold any public office!' This would have sounded very well, though there might not have been anything to gain by it! And it might too have possibly answered to introduce into the contemplated Philadelphia antimasonic address to the people of the United States! But thanks to the intelligence and integrity of the citizens of Boston, the base designs of these political miscreants have been defeated. Ay, the people of Boston have given the death-blow to antimasonry. The fact cannot be concealed.—'The people have done the deed:—not the Masons. One Mason only appeared to oppose them, and to shield old Faneuil Hall from the disgrace that threatened it: the hall where British tyranny received its first wound; and where the seditious faction of antimasonry has received its quietus. We repeat it, one Mason only opposed them: he met them, single-handed; and notwithstanding the hisses, noise and abuse of the antimasonic rabble, he sent them home wreathing under the effect of his lash. The most dishonorable means were restored to, to embarrass him and to put him down; and some paltrons, near the throne of anti-ism, went so far in their show of desperation, as to call upon their friends in the gallery to throw him over! We have no doubt that had they the power, they would have sacrificed his life! But the citizens, men whom the anties designate by the degrading appellation of Jacks, were for him and ready to protect him. Mr. Whitman, as before observed, opened the first meeting, and the vials of antimasonic wrath were emptied upon his head: he was abused and insulted. Is it strange then—was it not to be expected—that when his opponents took the floor, that they should meet with some opposition? Or did the political disturbers have the vanity to believe that public opinion was all on their side? The truth is, they threw the first stone, and they have suffered the consequences of their own folly and indiscretion. We shall not probably ever again witness such another disgraceful scene in this city. Antimasonry has here had its day. Its reign was short and infamous. Its partizans will not dare again to outrage the feelings of the citizens of Boston, by a public declaration of their proscriptive, and anti-republican principles. They have been literally kicked out of Faneuil Hall, covered with dishonor, hooted at by the boys, and barked at by the very dogs!

The Tremont Theatre will be opened on Monday evening next, with the Soldier's Daughter: on which occasion Mrs. Russell will make her first appearance in this City, as the Widow cheerly. During the recess, the House has been elegantly fitted up, and the Manager has engaged a very good stock company. It is said that much novelty will be introduced during the campaign.

THE NEW-YORKER.

The late meetings at Faneuil Hall were attended by some circumstances of a character altogether new to Bostonians. Our own good citizens formerly assembled there, in times of high political excitement; but the meetings were not disgraced by disorder; they had no dictator, in the form of a foreign mountebank. Parties have, in former days, gone to the very extreme of their rights, but never eventuated in violence; for no bold intruder thrust himself upon the notice and patience of the people. Discussions, of an exciting character, have been continued with great pertinacity; but never before did a vagrant vender of confusion and disorder, attempt to tell the inhabitants of our city who they should, or who they should not choose, to fill the offices in their gift. Common sense might seem to dictate that the question itself was sufficiently inflammatory, without importing an itinerant teacher of antimasonry to carry it down. And the movers and promoters of this affair as much mistook the character of our people as did the British troops at the shutting up of the port of Boston, if they supposed our citizens could submit to be bridled and bitted and saddled, for the triumphal entree of a wandering quack-politician. Mr. Henry D. Ward, supposing himself qualified to direct our good people 'in the way they should go,' arose, and in an oratorical attitude put forth his hand, intending to put forth his sentiments. But the voice of 'the sovereign people' was above the voice of Mr. Henry D. Ward. 'What is his name?' cries a Stentor. 'Ward!' replies another. 'Where does he come from?' says a third. 'From New-York!' says another. 'Down with him!' cries an Ajax. 'Hurra!' vociferates the mob.—But there stood Henry D. Ward, calm, collected, and immovable—with the curl of contempt on his lip, and a lurking devil glistening in his eye. 'Mr. Moderator!' says Ward. 'Down with the Yorker!' says the mob. 'I came from New-York!' says Ward. 'Back, back, back,' says the mob.—'Go and hold forth to your own people,' roars out one. 'Go and dragoon the Knickerbockers!' says another. 'Douse his peak!' bellows out a tarpawling. 'Touch up the leader!' thunders out one of the white frock gentry. 'Dust down dat ere genman's coat,' says one of the dingy hue. 'Hurra!' cries the mob. But there stands Ward—his eye in a fine phrenzy rolling.—His was no picture of 'Patience sitting on a monument;' but his eye spoke out as if his lips would say, 'dogs—curs—I will humble you yet.' The uproar increased. Ward seemed determined to proceed. The mob determined that he should not proceed. Groans and hisses came from all quarters. At length Ward's insolence gave way, and he sat down. 'Hurra, nine cheers,' shouted the multitude; and nine cheers shook the Hall to its foundation.

Mr. H.D. Ward will now return to New-York wiser than he came. He has learned a lesson, in Boston, which he will not soon forget. He has seen with his own eyes and heard with his own ears, that the spirit of '75 is not wholly extinguished, and that Bostonians know how to resist an invasion of their rights, whether it comes in the shape of a foreign army—or a foreign mountebank.—ARUNDO.

From an article in the Transcript of Tuesday, we make the following graphic description of the scene in Faneuil Hall, on Monday evening:—'All was in fine pickle, and the people kicked and squirmed like a parcel of vinegar eels in the focus of a microscope. It was all rough and tumble, heads and points, toes and ears—the Yorker wouldn't take—down with these riot-breeding seceders'—'poke them into a hand-cart'—'tip 'em into the dock'—'give 'em a ride on the Roxbury artillery.' There were groans and moans, and sighs and cries, and shrieks and squeaks, and whistles and war-whoops, till the pictures of the fathers turned pale, and the bust of the venerable sage looked over its shoulder to see if there was any way to back out. The moderator, who did any thing but moderate, was in as big a puzzle as a bull in a 'pothecary's shop. He put it to vote whether the Yorker should be heard. He said there was 8 to 1 in his favor—that dose wouldn't go down—the rest of the folks said there were 20 to 1 against him. In fact, there was no physic that would take—all sorts of sweats had been tried, cold, warm, and washes—the folks were in as high a lather as a sweating doctor could wish—their very whiskers were taken off with the heat, moisture and friction; and still, the disease baffled all medical skill. We have had two doctors hold of the case here, but they can make nothing of it—the disorder runs so many ways, and puts on so many symptoms, that their brains can't keep up, and the books afford them no knowledge.'

FALL OF ALGIERS.

This event is universally regarded as one of the most important in the history of the present century. The piratical band which for ages has been the terror of Christendom, is effectually destroyed. The barriers which have for centuries obstructed all intercourse with the interior of central Africa, are removed. A new field for the cultivation of christianity is opened. Who then is not gratified by the success of the French army?

The Commercial Gazette furnishes a brief synopsis of the contents of the Liverpool papers, received at this port on Sunday last, by which it appears that 'the last intelligence received at Paris from Algiers is dated the 7th. The French government had received positive information that the treasure found at Algiers would pay the expense of the war. It was understood that the regency would be given up to the Porte, on condition that the Sultan engaged for the suppression of piracy, and changed the governor every four years at least. It was not believed in the highest political circles that there was any question of a colony. It had been officially announced that 1500 pieces of artillery in bronze, more than 30 ships—such as frigates, corsairs, &c.—the arsenals of war and the marine, provided with arms and munitions, and 55,000,000 of francs, fell into the hands of the French forces at Algiers. The greatest tranquility reigned in the city of Algiers at the last accounts. and the most cordial friendship existed between the French and the inhabitants: the latter treated their conquerors as liberators, and so considered them. The Algerines had estimated their loss at upwards of 10,000 men, killed and wounded; and that of the French, in killed, wounded, or disabled from various causes, was computed at between 4000 and 5000—of this number the killed and severely wounded amounted to about 1200

FRANCE.—The recent news from France represents that country in a state of great political excitement; the Ministers had sent a representation to the king of the turbulent state of affairs; and a revolution is anticipated. The liberty of the press has been suspended. A Decree has been promulgated, directing the new elections to be made in a manner said to be contrary to the provisions of the Charter, and very much limiting the right of suffrage.—The editors of the newspapers and other periodicals in Paris, had a meeting on the promulgation of the Decree, suspending the freedom of the Press, and with but one exception had agreed to disregard the Decree. This looks rebellion.

THE DEY OF ALGIERS.—A Paris paper says the Dey of Algiers studied the Koran, &c. more than the art militaire. When one observed to him that he should not have permitted the French to land quietly, he replied, 'but how would you have had me take them, if I did not allow them to come?' One day seeing through a telescope a battalion firing with the front rank kneeling as usual, he said—'Look at them, they are asking quarter! Courage, children of Mahomet!' At another time, beholding them march in close order, as if bound together, he said—'It is then true that the French are making war against their inclinations, and have been chained together in order to force them to fight!'

MARRIED.

In this city, Monday, Aug 29, by the Rev. C. P. Grosvenor, Mr. Edmund M. Daniels to Miss Mary A. Follinsbee; Mr. Charles Spooner to Miss Almira Tracy.

THE WREATH.

THE CYPRESS WREATH.

(By Sir Walter Scott.)

O lady, twine no wreath for me,
Or twine it of the cypress tree!
Too lively glow the lillies light
The varnish'd holly's all too bright,
The May-flower and the eglantine
May shade a brow less sad than mine:
But, lady, weave no wreath for me,
Or weave it of the cypress tree!

Let dimpled Mirth his temples twine
With tendrils of the laughing vine;
The manly oak, the pensive yew,
To patriot and to sage be due;
The myrtle bough bids lovers live,
But that Matilda will not give;
Then, lady, twine no wreath for me,
Or twine it of the cypress tree!

Let merry England proudly rear
Her blended roses, bought so dear;
Let Albion bind her bonnet blue
With henth and hare bell dipped in dew;
On favoured Erin's crest be seen
The flower she loves of emerald green—
But, lady, twine no wreath for me,
Or twine it of the cypress tree.

Strike the wild harp while maids prepare
The ivy meet for minstrel's hair;
And, while his crown of laurel leaves
With bloody hands the victor weaves,
Let the loud trump his triumph tell;
But when you hear the passing bell,
Then, lady, twine a wreath for me,
And twine it of the cypress tree.

Yes! twine for me the cypress bough;
But, O Matilda, twine not now!
Stay till a few brief months are past,
And I have looked and loved my last!
When villagers my shroud bestrew
With pansies, rosemary, and rue,
Then, lady, weave a wreath for me,
And weave it of the cypress tree.

MISCELLANY.

From 'Anecdotes of Napoleon,' a work recently published.

The seat of the celebrated family of Montmorency was by Napoleon converted into a place for the reception and education of the daughters of the officers killed in the service. Early after his return from Elba, he visited the institution—as soon as the young ladies heard of his arrival, they rushed forward en masse, to testify their gratitude to their munificent benefactor. It was in vain that their guardians and instructors entreated, even threats did not restrain this natural flow of affection; they were therefore abandoned to the unrestrained demonstration of their feelings, and the Emperor, oppressed and overwhelmed, burst into tears. Relieved by this gush of feeling, he mingled with the delighted crowd—embracing some, and yielding his hand to the kisses of others. Emboldened by the familiarity, his young proteges began by rifling him of his pocket handkerchief, which was immediately torn into ribbons and then subdivided among the anxious applicants, and while occupied in caressing those in front, a party in the rear literally curtailed, with a pair of shears, several inches from the bottom of his grey surtout, to all which he submitted with heart-felt delight: and on regaining his carriage, his feelings overcame him and he was again in tears—endeavoring to conceal them with his hand, he was overheard to say, 'voici le cembale de bonheur—ceux-ci sent les plus beaux moments de ma vie!' 'This is the acme of bliss—these are the happiest moments of my life.'

PURE WATER.—The following simple mode of examining a well, to ascertain whether it contains any offensive substances calculated to make the water impure, is recommended by the Hampden Whig; 'Place a common mirror over the well in such a position as to catch and throw the rays of the sun directly to the bottom of the well, which will instantly be illuminated in a manner so brilliant that not only the smallest articles such as pins, needles, spoons, knives, &c. can be distinctly discerned, but also that the smallest pebbles and stones at the bottom can be as effectually examined as if they were held in the hand. The sun is in the best situation to be reflected in the morning or afternoon of the day.'

Lord —, whose wife lay extremely ill, was disturbed in his studies by the entrance of her maid, who informed him her mistress was a dying, and desired to see him. 'Child,' said he, 'tell your mistress that I took formal leave of her yesterday.'

A Genoese lady was questioning one of Tuscany on the number of her lovers. 'Just at present,' replied the Tuscan, 'I have but one.' 'But one,' ejaculated the other—'what solitude! what ennui! why, it is just like a husband.'

A FRENCHMAN PUZZLED.—A Frenchman who had not been long in this country, wanted to purchase a pair of black unmentionables, but could not tell how to designate the material. At length he inquired of his tailor, 'what name do you call de devil besides de devil?' 'Beelzebub.' 'Eh bien, Beelzebub breeches! No,' 'Lucifer.' 'Eh bien, Lucifer small clothes! No,' 'Satan.' 'Ah oui, yes—I want a pair of black satin breeches.'

TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

RENOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.

No. 6.

Your detailed to your hearers certain oaths, and affirmed them to be Masonic oaths, and professed that you had voluntarily assumed their obligations. I had supposed that I knew something of Masonic obligations, possibly as much as your reverence, saving the secrets of the female degree, and I never took, or heard of the obligations you cited, except in Bernard's book. Where, Sir, did you first discover them? When did you take them? Is not the source of your information the same as mine—Bernard's revelations? I do not believe that you ever took them, and I defy you to produce the man that ever did take them. You and I know, that there is no such obligation in Masonry. It is a foul fabrication, invented to subserve your fouler purposes—a vile imposition, intended to mislead the undesigning. It is idle for you to pretend that any such obligation is or was administered in New-England Lodges, Chapters, or Encampments. You dare not face an honest Mason, and assert it, for baskneyed as you are in the ways of your party, 'conscious blood would mantle in your face,' and convict you of falsehood. You thought proper to cast an anchor to the windward. You said Masons would abuse and revile you; ah, that they were bound, without distinction of rank, or degree, to traduce and defame the seceder. Show me your authority. Your assertion does not excite even a doubt. The man, that can deliberately misrepresent, and wilfully misconstrue, is entitled to no credit. Produce, then, your evidence. I take issue with you upon this point, and affirm that your declaration is untrue. I tender you Sir, Bernard's far famed Light on Masonry, this sacred cannon of the Anties, and challenge you to sustain your doctrines even by the aid of that. I will rest the controversy upon the decisions of this book, and what more can you ask? This forestalling the opinion of your hearers was perfectly unnecessary. Why tell them Masons were bound by an oath to do, what every honest man would do? Why make them swear to transfer after him the traitor's character, which every body abhors? Why make them swear to derange the business of the miscreant, in whom there can be no confidence? Why make them swear to refuse their fellowship to the wretch, who proclaims his own infamy and glories in his shame? An oath to do these things can impose no new obligations on fair minded men. They would of course proclaim the traitor, avoid the perjured apostate, and 'deny communion' with the infamous defamer. The best feelings of our nature recoil at the presence of such men. Every honorable sentiment, every kindly affection, every ennobling emotion is shocked by near proximity to such villainy, and shrinks from its touch as from the scorpion's sting, or the aspen's bite. You mistake, Sir, in attributing the abhorrence honorable men manifest at your approach, to the obligations of an oath. It is their habitual love of virtue, and their utter detestation of hypocrisy and Phariseism, that prompts such general contempt and scorn. The pitiful changeling, who to-day extols to the skies, Masonry, and incurs censure and opposition in courtting bet favors, and to-morrow, slanders and traduces it, and condemns it as infamous and vile, richly merits the contempt and scorn of honest men. And let him disguise his real motives as he may, and conceal the cloven foot by the Pharisee's broadest phylactery, and pocket the 'filthy lucre,' the wages of his corruption, and pray and weep and profess, as much as he please, his high merits will receive their appropriate reward from the unprejudiced and discerning. I rejoice Sir, that you manifest so much sensitiveness; it is evidence that some remains of conscience are left—that the landmarks of truth, and virtue, and justice, are not entirely forgotten. Derive all the consolation you can, from the implicit confidence of my good grandmother, from the yielding audacity of silly matrons and maids, and from the gullibility of an ignorant and bigoted and prejudiced rabble. Rest assured Sir, that no man of sense, of discernment, of common discretion, and ordinary prudence, will accord to you either his respect or confidence. You have woefully mistaken the road to popularity, which you indirectly confessed, was the governing motive of your secession. Your ballast is not heavy enough to outride the storm. Submersion in the waves of public obloquy and oblivion is your inevitable destiny. Gather around you, then, the folds of your garments, and sink quietly to rest, in the broad ocean of everlasting infamy.

And now Sir, let us read for a moment the obligations of Bernard's book, and see the fairness with which you cite authority, and the conclusiveness of your reasoning from that authority. It is immaterial to the issue between us, whether I regard these revelations as true or false. I agree to submit the point in question to the determinations as true or false. I agree to submit the point in question to the determination of that book, and will abide judgment. You say that Masons are under oath to bring to the most condign punishment the revelators of their secrets, and affect to have great fears for your own life. I join issue with you on this point, and say they are not so bound. The only authority you cited in support of your position, was extracted from the obligation belonging to the degree of Thrice Illustrious Order of the Cross, as given by Bernard. Do you know any thing of that degree? I do not, and of course am not bound by its obligations. There is, therefore, one Mason, who is not bound to bring you to punishment, and the part I have taken in exhibiting your character is perfectly voluntary, and for the public good, without any private end in view. Do not, therefore, impute it to the force of obligations. What is the language of the book? 'You further swear, that should you know another to violate any essential point of this obligation, you will use your most decided endeavors, by the blessing of God, to bring such persons to the strictest and most condign punishment, agreeable to the rules and usages of our ancient fraternity; and this by pointing him out to the world as an unworthy vagabond, by opposing his interest, by deranging his business, by transferring his character after him, wherever he may go, and by exposing him to the contempt of the whole fraternity and the world, but of our illustrious order, more especially, during his whole natural life.' You quoted the above correctly, but why did you not cite the whole obligation? Why detach a part, and give it a meaning, and an authority, it was never intended to bear? You were aware that if you should cite the whole, he that 'had but half an eye' would see through your shallow pretences. Is it honest Sir, in relating a fact to suppress the most material part? Does it comport with your views of clerical rectitude, to cite half a text, and convey a meaning directly the reverse of the whole? Let us read something more of this obligation.—'For the future then, you promise to be a good man, and to be governed by the moral laws of God, and the rules of the order, in always dealing openly, honorably, and above deceit, especially with the Knights companions of the order.' 'You promise so to act with all mankind, but especially with the fraternity, as that you shall never be justly called a bad pay master, a liar, a rake, or a libertine, a man careless in the business of your vocation, a drunkard or a tyrant.' 'You promise never to engage in mean party strife, nor conspiracies against the government or religion of your country, whereby your reputation may suffer, nor ever to associate with dishonorable men even for a moment, except it be to secure the interest of such person, his family, or friends, to a companion, whose necessities require the degradation at your hands.' 'You promise to act honorably in all matters of office, or vocation.' 'I swear forever to renounce tyranny and oppression in my own person and place, whatever it may be, and to stand forth against it in others, whether public or private; to become the champion of the cross, to observe the common good; be the protector of the poor and unfortunate; and ever to observe the common rights of human nature without encroachment, or permitting encroachment thereon, if in my power to prevent or lessen it; I will, moreover, act in subordination to the laws of my country, and never countenance any change in the government, under which I live, without good and answerable reasons for so doing, that ancient usages and immemorial customs be not overturned.' Why, I again ask you, did you not cite these portions of the obligation? Because they would have negatived conclusively your positions, and drawn down upon your head the contempt of the deluded friends of seceders. You dare not present to them the whole truth, for every honest man then, would forever abandon your interests and party. The moment the whole truth shall beam upon the minds of the excited multitude, Antimasonry will die. Its vital food is misrepresentation and suppression of truth. Let them know Masonry as it is, and the demagogues who have acquired a temporary elevation, will sink into their native slough, and filth and wretchedness shall again embrace them, and the world be at peace.

The mass of men are honest in their motives. They may, indeed act from mistaken views, and often do, but at the time of action, they are sincere. Not so with the seceder, the vile betrayer of his trust, the traitor to his best friends. There can be no mistake in his case—he acts deliberately and from choice, having full knowledge of the grounds of the controversy. The multitude listen to his disclosures; and receive as truth, form their opinions and shape their conduct by them. Did the multitude know, Sir, as well as you do, the whole merits of this controversy, you would be received by them as you are by those who do know them. The finger of scorn would be pointed at you wherever you should go. Contempt would greet you at home and abroad, and your just deserts be liberally recompensed. Your apostacy, methinks, has not been crowned with that splendid eclat which you imagined. Instead of being hailed as a reformer, and kindly greeted as a second Luther, you are compelled to preach your heresies in obscure corners and bye-places—instead of walking in triumphant processions, boldly unfurling the banner of Illumination, you often sneak to the place of your exhibition under cover of darkness, and retreat from it amid the peltings of the pitiless storm. Instead of receiving an honorable support, you gladly pocket the pence and farthings given you as the wages of corruption, the vile compensation for apostacy. Yours, &c

CONVENTIONAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER VI.

TO THE SUBORDINATE MEMBERS, AGENTS AND OPERATORS OF THE SUFFOLK DELEGATION TO THE ANTIMASONIC STATE CONVENTION OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Having noticed some of the individuals associated with you, in your enterprise against an Institution whose purity is as unattainable by you as its principles are incomprehensible to you, I may have raised some expectation of further, particular address. Some of the reasons which have influenced me, in the resolution to desist, would not, if named, be comprehended; or, if comprehended, would not be of a very flattering character. However desirable it might be with you to obtain notoriety, even on these terms, there are considerations of self-respect which sometimes deter men from entering on a task which would otherwise command their hearty good will. It has seemed to me, that it may be unkind and impolitic to proceed. On one hand, it would be as unkind to break in upon the repose of your obscurity, as it would be, on the other, impolitic to give consequence to you by an increase of infamous notoriety. Besides, a further pursuit of this subject would be as disgusting and offensive to me, as it would be undesirable and unwelcome to you. For these, and other good reasons, I shall desist.

It is worthy of remark that, among your members, hardly an individual was found during your Convention, who had capacity to make a decent speech, or even to alter a sentence, without betraying his gross ignorance of ordinary rules, or exhibiting his broad vulgarity. Indeed, without extensive importations of partizan declaimers and mercenary exhibitors, you must have made but a poor show of diversion for your followers. Intellectual entertainment would have been wholly out of place. That would not have been comprehended: it was not, therefore, attempted. To inexperienced children, and an uninformed rabble, you did indeed get up an attractive amusement. It would be hard that, in failing in the quality of your spectators, you should also have failed in their numbers. The loungers, the idlers, the loiterers of our City, owe you some return of gratitude for their entertainment, and, on any such occasion, will again honor you by their presence and punctual attendance.

The imported managers of your State Convention probably found you sufficiently tractable, and submissive to their purposes and dictation. The master-hands, that touched the secret springs of the political machinery, controlled your motives to great admiration. It was a memorable, moral spectacle, to watch the precision of your passive movements. The quiet, unobtrusive, yea-and-nay voters, who raised their hands at the nod of their masters, and patiently listened to the under-managers who retailed the gross abuses set down in their prescribed lessons—they may well claim distinction among you. It was well for you to be silent. You obtained by that silence some credit of worldly wisdom.

‘There are a sort of men, whose visages
Do cream and mantle, like a standing pool;
And do a wilful stillness entertain,
With purpose to be dressed in an opinion
Of wisdom, gravity, profound conceit;
As who should say, I am Sir Oracle,
And, when I open my lips, let no dog bark!
I do know of these,
That therefore only are reputed wise,
For saying nothing.’

Persevere in your gravity; maintain your silence—and preserve your credit. Your obscurity may still form your safety. That shadows and darkness are most congenial to Point, if you can, to one single act of Great Britain that your wishes, and favorable to the success of your operations, is too palpable to require remark—too apparent to elicit your denial. It has even been said—such is your love of darkness—that three of your number, on three successive nights, in the month of June last, assumed the honorable and manly business of eves-dropping. Owing to the forbearance of those they so grossly insulted, they escaped the appropriate reward of their honorable employment. They did not receive a substantial application, not soon to have been forgotten!

Among the bold charges made against the Masonic Institution, it was not supposed you would hazard a suggestion of its bad influences on morals. I know not whether such an allusion should be most admired for its boldness, or detested for its hypocrisy. It is compassion to admonish you, in justice to your friends, let your future labor be confined to the care of your own reputations. It was not imagined that any consideration, touching purity of moral character, would form an item of your deliberations. But prudence is a little regarded as other moral virtues; and falsehood readily aids the work of bold, unblushing impudence. Moral character! Swear to it. Become compurgators to each others excellencies. It is better to become than to sink at once under public scorn. The character of assassin and destroyer becomes you; and it is in keeping with your vocation, to drag others down to the moral level of yourselves. The plotter of treason may, among the band of his fellow conspirators, hope to lose his individuality in the multitude of his coadjutors; but still he is a traitor. And he who invades the sanctity of private opinions—the right of private judgment—whether associated with two men, or two hundred men, must be held equally criminal and equally amenable. But you are known; and therefore, your slanders are harmless, and your efforts to injure others unavailing. Could you hope, that without the merit of private reputation, public influence, or even honest intentions, you could successfully operate on public feelings so as to produce any movement in your favor? Our community is too intelligent, and too strongly wedded to principles of integrity, to become extensively excited by a knot of intriguers as obscure and as little respected as you are. Take advice; if not from me, at least from experience. You have learned that your theatre of action is not among the intelligent and respectable part of the community. There, your operation produce disgust and contempt. Return to your accustomed scenes of action: still be great men in the degraded ranks of low life. When your unnatural hopes lead you from your appropriate spheres of operation, remember that you are highly privileged even in being tolerated among the better classes of society.

I have now done with your Convention; and could I hope that my desire would operate in your favor, I would leave you this, my parting wish: that, for your misdoings, you might become sincerely penitent; and that you might hereafter discharge, with faithfulness, the duties of quiet and peaceable citizens.

I am, truly, an enemy of proscriptive measures, and yours.

FANATICAL WICKEDNESS.

A general notice was given to our citizens that a ‘great meeting’ was to be held, in Faneuil Hall, on the evening of Sept. 2d, for the discussion of the following QUESTION!

‘Can any man, under the influence of the Masonic oaths, discharge with fidelity the duties of any important office in the gift of the people, according to the true nature of our Free Institutions?’

I know not how others viewed the announcement of this question for public discussion; but for myself I can say that it produced a feeling of indignation which words would be inadequate to express. The call of the meeting excited no wonder, or surprise, for we have good reasons to expect propositions from the antimasonic party of the most DESPICABLE CHARACTER, for the promotion of their designs. But that our CITY GOVERNMENT would sanction such a meeting by granting them the use of Faneuil Hall, is to me a matter of great surprise! Were they so destitute of reason and reflection as to suppose that a large portion of the most respectable and useful members of this community could be slandered, and their characters stained by the foulest imputations of wickedness with impunity? Did they suppose that the MASONS were so destitute of friends as to be obliged to suffer INSULT of the most aggravating degree, in having a question even announced, which struck at their HONESTY and MOTIVES, and then to have the disgraceful proposition peaceably and quietly discussed; as though there were some doubts as to the RIGHT SIDE of SUCH A QUESTION? Did they suppose that the GOOD SENSE of the PEOPLE would soberly answer a question which was in itself an INSULT, and more filled with the ingredients of PERSECUTION and INJUSTICE than ever were the ACTS of Great Britain over this country before the Revolution? Did they suppose that a proposition to disorganize society and disfranchise some of our best and most honorable men, to cast the vilest imputations upon the illustrious dead, would be received by the public as one of an ordinary and unimportant character? Did they suppose that Fathers died without leaving sons to protect and sustain their reputation, or that our GOOD MEN were not regarded of some value to the people? IF THEY DID—may GOD grant them in his abundant MERCY, a speedy restoration to reason! IF THEY DID NOT—why was FANEUIL HALL allowed to be DISGRACED by the opening of such a meeting? If they granted the prayer of the petitioners without asking the purpose for which it was to be used, may they learn hereafter to perform their duty without neglecting to consider the only prominent point of a request.

The Hall was opened, the citizens assembled, the question was stated—RIOT was the discussion! And in this case RIOT was argument and reason, it was common sense, the answer of an insulted and indignant public! The voice of the assembly was taken, time after time, and trampled under foot by the conscientious chairman. He had not only the boldness to open such a meeting, but the audacious wickedness to persist in its diabolical designs. He and his restless GANG, for they deserve no better language, probably thought it very strange that they could not meet in a peaceable manner and quietly abuse their neighbors, and even propose to take away their sacred rights! Who are these men that dared propose such a question for public consideration? Are they American born? Have they been educated in the principles of Liberty and Equal Rights to all men? Have they been taught Religion or Morality? Have they been public subjects of disgrace, and become insensible to the power of shame? Have they no kind regard for kindred or friends, or society? We are told many of them are honest men! They may be honest, but most wofully deluded! Indeed, I pity them from my very heart. The judges that condemned the witches in Salem were honest men, and they were pitied! Heavens! rake the earth and sea, from the centre of matter to the centre of space, and you cannot find an object entitled to one half so much pity, as the man who is driven from the cradle to his grave by the storm of prejudice, and is made the tool of designing demagogues; John D. Williams, Thomas Walley, Benj. V. French, Amasa Walker, Jacob Hall, Henry Gassett, permit me to tell you that it will be for your own peace and credit, health and profit, to renounce all connexion with the antimasonic party and mind YOUR OWN BUSINESS! You have no right, and YOU OUGHT TO BE ASHAMED OF YOURSELVES even to think that you have, to encourage, by your patronage, PROFESSIONAL SLANDERERS, who meet a number of times every week to devise means by which they can circulate falsehoods, disturb private and public peace, abuse their neighbors, and try to rob society of its choicest jewels! Did you ever read the History of the cause of our Revolution?

hears any comparison with your damnable acts, and propositions? Redeem yourselves, for God's sake, before you sink beyond the reach of all creditable assistance. Your party have some honest, well-meaning men, no doubt, but they are to the party what three grains of wheat are to three bushels of chaff, and are as capable of redeeming it from deserved waste and destruction. I AM A FREEMASON, and a citizen enjoying all the privileges and rights our constitution guarantees. Dare any one of you presume to take them from me? Try it one, try it ALL, "and damned be he who first cries hold, enough."

It has been said by some of your body, that 'we do not war against Masons but against Masonry.' Profound deduction! Prodigious discrimination! Is Masonry made of wood, or stone, or brick? Is it a tangible, visible building, made of inanimate materials, and, at the same time, harboring the most active and reprehensible principles?—Tell us, for you all say YOU KNOW, where this monster, MASONRY, is to be found? Has it legs to run away, a mouth and teeth to bite, and feet to kick, or horns to hook? You declare that it is not the Masons, but MASONRY, that you act against. I will consent to have all the scattering sparks of principle and discernment of your party united in one flame to enlighten your understandings, and you cannot show me Masonry but in Masons.

If you war only against Masonry, why do you proscribe the Masons? Are you not publishing a list of their names, with the professed design of destroying Masonic influence, or the influence of MASONRY? All that I can say to you is, if you persist in your course, disgrace will cover your graves; but if you will stop and listen to reason and justice, you may live to repent of your conduct and most egregious folly.

It is circulated far and wide, that the MASONs caused the RIOT! and the antimasonic papers have headed their speculations upon the subject, 'Masonic Riot.' No greater than the rest of THEIR LIES; but, verily, it is a great lie. We are happy to hear that the Masons took no part in creating the disturbance in the meeting. A Mason spoke, it is true, very well and very plainly, but without the sanction of the Masons. Indeed, he said himself, it was contrary to their wishes.

Bent upon their purpose, they adjourned from night to night, and then from night to day, till they secured to themselves a full defeat and disgrace. The excitement of the people, instead of abating with fatigue, increased from the repeated insults of the chairman and his supporters.—Never was there a man before whose heart was so given to villany, as to give 'the lie direct' to the face of thousands. The opening of such a meeting was the disgrace, for the ending was honorable to our city! It was interrupted and stopped, and the chairman and his gang, hissed to the very streets.

The Mayor was called, and when he addressed the assembly, a respectful silence was properly observed. He spoke with his usual eloquence and aptness, and, generally to the point. But certainly it was a very odd request to make of an assembly of the people, called together professedly to decide an important question, that those who were unfriendly to the object and design of the meeting, should retire, that those who were in favor might remain and quietly discuss and decide the proposition, or, in other words, you that are in the affirmative of this question will please to retire, that those who are otherwise minded, may decide it in the negative! We thank you Mr. Mayor, for the other part of your speech; but must confess, that this request was a most ridiculous one, as you will readily see yourself, and probably acknowledge.

INFLEXIBLE JUSTICE.

ANTI-MASONRY!

AN ATTEMPT AT BRIBERY!!! In New York, where political excitements are always more violent and disgraceful than any where else we know of, such tricks as we are about to exhibit below, have been practised, and hence the number of renouncing masons which that heterogeneous population can boast of; but in Pennsylvania, though we have seen many warm contests, and been much convulsed by political excitements, yet we have not hitherto heard of a single instance, in which open bribery has ever been attempted for the purpose of carrying any political measure. It has been reserved for Anti-masonry, to introduce such means of electioneering into our state, and George B. Markley, of our city, has been the first worthy instrument to carry it, or to attempt to carry it, into successful operation.

Fellow-citizens look at the following affidavit, made voluntarily by a man, who, though poor, is honest, and who has abundant evidence of his integrity and veracity. What does it exhibit? It exhibits an attempt at Bribery! A crime jet-black in the catalogue of vice—one which strikes at the very foundation of society. And for what? Why for the honorable and pious purpose, of injuring an innocent and unoffending set of men—of destroying a charitable institution—or, if you please, for the more noble purpose of advancing the political interests of one man, at the expense of those of another—at the expense of his character, his standing in society, and his business. This is its object—If we could, by the utmost stretch of the imagination, picture to ourselves a single case in which bribery could be even viewed with a complacent eye, it surely would not be this.—What! commit bribery merely to serve a political friend,—to carry a political measure!!! Morality, decency forbid it. What then, fellow-citizens, do you think of the man who would thus attempt it, for such purposes too? What do you think of the principles of a party which encourages, yea, inculcates it? We pause for a reply—Do you not think them dangerous in the extreme? They are so. By a single act of bribery, tomorrow your property, your character, and even your life may be taken away. There is no safety if these things be—and if they now happen in the green tree, what may we not expect in the dry.

We call upon our fellow-citizens, of every party—of all denominations, to come out and put their seal of indignation upon such principles and such acts.
Lancaster City, ss.

Before me an Alderman for the City of Lancaster, personally came AUGUSTUS HARTFIELD, who on his oath, saith, that George B. Markley, has more than once asked deponent to renounce Masonry, for that it was good for nothing; and on the 3d of August, instant, he urged deponent to renounce Masonry, or to come to his house and make him a mason, and he would reward deponent well, he would give him twenty dollars, and deponent further says, that he would have published this matter in the public prints, but that he was poor and scarce of money.

AUGUSTUS HARTFIELD.

Sworn and Subscribed, August 12th, 1830, Before me.

SAMUEL DALE.

Hear the language of Markley.—Do, Mr. Hartfield, renounce masonry—and it will be good for you—come to my house and make me a mason and I will reward you well, I will give you $20. Now, let it be remembered that Markley contends that Masons "take horrid and blasphemous oaths," not to reveal the secrets of masonry. What then did he want poor, but honest Hartfield to do? According to his own account, to commit perjury!!! Verily, this Markley is a pushing politician. At one single swoop he was willing for the little gain he might have expected from it, and it would indeed have been little, to have perjury and bribery laid upon two immortal souls. Markley, though the active agent in this disgraceful and wicked transaction, does not deserve all the blame which attaches to it. He is merely entitled to his share, for there are others, the originators of the plot, now lying concealed behind the scene. We know them, and by and bye we shall drag them from their hiding places, and expose them in their moral and political depravity, to the gaze of an insulted community—a community which hates vice in every form, and which, we trust, will, in language as loud as Jupiter's thunder, denounce its votaries.

The private history of this business is, if possible, more disgraceful than the public. Hartfield is an infirm and poor man. His misfortunes therefore were the chords to be touched. He was told that he was infirm and poor, that if he remained a mason he would in future get no more work from those who had employed him—that he would therefore be in great distress,—but that if he would renounce masonry, he would be well provided for,—he should have $20 in hand, which was represented to him as a great sum in these hard times, and indeed so it is to a man in his situation. These things were urged to him in the most persuasive terms and just when Markley imagined he had his prey, the old man turned to him, and in indignant language and in the fearlessness of genuine honesty, said, 'sir, it is true I am poor, very poor, but my poverty is here, (touching his pocket,) not here, (touching his heart,) I will not renounce Masonry for all the money in Lancaster, for I know it is a good institution, and it is a shame for you to attack my poverty.'

QUESTIONS addressed to Rev. Chauncey Whittlesey, a seceding Mason, of Middletown, Conn.

In your examination in regard to Man and to God, have you found no secret crimes more necessary to confess to man, than the secrets of Masonry?

Is the mental and bodily decrepitude under which you labor, the effect of your Masonic sins, or sins of a very different cast?

You say you have not entered a lodge for several years. Could you have entered any lodge of Masons for several years past?

Was Masonry, in your opinion, always a 'pernicious Institution,' or has it become so within a few years?

You say they (namely Lodges) are charitable only in name, and you call for an examination of the Treasurer's accounts to substantiate this charge. Would you be willing to have these accounts examined and known to the public how these charitable funds have been disposed of?

You say, it is an 'anti-christian institution,' and that 'the name of Christ is never heard in the Lodges.' Have you lost your memory, or is this a known falsehood, declared in the face of the world?

If the Institution is as bad as you represent it to be, why did you wait until your faculties became impaired, before you renounced it?

Finally, Are you capable in body or mind to write or dictate any part of your confession—was even your signature affixed to it: and is it not the production, an electioneering project of a few professing partizans, who wish to disturb the peace and tranquillity of society?

Hear the language of an antimason, Judge Marcy, of N. York. 'The oaths (masonic) repeated by Hopkins, most of them, it will be observed, enjoined acts, in accordance with high moral duties: and all of them, I think, may apply to acts which do not necessarily conflict with the laws of the state, or any duty enjoined by these laws.'—Let it be recollected that these are the sentiments of an antimason, and they are far more liberal and just than any thing which has ever emanated from a similar source in this state, and let it be remembered too, that, they are in direct contradiction of the doctrine which our patriotic and ingenuous antimasons contend for, viz: that the Masonic oaths are impious, irreligious and immoral—that so far from enjoining high moral duties, they enjoin the commission of the worst of crimes—that they do conflict with, and are paramount to the laws of the country. We give Judge Marcy due credit for liberality and honesty, and as far as he went, he is correct, but he did not go far enough. There is nothing in Masonry, we solemnly allege, so far as we are acquainted with it, and we are not quite a tyro in it, that runs in opposition to the laws of God or our country—there is nothing in it that inculcates vice or immorality, or winks at the semblance of it,—there is nothing in it repugnant to the feelings or principles of the purest christian that ever worshipped Almighty God. It is vain, wicked and slanderous, therefore, to say that the obligations of Masonry interfere with religion, politics, or the due administration of the laws of the country.—Lancaster Reporter.

It is generally conceded, we believe, that the late important revolution in France was effected by 'working men.'—Traveler.

THE ANTIMASONS.

A SONG:

Written expressly for the is-to-be 'celebrated Antimasonic Convention,' to be holden at Philadelphia, this day, Sept. 11th 1830; there to be sung with unbounded and unprecedented applause, by the 'Moderator.'

TUNE—'Oh, what a row,' &c.

Oh, what a row, what a rumpus and a rioting
The 'Anti' trade has lately made about this town;
Slumbers soft and feather-beds one half the folks lay quiet in
Without a thought that such a din their sleep should crown

[Spoken.]—It was at the witching hour of moonlight revelry, when grave-yards yawn, and ghosts sit picking their teeth, upon their tombstones, with their coffin-screws, that this honest group of anties sallied forth for the edification of the swiney multitude;—one bearing a bundle of old Custom-House Masonic Oaths—one, an ink-stand, and a quire of foolscap paper, in which were three pair of antimasonic shoes, ready for delivery—another carried a ballot-box, with no black balls in it—and then came the venerable 'Moderator,' preceded by the Right Reverend Honorable Seceding Mason and 'Reformed' Antimasonic Parson, who was studying, all the while, the 'Murder-and-Treason-not-excepted' Oath—and last, not least, an honest Jack, bending under an enormous weight of pamphlets, entitled, 'The Terrible Death and Wonderful Preservation of William Morgan; written by Himself!' Into Faneuil Hall they wandered, like to a flock of wild-geese whose Colonel is among the missing, one after the other; and as they passed, the people knelt before the saints, and cried—'God bless ye all!'

Oh, what a row, what a rumpus and a rioting
The 'anti' trade has lately made about this town;
Slumbers soft and feather-beds one half the folks lay
+ quiet in
Without a thought that such a din their sleep should crown.

The Hall was filling;
None were willing
To be crowded monstrously,
Some were swearing,
Others bearing
All this clangour patiently.

Oh, what a row, what a rumpus and a rioting
The 'anti' trade has lately made about this town.

And then to gain himself some fame,
Or to secure a living, O,
A preacher first began to spout
'Bout Masonry;
'This 'liar,' said the Masons played
Upon the drone-like multitude,
And while asleep, 'we harmless sheep'
They gave the rot:
These Masons teach all in their reach
How to perjure juries, O,
And 'murder' too! indeed, 'tis true,
'And treason not excepted,' O—

[Spoken.]—This Right Reverend Honorable Mr. Hatcher, who had formerly been a Mason and had taken the most holy vows that he would remain true to his brethren, now thought differently of the oaths sworn on the Holy Evangelists, before his God; he became a Seceder.

and took another oath, and made another contract with his God, whom he thinks he can deceive, that he would say and write as much against Freemasons as he had hitherto said in their favor, provided, he should, hereafter, be kept from the Devil and the lake of fire and brimstone:—so, like a true disciple of the 'meek and lowly Jesus,' he went about teaching seceding, and sowing the seeds of discord, schism, and rebellion.—Not having been treated as he deserved to have been treated, he renounced them, and went about, telling the weak, in everything, of the mole in the Masons' eyes—but, said nothing about the beam he was endeavoring to thrust somewhere else! Some say he was then seeking for future office! but, they are prejudiced! Poor philanthropic candidate for immortality, to which thou hast forever damned thyself, how thy pure and ministerial heart must have throbb'd when a certain 'diabolical' Mason called thee to thy beard, unrebuked, a 'liar' a thatcher of inconsistencies!—I heard a boy singing, whilst you 'wept and groaned in secret'—

Oh, what a row, what a rumpus and a rioting
The 'anti' trade has lately made about this town.

As his lying
Caused some crying,
Sure the thing was physical—
He in the Chair
Got up and swore—
The preacher was too quizzical!

Oh, what a row, what a rumpus and a rioting
The 'anti' trade has lately made about this town.

Now uprose a candidate for gallows or for pillory,
A Mason he, who changed their tune
From high to low;
This Mason said, the people's peace these 'anties' had been breaking, Sir,
And if they could they surely would
Now gull them, O.

[Spoken.]—There he stood, alongside of the parson, in the gallery, who looked as a turkey-buzzard would look among a multitude of sheep on an April day—rather sheepish! The speaker bowed most condescendingly at the shrine of Esculapius, where one of its high priests was officiating; dispensing to the turbulent multitude Balm of Gilead for their wounded hearts, Tincture of Myrrh for their fetid breath, and Opodeldoc for their broken shins—'Mr. Doctor,' I beg pardon, 'Mr. Moderator!' said the speaker—'Proceed!' said Nestor—'I do not pretend to speak the truth, it is impossible for me to do so—for I am a Mason! I do not say that the Reverend gentleman is a liar and a villain, because no one would believe me; but I will say, and you know it, too, that he is a Seceder, an Honorable Seceder, a Reverend Seceder! I do not wish to injure the gentleman's character—I cannot do it—for he is a Preacher—a Senator! whilst I, alas, am only gifted with the title, the damning title, the infernal appellation of Mason! The Man after God's own heart must and shall be heard—ay! and be believed! The Devil's own, myself, must be shunned—excommunicated! I come here to seek for office, and to ask you to kick up a row, and vote for the immaculate H—C—! I come here to lie, to steal—to take any oaths against the people's welfare—whilst we, the unpretending Minister of the Gospel, comes here to speak the TRUTH!—to tell you you are fools! why do you not thank him for the information? 'This second Solomon would enlighten you, you 'Jacks'! He says one half the Ministers in the United States, are Masons, and who, being under horrid oaths, are guilty of blasphemy even in the pulpit—they tell you to love God and fear evil, thus teaching Deism Fanny Wrightism, Atheism and MASONISM!!! Mr. Moderator,' continued the speaker, 'you are a Doctor—you know how an emetic will sometimes act—contrary to bile and hot water—especially when administered by quacks!—so will the 'anties' act! when they cannot get out at the front door—like a two-edged sword, they will cut their way, through thick and thin, in the other direction!' 'Mr. Whitman! Mr. Whitman!' bellowed out the learned chairman, his cheeks at the same time assuming the hue of the blushing cabbage, 'You must not be PERSONAL, Sir!' and then, in an under tone, he asked his 'chip of the old block' to hand him a glass of water; for, says he, 'I must wash that down—I always wash down what I can't swallow!' 'Mr. Moderator,' replied the speaker, 'I did not intend to be "PERSONAL"; but the shoe pinches where it fits too tight! I have said before, Mr. Moderator, that I would trust my life with the Trinitarian, the Orthodox, the Unitarian, the Quaker, the Shaker, the Deist, the Atheist, and even the Devil, Sir! but not with a SECEDER! and least of all with REVEREND seceders! (said he, at the same time turning round to the Reverend Senatorial Seceder on his right, who had previously spoken, he gave him a very cutting look which made the Senator dodge)—I have done.' 'Hold up your head, Thatcher, and lift up the brim of your hat,' shouted one below. 'Put that 'ere man out!' says the 'Moderator.' 'Throw him over—out with him!' shouts the select. 'Hear him—hurra;' roars the mob. 'You are in Faneuil Hall; the Cradle of Liberty—and I command silence!' 'Hurra—hurra.' 'You are in Faneuil Hall, I say;' again bawled out the Doctor. 'Dat make twice you hab sed it—he, he, he'—grinned a negro, who roared out with great eclat—

Oh, what a row, what a rumpus and a rioting
The 'anti' trade has lately made about this town.

Some were roaring;
None were snoring—
The devil was within the Hall!
Such a clatter
And a spatter
Ne'er was heard by great or small.

Oh, what a row, what a rumpus and a rioting
The 'anti' trade has lately made about this town.

Then the 'New-Yorker' rose from his seat to spout a bit,
And in his hand he held a book he 'd got by heart;
They thought that he was just the thing to teach the Boston Boys a bit—

And so he rose and blew his nose to act his part:
But the people, la, how simple, did not choose to hear the loot;

And they bawl'd and loudly call'd,
Turn that d—d New-Yorker out!
Oh, what a row, what a rumpus and a rioting
The 'anti' trade has lately made about this town.

[Spoken.]—'Mr. Speaker.' 'Proceed, my honest friend—and if any person causes a noise to be made his name shall be taken down!' Then came the profound lecturer to the stand—and with a most bewitching smile—and with a flourish of the hand, none but a New-Yorker could have made—he commenced his harangue—but first thrust the aforesaid hand into his breeches pocket from whence he brought to light a huge 'black-book,' with silver clasps, with with Squares and Compasses, and covered with the blood of Morgan! He coughed and hawed three times—swallowed something that had evidently been sticking in his throat for several minutes—probably a ‘murder-and-treason-not-excepted’ oath; however coughing ‘s catching; a boy in the select box caught it, he gave it to another on the floor; he to a third on the benches; the doorkeeper caught it, and like electricity, it flew up stairs, and consternation ensued in the gallery; the epidemic spread; the Doctor thought ‘t was all a sham to get Mr. New-York down. The antics, as usual, commenced shouting ‘Hear him.’ The ‘Moderator,’ ‘You air in Faneuil Hall, the Cradle of Liberty; a place that always commands respect!—Let their names be taken DOWN!’ But it would not do, their names were all up; and so was Mr. Secretary Shoedealet, who made two of ‘Froth’s’ best bows; pulled up his dicky, and, Paul Pry-like, darted towards ‘New-York,’ and begged him to desist one moment whilst he, the honorable Scribe, should address the ‘Mob’ alias Citizens of Boston. ‘See what an effect,’ says he, ‘my speaking will have. I’ll teach these fellows how to bear insult with impunity.’ So, he came forward; bow’d to the Moderator, who returned it most majestically, bowed twice to the gentleman from New-York, thrice to the great law-giver from the West, and three times thrice to the ‘rabble’; the latter applauded; he bowed most meekly to the ground, changed the position of the feet; thrust one hand into his hair—then, like his great contemporary from New-York, blew his nose and struck a tragic attitude: the audience shouted; he bowed again; they hissed; yet lower yet he bowed! Suddenly something went whistling through the air like a musket ball—Scribe’s head as suddenly bobbed down, and was seen no more. One who was next me, held his nose, and groaned out ‘Rotten Eggs’—at the same moment I thought I saw the Scribe rush through the crowd in despair—covered with filthy glory—they say he stopped not running until, out of breath, he reached Philadelphia. ‘The Meeting air dissolved,’ said the Moderator ‘You which air against us can stay away from our next meeting—them who s in favor of us can come whether or no—I dissolve you sin di!—Do not put out the lights, gentlemen, till we get out!’

Oh, what a row, what a rumpus and a rioting

The time was set; the people met

For Masonry.

The learned Judge and all the ‘Fudge’

Were ready to acquit themselves,

And act the part they’d got by heart

The night before.

[Spoken.]—Yes, there He stood, like one of the Greek sages, with wisdom painted on his brow—‘Gentlemen,’ said he, ‘I do not attempt to give my opinion on this momentous question, being the ‘Moderator,’ I must act impartially; but I must say that Masonry is a diabolical thing. The Masons are a noisy, office-seeking set of scoundrels. It has been a mystery for ages past what the ‘great fish’ could have been about when he swallowed Jonah—and whether or no he actually did swallow the fish (here a laugh followed)—I meant to say whether or no the fish swallowed Jonah. I have come to the conclusion that if this was not the case, it was all a fish-story; but I can mystery. This fish was a large genus of the flying fish order, who feeling hungry was thereby now induced to fly over the sea and swallow the first man he met: meeting Jonah he swallowed him, and would have decomposed, acidulated, and have reduced him into a palpable powder had it not been for the horrible fact, the diabolical hint, and damnable inuendo his digestive, organic, and gastric juices threw out, that the precious morsel he had swallowed, was—now comes the dreadful truth—a MASON!’ ‘Throw him over;’ ‘tar and feather him,’ shouted all; and the venerable expounder of the scriptures and pounder of herbs and jalap sat down amid a volley of hisses. One got up, and another got up, but were hissed down. At last, a gentleman from the north end obtained a hearing. ‘Sir,’ said he to the chairman, ‘Are you a DOCTOR! (the chairman smiled assent) so am I, sir. Are you a Father, sir? Would you murder your father and your children because they are MASONS, sir? My father is a Mason, sir! I am the son of a Mason, sir! My father fought for the liberty of his country, sir, and yet he is a Mason, sir! He fought on Bunker Hill, sir, and would fight there again, sir, if his country called him, sir—and HE is a MASON, sir!’—Disorder was now the order of the day—many fought, bled, died and conquered. At last the MAYOR entered, and order was restored for a while. The Chairman spoke, ‘Will the Mayor be honored by taking a seat next to our honorable self?’ The Mayor, standing, replied, with a disdainful curl of the lip—none but a doctor could analyse its meaning. ‘I thank you, sir, I prefer standing—the honor is too great—but I thank you for the condescension!’ The Chairman’s eyes flashed fire; he was, evidently, chagrined; he looked much like to a game-cock that has had his opponent’s spurs driven too deep into a tender spot. The mob shouted. The Mayor then permitted him to retire; and, like a dog that has had a hornet’s nest about his ears, with his tail between his legs, he cut dirt and ran—they do say, he tracked the Secretary—if it be the case, God be with them both in their holy pilgrimage. I was told that a Mr. Dexter, the Michigan Judge, and a Mr. Ward, were then hissed down stairs; and that a Mr. Thacher was escorted from the meeting the night previous by two gentlemen, and that the trio spoke rather feelingly about a Mr. Whitman. Be it as it will the Widows who have been defrauded, whose estates have been turned into gold to enrich the coffers of a certain would-be-great man, are in tears—for the great one has fallen!—But, widows, dry your tears—dum spero spiro!—Hark I hear some one singing—

THE DOOMED.

A MONASTIC SKETCH.

‘On ruin’d frame and wither’d mind,
The wrecks by passion left behind,
A shrivell’d scroll, a scatter’d leaf,
Sear’d by the autumn blast of grief—
There read of Cain the curse and crime,
In characters unworn by Time.’

Atheism! Mystic essence of mind, that cometh down as a shadow upon the spirit, quenching high hopes and pure aspirations, and dimming the thousand lights of joy which forever burn in the temple of the heart. The mysterious goings-forth of the great Deep—the throne of Midnight, where the many stars mock the limited faculties of man with a glory unearthly and eternal—are mute heralds of Omnipotence: And ‘I AM’ is graven upon every object in the Universe.

They call me mad. Aha! how I cursed them in the bitterness of scorn, even though every impression died away amid the dampness and the mildew of a dungeon. I had committed a fearful, a terrible crime; it recks not how or what. Ask the scathed oak, baring a branchless and a barkless trunk to heaven, the cause of its desolation: Ask the wave that wanders from a far sea, and is dashed upon the shore, why it rushes to destruction:—But ask not memory to retrace the pathway of existence: Ask not the agonised soul to unroll the scroll of the past, and scan the burning lineaments which mar its pages. Men look with an awful dread upon the rayless cell and the rusted chain; but there are beings to whom inhumation is a relief from the living death which weighs upon them like a curse. I was one of these creatures of guilt; and I sought to draw the shroud of Atheism over the lazar-house of my heart, echoing the voice that rang out from the whirlwind of the French Revolution—‘There is no God.’ In the silent recess of a prison, with no companions save the noxious reptiles which crawled around and beneath me, how often have I reasoned until darkness enveloped my mental powers, attempting to convince myself that death is an eternal sleep. Vain task. Pride goaded me on—conscience urged one way and despair another; there was still something fearful in the idea of utter annihilation. And then the thought, if there is a higher and a holier state, that I might there meet one—but I am opening a sealed fountain. Days and months and years glided away: I took no note of time; all was the chaos of doubt and unbelief: even my very feelings partook of the nature of the adamant rock that had incarcerated me long and withering years. A change at length came over my spirit; I longed once more to gaze on the age-worn and hoary mountains, the pleasant vallies, and the streams of old Creation. I was a ‘thing from life apart.’ Yet I could not but admit my doom just. Conscience whispered that if mankind were all like myself, the world would be an aceldama of guilt and death.

I was considered a harmless and a broken-hearted being, and the door of my cell thrown open. Oh! with what glowing feelings did I gaze on the heavens and the earth: it seemed as if they were dressed in a lovelier and a more glorious hue than of old. I could no longer sin against knowledge, and pronounce the natural and the moral creation the effect of chance, nor believe that man is a mere weed heaved up from the fathomless and shoreless Ocean of Eternity destined to float a moment on its misty surface, and then sink into annihilation and forgetfulness: else why should the soul desire release from human ties, and long to drink deep of the glory and the mystery of immortality; and why should the spirit loathe the thought of sleeping in silence and forever with worms of the dust?

I am now a lone wreck on the brink of being—my existence has been mercifully extended beyond the brief boon of years allotted to man. Many weary nights, while my cloistered brethren were lost in sleep, have I wept and prayed that I might be forgiven for a dark crime and a darker unbelief. It is done—the thrall which led me down to the charnel-house of infidelity, no longer exercises a bewildering power. I go to the spirit-land, where the cloud and the tempest never come; where the rainbow is eternal and unchanging; and where the blessed ones of Paradise are unblenched by the overshadowing and

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 11, 1830.

REVOLUTION IN FRANCE.

The important intelligence given in a portion of our last paper of the revolution in France, proves to be true.—The brave people of France have gloriously triumphed over a despotic and oppressive government. The great, the good, the patriotic LAFAYETTE is at the head of the Notional Army of France! The veteran of 73 winters has again entered the field in defence of Liberty and the rights of his fellow-men! The Bourbons are again fugitives! Their power is irretrievably lost. France will not again receive them. She will not again submit to the yoke of Bourbon despotism. Whom she will choose to rule over her may be difficult at this time to predict; but certainly not Charles X. We give to the exclusion of other matters such details as our limits will permit. It appears that the Parisians were seconded in their measures, in every section of France heard from. The carnage in Paris is stated to have been horrible. The moderation of the new government is spoken very highly of. The London papers state that the British Cabinet, on hearing of the measures resorted to by the people of France, immediately assured the French government that they should not interfere in behalf of either party.

INSURRECTION AT PARIS.

On the 26th instant the Bank refused to discount bills, upon which all the manufacturers discharged their workmen, and the streets of Paris were filled with groups discussing aloud the extraordinary state of things.

The seizure of the press of the liberal journals appeared to be the signal for the manifestation of the public opinion. The populace was no longer to be intimidated by the troops, and bloodshed ensued to a frightful extent on Tuesday and Wednesday. Many of the National Guards now spontaneously took up arms in defence of the public liberties, but the Government neglected to profit by this open demonstration of feeling, and persevered in the course which must terminate in its ruin! This state of things continued until Thursday, when the populace and the National Guards attacked and carried the Hotel de Ville, and several small posts. The King's troops then charged in turn, and, after an obstinate resistance, in which much blood was spilled, succeeded in retaking them. The possession, however, was of short duration, as the students of the Ecole de Droit, and of the Ecole Polytechnique, fell vigorously on the military, and drove them from their posts.

The National Guards being then organized to a considerable extent, and having at their head General Gerard, undertook the duty of protecting the city, and gained over to the cause of the people, the 5th and 53d regiment of the line.

During these proceedings the populace, being formed into bands, armed in every way, and organized to a great extent, gained considerable ground, and pushed their advantages to the extremities of the city. The Royal guards, who had been ordered to evacuate Paris, were directed to proceed to St. Cloud. The third regiment of Guards and the Swiss Guards, who had not quitted their posts at the Tuilleries, were attacked there at 12 o'clock in the day, and the posts being forced, the troops retreated to the Louvre.—Here they were again attacked at 3 o'clock, and after a heavy firing, they were dispossessed, and finding further resistance hopeless, retired from Paris. These accounts reach up to 4 o'clock on Thursday.

A meeting of the Peers had taken place but no material result.

The Deputies met in Paris, and agreed to a protest, which was sent to the King, at St. Cloud, but it did not appear that the King would make any concession. The Deputies on ascertaining the obstinacy of the King, reassembled to deliberate, and to take measures for the safety of the country.

The tri-colored flag was floating on the Tuilleries, and, according to some accounts on Notre Dame also.

Proclamation of the French Deputies.

'Frenchmen! France is free! Absolute power has raised its standard; the heroic population of Paris has overthrown it. Paris, attacked has made the sacred cause triumph by arms which had triumphed in vain by the elections. A power which usurped our rights and disturbed our repose threatened at once liberty and order. We return to the possessions of order and liberty. There is no more fear for acquired rights, no more barrier between us and the rights that we still want. A government which may without dismay secure to us these advantages is now the first want of our country.

'Frenchmen! Those of your deputies who are already at Paris have assembled; and till the Chambers can regularly intervene, they have invited a Frenchman who has never fought but for France, the Duke of Orleans, to exercise the functions of lieutenant-general of the kingdom. This is, in their opinion, the surest means promptly to accomplish by peace the ends of the most legitimate defence. The Duke of Orleans is devoted to the national and constitutional cause. He has always defended its interests and professed its principles. He will respect our rights, for he will derive his own from us. We shall secure to ourselves by laws all the guarantees necessary to liberty strong and durable. The re-establishment of the National Guards, with the intervention of the National Guards in the choice of the officers. The intervention of the citizens in the formation of the departmental and municipal administrations. The jury for the transgression of the press; the legally organized responsibility of the ministers, and the secondary agents of the administration. The situation of the military legally secured. The re-election of deputies appointed to public offices we shall give at length to our institutions in concert with the head of the state, the developments which they have used. Frenchmen! the Duke of Orleans himself has already spoken, and his language is that which is suitable to a free country. 'The Chambers,' says he, 'are going to assemble! they will consider of means to insure the reign of the laws, and the maintenance of the rights of the nation. The charter will henceforward be a truth.'

[From the Journal du Commerce of July.]

'Inhabitants of Paris! the deputies of France, at this moment assembled in Paris, have expressed to me the desire that I should repair to this capital, to exercise the functions of lieutenant-general of the kingdom. I have not hesitated to come and share your dangers, to place myself in the midst of your heroic population, and to exert all my efforts to prevent you from the calamities of civil war and anarchy. On returning to the city of Paris I wore with pride those glorious colours which you have resumed, and which I myself long wore. The Chambers are a going to assemble, they will consider of the means of securing the reign of the laws and the maintenance of the rights of the nation. The charter will henceforward be a truth.

LOUIS PHILIPPE D'ORLEANS.'

On Wednesday about one o'clock the tumultuous assemblage had greatly increased, when there was repeated discharges of musketry. The populace were every where collected in dense masses but more especially at Rue St. Honor and the market places. The palace Louis Quinze was crowded with persons, in the strongest state of excitement, calling out, with deafening shouts—'A bas les Bourbons!'—'A bas les Despotes!' &c.—By the various discharges, it was said that five or six hundred individuals had been killed. At the Boulevards the people cut down the trees and tore up the chaussees. One unfortunate Englishman, looking out of the window of Lawson's hotel, was shot. Every shop with the insignia of the royal family was attacked—the affiches were torn down, and the shops were literally battered to pieces. The Tuilleries were quite closed. The current report, when our informant left Paris, was, that L. Cassimir Perrier had issued a proclamation, stating, that obedience was no longer due to Government, which was to be considered at an end. The national guard had assembled in great forces, and it was understood that M. Lafitte, or General Lamarque, was to be at the head of it. The great massacre of the people happened when they were breaking into every place where there were arms, to seize them. None of the mails were allowed to quit Paris, and it took about 400 men to succeed in getting the mail to this country out of the capital. This could not have been effected but for a regiment, which had gone over to the people having taken charge of it. All the Bureaux had closed, and it was impossible to procure passports. The English, who were all eager to quit Paris, were taking their departure without passports. All the English were stopped by the populace and made to call out—'Vive la Charte.' The people tore off the fleurs-de-lis from the dresses of the postillions. What added considerably to the consternation of the English, was the circumstance of Lady Stuart de Rothsay having left Paris. It was confidently reported and believed that the Prefect of Rouen had been hanged. Indeed, in every quarter the indignation was strong against the government, and what added to the excitement was the complete destruction of all men in office who had not, during the recent election, exerted themselves in procuring votes. As much depends upon the feeling of the army, our informant says that the Gardes du Corps and the Swiss are supposed to be staunch to the government; but the regiments of the line were on the side of the people to a man. He assures us that on this most important point there is not the least doubt entertained that all the regiments of the line are with the people. The defection is complete. An officer on duty was desired to fire by one of the Gardes du Corps. The answer was 'No, I will never fire on my countrymen.' It was reported in Paris, that individuals of the Gardes du Corps, fought separate from the body, had been dragged from their horses and massacred. The report was, that great damage had been done to the Louvre. It was said that cannon were posted on both sides of the Seine, and strong detachments of cavalry were marching from all the neighboring country on Paris. Hand-bills were distributed every ten minutes or so among the crowds, containing the most vehement philippics against the king and ministers, summoning every man to arm for his country, and to aid in ejecting the Bourbon. The Palais Royal was the scene of all sorts of devastation. The Duke of Orleans, from his having the misfortune to be a Bourbon, is a great sufferer for the sins of his relations. Our informant assures us that no exception is made—that the race is devoted.—Paris, he says, exhibits a most extraordinary appearance at this time. The state of excitement cannot be described. Great indignation was felt at the meanness of the King, in skulking at such a time. Some said he was concealed in Paris, others that he had gone to Compeigne. It was considered by the Parisians that the government had intended the destruction of the capital. The Gardes du Corps, our informant said, did not by any means appear elated; they seemed to be filled with any thing rather than anticipations of a successful issue. No Frenchman had the least doubt of the issue. The people were pouring into Paris from all the places in the neighborhood, with such arms as they could find, breathing vengeance against the Bourbons.—[Morning Chronicle.]

PARIS, July 31.—It has been necessary to designate for each branch of the public administration, commissioners to replace provisionally, the administration which has just fallen with the power of Charles X. The following are appointed provisional commissioners; for the department of justice, M. Dupont d'Eure; finance, Baron Louis; war, Gen. Gerard; marine, M. de Rigny; foreign affairs, M. Bignon; public instruction, M. Guizot; interior and public works, M. Casimir Perrier.

(Signed)

LOBAU, A. DE PUYRAVEAU.
MAUGUIN, DE SCHONEN.

The municipal commission has found itself called upon to assure itself of the preservation of the crown diamonds. The usual depository of that precious public property has declared that the diamonds have been withdrawn by M. de la Bouillerie. His receipt is deposited in the Municipality. The Court has quitted at St. Cloud in haste.—It is hoped the crown diamonds will be restored to the depot. This is a question of probity wholly independent of politics, and from which Princes can no more free themselves than private individuals. Besides, M. de la Bouillerie, who signed the receipt, is personally responsible, and the 'rigor' of the laws relative to public officers, would be applied to him.

PARIS.—Two rich manufacturers, deputed by the city of Rouen, came this morning to M. Lafitte. The authorities of Rouen have submitted to the name of the population. The ordinances there were considered as null and void. The population of Versailles have taken up arms.—Troops are shut up in their barracks, and they announce pacific intentions.

Paris was on Wednesday, in possession of the insurgents. The citizens were well armed with picks, pistols, fire arms, bludgeons. The soldiers had, for the most part, either joined with, or refused to act against, the people. Much blood, however has been shed. In the Faubourg of St. Dennis it was reported from one to two thousand persons had been sacrificed, when the guards and the artillery, shocked at so much carnage, and seeing the determination of the people, had refused fire. The accounts add that the Chamber of Peers were sitting, and that they called out the proscribed national guard, and that the Chambers of Deputies had met in Rue Forbin, where they were debating upon the means of providing for the safety of the capital and the preservation of the charter. Thus it would appear that Charles has set his crown upon a cast—had stood the hazard of the die—and lost it! It is said that this bigoted and misguided monarch had fled to Fontainebleau, and that his ministers were no where to be found. [Morning Herald.

[From the Messenger des Chambres, Aug. 1.

PARIS, July 31.—Charles X. is at Chartres. The court intends to go to the Loire, to organize the scourge of civil war in the ancient Vendee. They are accompanied only by the Swiss. The Royal Guard, in a state of complete discouragement, disorganization, and desertion, has remained at St. Cloud and Versailles, with the artillery. The Duchesse of Berri made the most energetic remonstrances to Charles X. telling him that she was a mother, and that the brilliant destiny of her son was for ever endangered by his obstinate perseverance in an oppressive system. Charles X. it is said, received the princess very ill, and forbade her his presence. The despatches seized at the post office, and intended for the ambassadors, have been delivered to them unopened. They were sensible to these attentions, and have complimented the citizens on their bravery and moderation in victory. The sight of public order and respect for property, after three days battle, and in the absence of all authority, has inspired all foreigners at Paris with the most lively admiration. The English in particular, are transported at what they have seen. "Oh! great nation!" cried they.

PARIS SATURDAY EVENING.—All is tranquil here. The gates of the city are open, and the streets, which had been torn up by the populace, with the intention of throwing the stones from the tops of the houses upon the military, are repairing. The King of France, has fled to Nantes, accompanied by the Duke of Bordeaux and other members of the Royal family. They have carried off with them the crown and all the jewels. They will there wait for the ex-ministers, when it will be decided whether they will proceed to Germany or to England. Such of the Swiss Guard who had survived the carnage have forsaken the King.

The following Proclamation was issued by GEN. LAFAYETTE, who has been appointed Commander in Chief of the army. It is as follows:

FELLOW CITIZENS.—You have by an unanimous acclamation elected me your General. I shall prove myself worthy of the choice of the Parisian Grand National. We fight for our laws and our liberties.

Fellow Citizens.—Our triumph is certain. I beseech you to obey the orders of the Chiefs that will be given you and that cordially. The troops of the line have already given way. The guards are ready to do the same. The traitors who have excited the civil war; and who thought to massacre the people with impunity, will soon be forced to account before the tribunals for their violation of laws and their sanguinary plans. Signed at General Quarters.

LE GEN. DU BOURG LA FAYETTE.
Paris, 29th July.

London, Aug. 3.—It may truly be said, that no event was ever received on 'Change, with more gratification than that announcement yesterday morning by the express from Paris; putting an end, it did, to a state of suspense and anxiety of the most painful nature, and recording the consummation of a triumph honorable in the highest degree to France and to human nature itself. At an early hour groups were to be seen collected on the Royal Exchange, offering mutual congratulations on the issue of this great trial, and discussing all its probable consequences. The circumstances connected with it have passed with such unexampled rapidity, that men could hardly bring themselves at first to believe in the reality of them, notwithstanding the authentic shape in which they presented themselves, but compared the whole to the effect of a dream. The money market, at the commencement of the business, was placed in a very peculiar and singular state. The disposition of the London Capitalists was evidently to think favorably of that measure which has placed the Duke of Orleans at the head of affairs in France, and consequently to become purchasers of stock; but as the country, acting under the impression produced by the London letters of Friday and Saturday, sent up extensive orders to sell, the effect of the news was counteracted, and the market, after a sudden rise, fell back instantaneously.—Consols closed at 91-2. French Five per Cents 38.

TREMONT THEATRE.

The season at the Tremont Theatre commenced on Monday evening last, with the sterling comedy of the Soldier's Daughter, which was well received. Mrs. Russell (the Widow Cheerly of the evening) has a fine face and figure for the stage, and is a spirited actress. Mr. Johnson, who is said to be a Bostonian, received considerable applause as Governor Heartall. On Tuesday evening Mr. Pearson made his first appearance before a Boston audience, in the character of Rolla. Although this young gentleman is said to have had but three years practice upon the stage, he evinced talents of the first order for his profession, which, if cultivated, will enable him soon to stand among the first in the line he has chosen. If Rolla be a fair specimen of Mr. P's acting, he is very unlike most of the young aspirants for tragic fame, whose chief delight is to become servile copyists of the leading actors of the day.

In regard to the aggregate capacity of the stock company, it may be unfair at the present time, to form a definite opinion, as some of the new recruits cannot feel at home upon a stage which is new to them. Many of the old performers have been long before the public, and it would be in vain to attempt to supply their places to better advantage on this side of the Atlantic; for they are not only great favorites wherever they appear, but in their various departments in the drama are esteemed to be at least equal to the best in America.

The conveniences and appearance of the Theatre are much improved since the last season, and some new and important regulations have been made in its police. As there is a host of stars in the United States, and much foreign talent is expected to arrive, we trust that the manager will be enabled to offer a course of theatrical banquets during the season which will prove acceptable to the public and profitable to himself.—[Communicated.]

Antimasons have been as scarce in our streets for the week past, as cocked-up hats. Since their recent disgraceful transactions in Faneuil Hall, they have been ashamed to show their heads in public. It is said that they feel somewhat chagrined that our worthy Mayor should have dared to question their 'respectability.' 'Let the galled jade wince, our withers are unstrung.' As Pat said, 'if a man gets into bad company he can't keep out of a scrape.' So if there be any among them who feel aggrieved at the cut of the Mayor, let them quit the bad company into which they have fallen, and try, at least, to become respectable men. Back out, gentlemen! skunk away into obscurity, and do penance; for your iniquities are great!

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.—Arrangements of the most extensive and liberal character have been adopted by the city government for the approaching celebration. The procession will be formed at 9 o'clock, at the new State House, and commence moving at half past 9. It will pass down Beacon-street to the first great gate, and thence through lines formed by the children, under the care of the school-masters, over the Common to Tremont-street, down Court-street and State-street, and countermarch in State-street, through Washington-street, to the Old South Church. Hon. Josiah Quincy will deliver the Oration, and Charles Sprague, Esq. the Poem. After the services at the Church, there will be a dinner in Faneuil Hall, for all who see fit to subscribe. A band of music will be stationed on the Common, to perform during the afternoon, and until after sunset. There will also be fireworks in the evening. It will probably be one of the most splendid and extensive celebrations ever witnessed in Boston.

The News of the French Revolution has been received, in this country, with universal acclamations. It bursts upon us like the commencement of a new age—the opening of a new era—the unfolding of another roll in the history of future ages. That the result will be favorable to the United States, is generally admitted. A more liberal policy will be adopted. The interests of free trade will find new and powerful advocates. It may be asked, will not the Holy Alliance be compelled to intercede for the restoration of Charles X? Their interference once deluged Europe with blood. The blood of royalty is now ebbing. We have no fear on that score. There is more to be apprehended from intestine differences. There are two powerful parties in France—the one in favor of the young Napoleon; and the Orleans party, of which LAFAYETTE is at the head. If these differences are amicably adjusted, we have nothing to apprehend from foreign interference. All Europe is ripe for liberty—despots have enough to do at home.

We view the leaders of antimasonry, says a contemporary, with horror and detestation. We view them as the most profligate and the most abandoned wretches that ever wore the form of humanity. When the march of these demagogues will be stayed, he only knows that permits the pestilence to ravage the earth at noon day—sparing neither age, nor sect, nor condition. Yet we have a consolation—and that is, that whatsoever plagues the Deity may visit upon us, he never failed to follow the pestilence with the richest and the healthiest atmosphere; and we therefore look forward with buoyant hope, to the time when our sky shall lighten up with the bright and golden clouds of peace and happiness—when the spoiler shall be cut off in his ravages—and the destroyer arrested in his career of desolation. We already hear the heavy steps of the avenger, and we see in the distance, the flashing of his angry blade.

MASONIC TEMPLE.—It gives us much satisfaction that we are enabled to inform our friends at a distance, that the workmen commenced on this undertaking yesterday morning. The edifice, when finished, will be creditable to the city, and honorable to the Masonic fraternity. It is probable the corner-stone will be laid early in the ensuing month. Seasonable notice will be given.

METHODIST ALMANAC.—Putnam & Hunt have in preparation, and in a few weeks will publish 'The New-England Almanac and Methodist Register, for 1831.' It will contain the usual Astronomical Calculations, Tables, Lists of Stages, Courts, Roads, Agricultural and Horticultural Hints, Arithmetical Problems, an abridgment of the three Eastern Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Biographical Notices of Eminent Methodists, and Historical Sketches of Methodism. Robert T. Paine, Esq. furnishes the Astronomical Calculations.

The leading antimasonic political jugglers—fools, knaves, and renegade priests—assemble at Philadelphia, this day, for the purpose of discussing the merits of their own infamy, and of scandalizing their neighbors.

INTEMPERANCE.

Fell monster, source of grief and woe,
Thou fiend with siren face;
What floods of tears you cause to flow
Among the human race.

When shall mankind forever cease
Thy Lethan draught to crave—
To wear thy galling chains in peace,
Or bow thy willing slave.

When shall thy stream, so much the theme
Of Bards in times of yore,
Cease to inspire the Poet's lyre
And hail our ears no more.

O thou fair virtue, maid divine,
With thine attendant band,
And friendship sweet thy charms combine
To bless our favour'd land.

And reason, mild celestial guide,
Resume thy wonted way,
And wild delirium's frightful face
Be banish'd far away.

And ere another Jubilee
The minstrel shall have sung,
The last farewell, the funeral knell
Of Bacchus shall be rung.

THE PRINTER'S LOVE.

We love to see the blooming rose,
In all its beauty drest;
We love to hear our friends disclose
The motion of the breast.

We love to see a ship arrive,
Well laden to our shore;
We love to see our neighbors thrive,
And love to bless the poor.

We love to see domestic life
With uninterrupted joys;
We love to see a youthful wife
Not pleased with trifling toys.

We love all these—yet far above,
All that we ever said,
We love what every PRINTER LOVES,

MISCELLANY.

GIGANTIC EEL.

If the Americans excel in sea serpents, the inhabitants of New South Wales carry all before them in the magnitude of their eels. The following paragraph is in a recent Hobart Town paper.—'It may not be generally known that there is a gigantic species of eel peculiar to this island, found in most of our rivers, particularly where they form ponds of still water. A gentleman who was lately bathing in the South Esk, in one of those beautiful ponds formed by that river, after swimming about some time, sat down to rest himself, as he thought, on the round trunk of a tree, lying about a foot under water. Presently the log seemed to glide from beneath him, and he saw it turn its head and eyes towards him, and swim round him several times, moving its body in a zigzag serpentine direction. It was about a foot or fifteen inches in diameter, and about twelve or fifteen feet long, of a dark greenish color.'

A Coffin has been appropriately defined 'the Cradle in which our second childhood is laid asleep.'

The more honesty a man has, the less he affects the air of a saint; the affectation of sanctity is a blotch on the face of piety.—Lavater.

LYNN MINERAL SPRING HOTEL.

THE Subscriber respectfully acquaints the public, that the Establishment at LYNN MINERAL SPRING, that delightful summer retreat, has been recently repaired and improved, and is in the best order for the reception of Boarders, Parties of Pleasure, transient visitors, &c.

The salubrious qualities of the waters of this celebrated Spring—the beautiful Pond adjoining the House, abounding with fish of various descriptions, and surrounded by the most romantic scenery—a fine Sail Boat, and every convenience for fishing—a Bathing establishment on the margin of the Pond,—where the cold or warm bath may at any time be taken—the pleasant situation of the House, with its comfortable and furnished apartments—are attractions for those in pursuit of health or recreation, which are rarely exceeded, if equalled in any part of the country.

As the subscriber has had much experience, and is well known as the keeper of a Public House, it is unnecessary for him to promise any thing more than that his utmost exertions will be used to give satisfaction to all who may favour him with their patronage.

MR. COLTON'S ADDRESS.

We commence to day, with much pleasure, the publication of the Rev. Simeon Colton's Address, delivered at Dudley, Mass. at the Festival of St. John the Baptist, in June last. We commend it to the especial notice of our readers as being, in every respect, worthy of their particular attention. It is manifestly written with much care and deliberation, and clearly and forcibly exhibits the views of its author. It is a fearless exhibition of the truth, and is fraught throughout with just sentiments, and most judicious counsel. It is precisely adapted to the state of feeling in this community, and is well calculated to open the eyes of the blind, reconfirm the wavering in their attachment to principle, and establish immovably the feet of the 'true disciple' on the rock of safety. It shows, clearly, the unreasonableness of antimasonic demands, and the ruinous consequences that would result from complying with them. It exhorts the fraternity to untiring perseverance in well-doing, and bids defiance to the accumulated wrath of faction. It furnishes an unanswerable refutation of the numerous calumnies of seceders, and shows it to be their interest to misrepresent and distort the principles of Masonry. They have no other refuge. Though the party may love well the treason, it despises the traitor. In short, the address speaks of Masonry as it should. It treats of antimasonry too, as it is, as a fell conspiracy against the dearest private rights, and an unholy crusade against the fairest public blessings—as a monster of wickedness, seeking contention and strife, and begetting wretchedness and ruin—as an unhallowed combination of the profligate, and abandoned—and ambitious against the rights of conscience, and the privileges of freemen. The well known character of Mr. Colton, as an able, consistent, and persevering champion of christianity, as well as of Masonry, we think will give authority to his opinions, and weight to his arguments.—His high Masonic attainments enable him to judge correctly of the institution; and when we hear him give the most unqualified denial to the charges of blasphemy, profaneness, and immorality, who will doubt his word? When we hear him affirm its innocency and benevolence of design, and beneficence in execution, who will disbelieve his report? Is his testimony to be overborne by the studied malediction of such men as Pease, and Thacher, and Bernard, whose mutability of opinion, is, only equalled by their instability of purpose? Is testimony, having probability, and circumstances in its favor, to be discredited by counter testimony, given under a strong bias of interest, and personal popularity? We cannot doubt, that the enlightened and liberal, will justly estimate the testimony of those several witnesses, and concur in rendering a verdict in favor of steady habits and honest purposes. We have no fears for the result—scrutiny and examination we solicit.—

'I venerate the man

Whose heart is warm, whose hands are pure,
Whose language, and whose life, coincident,
Exhibit lucid proof, that he is honest
In the sacred cause.'

ADDRESS.

You have heard of the Gordian knot. Historians inform us that Alexander, in a fit of vexation, because he could not discover the secret of untying it, raised his sword, and determined with a single blow to end a difficulty, which he had not the sagacity to comprehend, nor the magnanimity to let alone.

Much like this is the feeling that has of late prevailed, in relation to the Masonic Institution. While some affect to consider it too contemptible to deserve attention; while some decry it as dangerous, and while others have tortured their invention in trying to find out its secrets, not a few in a fit of vexation have resolved, with one blow to end the inquiry by cutting the knot, which they have not the skill to untie.

Under this paroxysm of feeling, a war of extermination has been proclaimed. No truce is to be allowed—no quarter is to be given. Absolute, unqualified submission, is the only condition of peace. Such are the feelings, which have of late been excited in relation to the Masonic Institution, and which, it has been the endeavor of individuals, to urge forward into an irreconcilable hatred and an unrelenting persecution.

Called to address you under such circumstances, it is no easy matter to select, from the variety of subjects that present themselves, a topic to which, for a few moments, your attention may most properly be directed. The history of the Institution; the principles on which it is founded, the salutary influence it has had on society, and its ability to become more extensively useful, are themes, which have often, on such occasions, been discussed.—Passing these, therefore, some may expect, that, in opposition to the attack recently commenced against the Institution, I should undertake its defence. This might be done, and this defence would furnish a subject, to which our attention might be profitably directed. I will not, however, spend the time allotted to me in undertaking to defend that, which, for the sake of Masons, needs no defence, and to defend which, in the view of enemies, would be worse than useless.

There are other topics that press upon our attention.—Under the ostensible plea of opposing Masonry, an attack has been made upon rights and privileges that lie at the foundation of all good society. Masons, it is true, are the immediate object of the attack, but should the demand made upon them be admitted, there is not a man in the community, who would be secure in his right for a moment. Masons, therefore, are not the only persons concerned, in the cause now pending before the public. Others are alike concerned, and the question at issue is one, in which the dearest interest of individuals and of society are at stake.

Allow me, then, to ask your attention, to a brief examination of some of the claims of this antimasonic opposition—and to some remarks on the utter incompatibility of these claims with the rights of individuals, and on the duty of Masons, in view of the existing circumstances of their Institution.

The principle, which, if I understand it, is assumed as the basis of the prevailing excitement, is, that the Institution is dangerous to the community, and hazardous to personal safety. And in accordance with this principle, no pains have been spared, to create and strengthen the impression, that Masons are unworthy of confidence, and unfit for stations of public trust. Attempts have been made, to exclude them from offices, which they have long sustained, and in instances not a few, attempts have been made, to exclude them from Christian privileges, as members of churches. These measures have all been attempted, and the work of proscription has not only been commenced, but, in many places, has been carried to the greatest extent that public sentiment would allow. Nor has this proscription been confined to Masons. Individuals, not Masons, who have dared to question the propriety of the course adopted, have been loaded with opprobrious names, with a view to bring them into public contempt.

A more particular detail of the assumed principles, and of the practices of this antimasonic excitement, is not necessary at this time, for the history of the excitement, is too well known to need a recapitulation. Suffice it to observe, in relation to some of them, that they are utterly incompatible with the rights of individuals, and subversive of the fundamental principles of liberty.

A demand is made upon Masons, that Masonry shall be renounced, at the expense of forfeiting the confidence and favor of all, who are not members of the Institution. This is the spirit that is breathed forth, in the numerous publications, which have been enlisted on that side of the question; in the addresses, and what are called lectures, that have been delivered in various parts of the country, and particularly in the resolutions, that have been passed in antimasonic conventions. That I have no objection to this demand in too strong terms, may be deduced by numerous facts to which I refer you. What less than this, can we infer from votes that have been passed in antimasonic meetings, and even in Ecclesiastical bodies, where the subject has been taken up, discussed, and consequent measures pursued? What less can we infer from the votes that have been passed in some churches, concerning the fellowship of members? What less than this can be inferred from the votes of some of our towns, in the selection of names for jurors? What less from the votes of many political meetings, and other assemblies that have been called for the purpose of expressing the feelings of the members?

Again then I ask, what is the Mason required to yield? The same that every man may be called to yield, should he happen to be so unfortunate, as to be obnoxious to a party—viz. the right of private opinion. And suppose the Mason should yield, what will be the result? He has consented to be controlled by others in his opinions. He has given a pledge that whenever a demand is made upon him, he will consent to submit to dictation. This would be the first, and a rapid step, towards establishing a tyrannical government. And I hesitate not to say, that the moment an individual yields to such a demand, he forges a chain for himself, that he can never break.

This demand, therefore, involves the general interest of society, as well as those of the Mason. Nay, should Masons consent to yield to the demand, every discerning man would object; for in that act he would see but too plainly, a signal for a demand to be made upon himself.—This demand is, therefore, so incompatible with the principles of liberty, that antimasons do themselves compel Masons to say they cannot comply; for they demand a surrender, not of what belongs to them as Masons merely, but a right enjoyed in common with other citizens; a right, which they cannot surrender, without surrendering all that is dear to them as men. Had the demand been limited within the bounds of sober conviction; had it proceeded no further than reason would justify; had it been based upon evidence of wrong, Masons might have yielded to the weight of argument. But to ask men to yield to such a demand as that which is now made, is but to require them to make a yoke for their own necks, or submit to be trampled on at pleasure.

Rather than submit to such a demand as this, give me my dwelling in the lonely forest; let my covering be the broad canopy of Heaven, and my food the spontaneous productions of the earth.

But this incompatibility is not the only objection to the claims of antimasonry. They are unreasonable.

That individuals have a right to associate themselves together for the purposes of business, for mutual improvement, or for social enjoyment, provided the principles of association involve nothing contrary to the public good, will not I suppose, be called in question. Nor will any one doubt, whether such an association may not prescribe its own rules for the management of its concerns, and its own terms, on which new members shall be received. So far then, the Masonic Institution stands on the same footing with every association. The object is, mutual improvement, mutual and peculiar assistance in the duties and trials of life. But it is said the association is peculiar, for it has some things, intended to be secret, and thus it becomes a dangerous Institution. That there are things connected with the Institution, which are intended to be known only to the members, I do not deny. These however, have no connection with the principles of the Institution, which are open to the world, nor have they any possible connection with the public good, so that they can either benefit or injure. The forms and ceremonies of initiation, and the tokens whereby the members know each other, are all that can be considered secret. And if to keep these secrets be a crime, where is there an association, to which the same objection may not be urged? For where is there an association, formed for business or pleasure, or improvement, that does not assume the right of prescribing the terms of initiation, and of directing the mode and manner of operations, and all this, without publishing to the world

DR. ABNER PHELPS.

The consummate impudence of the man whose name stands at the head of this article, has rarely been equalled, never surpassed. On Thursday, Aug. 26, 1830, a meeting was held at Faneuil Hall, to determine on the question, 'Can any man, under the influence of Masonic oaths, discharge with fidelity the duties of any important office in the gift of the people, according to the true nature of our Free Institutions?' Dr. Abner Phelps, who, it is believed, was father of this infamous question, was called to the chair. And, mirabile dictu! Doctor Abner Phelps, a man of obscure life, who escaped from his Theologia Baccalaureus into Medicina Doctor by a nimble process sometimes termed per saltu, or, as the casuists would have it, via flagrante—this man, without qualification to become a leader in the medium ranks of society, did unblushingly—no, it is said he did blushingly—take the chair on that occasion. If Doctor Abner Phelps did, indeed, blush, there is a space for charity to entertain one poor hope, that the current, which rushed upon his cheek, will return to the cold and frozen recesses of his heart, and warm them into the indulgence of some of the ordinary affections of human life. We hail it, if not as an omen of returning good sense, at least as a mark of repentance for past folly. Let Doctor Abner Phelps go on—for there is a long catalogue of follies and peccadilloes that need repentance.

The belief is charitably entertained that even he, although 'under the influence of' antimasonry, may 'discharge with fidelity the duties' incumbent on an honest man; provided he enters on the work sincerely and steadily. This, surely, is yielding to him the ability to perform what is made questionable by the consideration of the 'Great Meeting at Faneuil Hall,' as applied to 'any man under the influence of Masonic oaths.' He seems to transfer the application of his belief in human depravity wholly to the devoted heads of those 'under the influence of Masonic oaths; and would as willingly transfer to himself and his associates 'any important office in the gift of the people—according to the true nature of our Free Institutions!' Well may he exclaim, excudi monumentum perenne aeris; for he has, indeed, erected to himself a monument of brass, that shall endure as long as the name of Doctor Abner Phelps.

If the people of Boston could be made to believe, that Masons are worthy of public confidence, for that is the plain, undisguised meaning of the question, Doctor Abner Phelps, and his associates, would greatly increase their chances to obtain 'any important office in the gift of the people—according to the true nature of our Free Institutions.' By enlarging the question, or rather, by inducing the people to circumscribe their good sense, their chances of success might be very materially enlarged.—We may soon expect to hear, that the people are gravely called upon to determine, 'Can any man, under the influence of MORAL OBLIGATIONS, discharge with fidelity the duties of any important office in the gift of the people, according to the true nature of our Free Institutions?' The boldness of the question is no argument against the project; and as Doctor Abner Phelps and his associates have nothing to lose, but something to gain, the policy of trying the question will be taken into their wise consideration. If they can exclude all men under the influence of moral obligations, their chances of success would truly be increased.

During the evenings of Aug. 26th and 30th, and the morning of the 31st, the Moderator exhibited great firmness of purpose, and a determination to conquer the rebellious elements there congregated. More than once, even Henry D. Ward half shrank from the mighty torrent of popular indignation with which he contended; and more than once did Doctor Abner Phelps revive the drooping spirits of the declaimer, by the voice of encouragement.—'Go on!' said the Doctor.—'They will not hear me,' said Ward.—'Humble the mob!' cried the Doctor.—'They will not be humbled,' replied Ward. And this was uttered by Ward in the bitterness and disappointment of his heart. His eye fell upon the Doctor; and then, even the cheek of Doctor Abner Phelps was blanched with that mixed, indefinable expression, which indicated the downfall of his antimasonic honors—and some fears for his personal safety.

This man must have perceived, for every one else had seen, from the beginning, that public sentiment was opposed to the adoption of the disgraceful question there offered for discussion. The opposition of the people had been clearly indicated. They had voted it out of the Hall. The obstinacy of the Moderator can only be explained by the supposition, that he thought a thorough excitement and disturbance to be the certain road to antimasonic success. There was more of craft than folly in the conclusion; and wiser heads have adopted the same means of success.

But Doctor Abner Phelps was compelled to yield to the force of circumstances. And when he declared the business of the meeting to be indefinitely postponed, his bitterest enemy, had he looked upon him at that moment, would have felt compassion for that disgraced and disappointed man.

ANTIMASONIC SYMPHONIES.

NO I.

A LAMENT.

All that have hearts to pity, pray draw near;
I'll tell a tale will start a burning tear.
When first we enter'd on the Anti plan,
Courage was high; we then stood man to man:
The brightest visions floated on our eyes;
Our glorious hopes reached to the very skies!
Boundless as space, our high ambition rose,
Nor did one doubt its shadow interpose.
'Twas plain, that Masons, by their secret art,
Ruled all our Country—e'en each distant part:
From blooming Florida to hardy Maine,
Places and honors followed in their train.
Its powerful Genius, like some heathen god,
Conferred its favors by the merest nod.
Some Gordian knot intwined the secret clan
In an unnatural compact, man with man.
Who could not loose, might boldly cut that knot;
And be an Alexander on the spot!
Fair reputations stood not in our way:
Their fame we blighted, e'en though fair as day.
It was a noble thought, to break them down:
But nobler, should success our efforts crown.
Could we but catch them in our wily toils,
'Twould be our right to share Masonic spoils!
But—when our hopes soared highest—when our arts
Were just prepared to catch the people's hearts—
Then, like a belting courser, off they sprang,
And left their masters into madness stung.
Oh! who will trust the vile canaille again!
There's nought so flexible as the mob, 'tis plain!
Over past greatness it is ours to mourn:
'Tis past dispute, our 'occupation's gone.'

THE ANTIMASONIC COMMITTEE, vs THE FANEUIL HALL RIOTERS.—The question has been frequently asked why have not the disturbers of the late meeting at Faneuil Hall been arrested? Having the following facts in our possession, we make them public for the benefit of all concerned, as an answer to this query. If it be true that a public disturbance was made—and if it be true that some of the names are known—and if it be true that 'the Antimasonic County Committee for the County of Suffolk,' desire to stir in this matter—why, it is asked, has not something been done? It is whispered, mark, it is whispered—for these are grave affairs and not to be talked of loudly—that 'the Antimasonic County Committee for the County of Suffolk' did, after their discomfiture at Faneuil Hall, forthwith proceed to their 'private retreats'—and there held solemn (and secret!) deliberations on the ways and means to be used in defence of an affair where so much of tender conscience and excellent reputation was concerned.

It was then and there determined to send for the civil officer (who was also, a very civil man) that attended them, and to require of him to prosecute, with all speed and diligence, each and every offender. 'We command you so to do,' says the Committee. 'Who are the offenders?' says the officer. 'The wicked Masons!' exclaim 'the Antimasonic County Committee for the County of Suffolk.' After much insisting on the one side, and demurring on the other, a number of names were given to the officer. 'Now, sir, do your duty,' cries one of the Committee, nearly choked with a very unpleasant sensation, spreading all over his features. 'Do your duty' sir, or you shall never again be employed by 'the Antimasonic County Committee for the County of Suffolk.' 'As to the employment, says the officer, 'that is a thing for which I have no desire whatever; but that I may discharge my duty, I will make a representation before the police magistrate. It is said he did make a representation, and that the magistrate informed him, it would be proper for some member of the Committee to take the responsibility of the prosecution. Afterwards, 'the Antimasonic County Committee for the County of Suffolk' proceeded to the police office, to wipe away, by assistance of law, the unseemly stains on the bright escutcheon of their fair fame; or, perhaps, to vindicate the majesty of the laws. 'Who will prosecute?' asked the magistrate. 'The Antimasonic County Committee for the County of Suffolk,' said they. 'But some one must make oath to a statement of facts,' said the magistrate. 'We'll do it in company,' said they. 'It cannot be made a company concern,' said the magistrate. 'Oho! we are all aground then,' said one of 'the Antimasonic County Committee for the County of Suffolk,' and he immediately cleared out. One by one they silently slunk away. But one was left. He rose, struck the point of his cane on the floor, and in great apparent agony cried out, 'It's of no use, no use whatever to prosecute; they never would be convicted!' He also cleared out, and that was the last that has been seen of 'the Antimasonic County Committee for the County of Suffolk.'—Commentator.

* The names of the gentlemen comprising this committee, as given in the Massachusetts Journal are, Thomas Barnes, Thomas Wally, Henry Gassett, George Odiorne, and two others—names unknown.

That most loathsome of all diseases, political antimasonry, has broken out in the once peaceful and happy borough of Mercer, Penn. Though the number infected by it is said to be comparatively small, yet its baneful influence has been already felt in the family circle, and in the church of God! Well may the people of that lovely village pray that its progress may be arrested. It is a fell pestilence, and carries desolation in its course. It blights the best affections of the heart, it destroys vital piety—and wo to that church which opens its portals to give it entrance!—The heart sickens at the contemplation of the moral waste which everywhere marks its progress. Let those who have never witnessed any of its fruits look to western New York; let them view the churches there laid waste—let them listen to the heart-rending recitals of families, and kindred, and friends divided and stirred up to implacable hatred against each other, by it, and they will regard with horror those who have been instrumental in introducing it among them. Was not party spirit sufficiently deleterious before? and must its bitterness be now increased ten thousand fold by blending it with our religious prejudices? For antimasonry does not halt at the ordinary bounds of piety; it visits the domestic fire side, and tells the wife that her husband, and the children that their father is a murderer and a blasphemer; it enters the church, and expels from the communion table the devout worshipper of the God of Peace and Justice; charity forsakes the heart of the christian and gives place to political and religious frenzy. These things are so, we have witnessed them. Let those who would preserve peace on earth and good will towards all men, unite voice and hand to expel the evil spirit of political antimasonry from among us.

ANTIMASONRY.—A very general inquiry begins to be made, 'What is Antimasonry?'—'what is its character?'—'what are its principles?'—'what are its objects?'—Meetings have been held—candidates presented—and every preparation made to organize an Antimasonic party.

The principles of Antimasonry are now on record, and if there be any thing detestable and wicked, as well as ridiculous and foolish, it is to be found in these principles. They openly avow that a large class of native born American citizens, of the purest and best of characters, are not to be believed on oath—that they are to be disfranchised, that they are unfit for jurors—and that they ought to be hunted down like wild beasts in an African desert.—These avowals are horrible—yet they are openly made in the west, and a party founded on such views, through their convention at Utica, call upon the intelligent people of New York to give currency to them, by supporting Francis Granger and Samuel Stevens. The attempt to propagate and organize Antimasonry in this city begins to deserve the serious examination of every man. Is it to succeed? or is it not? Are we to countenance such doctrines? or are we not?

NORFOLK.

From the published address of the republican party of the County of Lebanon, Pa. we make the following extract. Speaking of the sentiments of their Candidates they remark:—They are opposed to the disfranchisement or persecution of any sect or fraternity of men on account of their religious or moral principles or doctrines. They maintain, that, in a free country, the citizens should be permitted to associate together, for moral or for religious purposes, without being molested by those of their fellow citizens who may differ with them in opinion. So long as such an association does not interfere with the government of the country, or the national liberties, it is not only harmless, but may be deemed beneficial. The spirit of Antimasonry, if it should prove successful, will change its name, and become Anti-Methodist, Anti-Catholic, Anti-Presbyterian, Anti-Menonist, Anti-Moravian, or Anti-Lutheran. It is the spirit of persecution—of proscription. It denies to men an equality of rights and power. It says, 'you must believe what I believe—no more and no less—or you shall have no share of the sovereign power of the commonwealth.' It says, 'you are a Mason, a Catholic, a Lutheran, a Methodist, a Presbyterian,—you must renounce your faith; you must vilify those with whom you have entered into brotherhood; you must sacrifice your friends, and become hostile to them, or you must forfeit your privileges as an American citizen.

It is with pain and mortification that we have felt ourselves compelled to allude to this subject. An open and fair contest for political principles is salutary to the republic. But if one portion of the community can ride into power, upon the avowed purpose of depriving another portion of their rights because of their moral or religious opinions, then, indeed shall we suffer under a tyranny as odious as any that tramples on the monarchies of Europe.

THE ANTI'S LAMENT.

Farewell to the sweets of anticipation,
That nourish'd the hopes of our dissolute band!
Farewell to those prospects of grim desolation,
That threatened our favored and flourishing land:

The old thread-bare hobby, and gossiping story,
Is stale and obnoxious to plain common sense;
The 'workingmen' shares us of half of our glory,
That ever we hoped from the meanest pretence.

Then mourn! for our leaders have fled for protection,
From the sneers and contempt of an unfeeling world,
To the altar, forsooth, and bow'd in subjection
To truths that so often around them were hurl'd.

Our Hiram has left us—no more to condole us—
Since Solomon's shorn of his diadem's wreath,
And Henry, the GIANT, disdains to console us,
And friend 'honest John' seems gasping for breath.

But yet we have Frank, for Thurlow has said it,
To couple with Stevens, our hopes with despair,
Hermaphrodite system—the devil may wed it,
And those who have left us, attend—the infair.

Ye traitors who now in our troubles have left us,
To wander like Ishmalites covered with shame,
We sigh for long purses, of which you have reft us;
Or what was as well, to our paper, your name.

Be clothed, then, in sackcloth, ye desolate mourners—
Bedew your hard fate with penitent tears;
For here in this cold world, we're nought but sojourners—
Farewell, O, ye Champions, and bold Pioneers!

GENUINE PIETY.—A Conference of the antimasonic Baptists of this county was held last week in the town of Stockton, at which, in their great zeal to promote the missionary cause, the sum of sixty dollars, we are informed, was raised to send Elder Bernard, at his own urgent solicitation, to the great political Convention to be held at Philadelphia on the 11th inst. This we understand was the only sum contributed by them for either Bible, missionary or benevolent societies of any kind. And what a commentary does such a transaction afford upon the professors of that party. Here was a collection of professors of religion, who affected such a horror of every thing worldly as to refuse worshipping at the same altar with some of their brethren, because they are Masons, met together for the avowed purpose of transacting church affairs and promoting the interests of benevolent societies, and the only prominent act in which we find them engaged, is to adopt means to despatch their leading minister to a political convention formed of political gamblers, whose sole object is to obtain office. Does this 'look' right? Is it right? Let these who are not too prejudiced to do it, if any such there are, answer these questions.—Fredonia N. Y. Censor.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

THE EDITOR.

The following is given to the Philadelphia Gazette as an enumeration of the duties and rewards of an editor. We copy the article with some remarks suggested by our own experience.

Duty of a Newspaper Editor.—To peruse daily from forty to eighty American newspapers, with such attention as may be necessary from cul-ling from them such articles, great and small, as may suit the diversified tastes of a number of readers.

To peruse, with the same object, at least one regular file of a London daily newspaper—each paper containing as much matter as a volume of the Waverly novels.

To read from time to time, when the ships arrive from foreign ports, great bundles of papers in the French, Spanish, and Portuguese language; and, if the editor happens to understand those languages, occasional bundles in German and Italian.

To examine the English magazines, in search of anecdotes, tales and poetry, for ladies.

To examine the state documents which are issued by the Federal and State authorities—each of them as long as a speech in Congress, and as dry as a table of logarithms.

We say nothing of the duty of puffing new novels, recording daily occurrences and fitting the communications of correspondents for the press—(the last mentioned duty we more frequently neglect than perform.) Neither do we say any thing of attention to the mechanical affairs of the office, and to pecuniary concerns. We have said enough to show that every active editor of a paper, has a title to be ranked with the 'Working men' if he chooses.

Rewards of a Newspaper Editor. These generally consist more in kicks and cuffs, than in cop-pers. They are

To be reviled by the malignant, and misunderstood by the stupid.

To have your sentiments misconstrued, and your motives misrepresented.

To labor for years together, making great personal sacrifices, for the advancement, as you fancy, of important principles: and, after your labor is completed, to find that you were laboring only for the advancement of men in whom you never had any confidence.

To be courted by politicians on the eve of an election, and by men who are not politicians, on all occasions, when you can render them a service through your paper: and after these services are rendered, to be forgotten.

To hear each of your patrons declare himself friendly to the liberty of the press: and find that by liberty of the press, the great majority mean liberty to express sentiments exactly similar to their own, and none other.

To find even those whose general principles accord exactly with your own, depart from you, if you will not support some favorite project, which is perhaps incompatible with both your and their general principles, though they may not clearly see that incompatibility.

We would mention other rewards of a like nature, but these are sufficient.

We, in the interior, are for the most part, exempt from the labor of reading foreign newspapers, as we usually receive our intelligence from abroad, second-hand, digested and arranged by our brethren in the eastern cities.

We have no hesitation in saying that it is utterly impossible for any one man, however industrious, expert, and intelligent, properly to discharge all the duties appertaining to the superintendence of the editorial, pecuniary, and mechanical departments of an extensive newspaper establishment. The three departments are distinct, and require at least three separate heads. Throwing out of view therefore the management of the fiscal concerns and of the mechanical operations of an office in their respective details, the duties of an editor, strictly appertaining to his own department, are burdensome and laborious enough to occupy all his time, most faithfully devoted to them. The above enumeration is far from being complete. It is not only necessary carefully to examine an immense pile of newspapers, to read with attention magazines and reviews and new books as they appear, and to peruse public documents and speeches, but it is essential that an editor should think and study. He should be familiar with the progress of literature and science, should be capable of forming an opinion for himself, and of assigning his reasons for it, on all the prominent subjects that may agitate and divide the counsels of the nation or the thoughts of the people. He should read substantial books and standard works of authority, as well as newspapers and ephemeral publications. He should know something of political economy, of the great and intricate science of government, of natural philosophy; of the principles of morals, of modern discoveries and improvements in the mechanic arts, and in fine of all the various branches of intelligence which he is required occasionally to notice and allude to for the information of his readers. It is impossible for him to get along at all, even with tolerable success, without a familiarity with geography and history, and some considerable acquaintance with the internal condition and relative standing of the several nations of the world. While his mind should be occupied with the profoundest investigations and the most extensive range of practical studies, he is required to attend to petty details of every day occurrences. If a death happen, he is expected to know it instantly and to ascertain with accuracy the age of the deceased. If a marriage take place, he is expected to announce the fact, and to give the names of the parties, and of the officiating clergyman or magistrate with the utmost precision. He must be at the landing to notice the arrival of every boat, in the streets to witness every accident and affray, in the court house to report every interesting trial, at the taverns to learn ever 'distinguished' arrival, in the country to observe the state of the crops, &c., and yet his whole time he is required to spend in his office and study, poring over his books and papers, and preparing his editorial articles. Many things that are expected of him must of course be done by the agency and assistance of others, and yet those who alone can give the requisite aid are often surprised that facts pass unnoticed, or are incorrectly stated, of which they have taken no pains themselves to furnish accurate information.

The time of an editor might be fully occupied with the examination and perusal of newspapers alone. Yet we consider that task as a very inconsiderable portion of his duties and labors. The selection of topics for discussion in his editorial columns, the study of the subjects selected, the composition of essays, and the deliberate formation and support of his opinions, require much more time and a far greater amount of mental exertion, while attention to little matters of domestic occurrence, required by the just expectations of the community, is calculated to distract his mind and to unfit him for close, retired, and patient investigation.

In the discharge of editorial duty, the utmost constancy and punctuality must be observed. The paper must appear at the appointed time, and the editor must of course furnish appropriate matter for its columns. While others are amusing themselves, he must be at labor. The hour of midnight finds him almost invariably poring over the contents of the last mail, or making up for the interruptions of the day in the preparation of editorial articles. The earliest dawn frequently witnesses him in his office, revising proof-sheets and superintending the corrections of the paper of the day.

As to rewards for this incessant toil, the writer above quoted furnishes, indeed, but a sorry catalogue. They are undoubtedly truly stated, as far as the enumeration goes, but we have the satisfaction of knowing, that there are others more substantial and valuable. The consciousness of a faithful and successful discharge of duty, and of a happy influence in the community, is one which ought not to be lost sight of. It is of itself sufficient to cheer and sustain amidst the thousand pressing and discouraging circumstances which attend the best efforts of the honest and indefatigable editor.—Nashville Banner.

MANUFACTURE OF KNIVES.

The number of hands through which a common table knife passes in its formation is worthy of being known to all who use them. The bar steel is heated in the forge by the maker, and he and the striker reduce it in a few minutes into the shape of a knife. He then heats a bar of iron and welds it into the steel so as to form the tang of the blade which goes into the handle. All this is done with the simplest tools and contrivances. A few strokes of the hammer, in connection with some trifling moulds and measures, attached to the anvil, perfect in two or three minutes the blade and its tang or shank: Two men, the maker and the striker, produce about 9 blades in an hour, or 7 1-2 dozen per day. The rough blade thus produced then passes through the hands of the filer, who files the blade into form by means of a pattern in hard steel. It then goes to the hafters to be hafted in ivory, horn, &c. as may be required: it next proceeds to the finisher, and is then packed for sale or exportation. In this progression every table-knife or pen-knife, passes step by step through no less than sixteen hands, involving at least 144 separate stages of workmanship in the production of a single pen-knife. The prices vary from 2s. 6d. per dozen knives and forks to 10l.—In the manufacture of a razor, it proceeds through a dozen hands; but it is afterwards submitted to a process of grinding, by which the concavity is perfected, and the fine edge produced. They are made from 1s. per dozen to 20s. per razor, in which last the handle is valued at 16s. 6d. Scissors, in like manner, are made by hand, and every pair passes through sixteen or seventeen hands, including fifty or sixty operations, before they are ready for sale. Common scissors are cast, and when rivetted, are sold as low as 4s. 6d. per gross! Small pocket knives, too, are cast, both in blades and handles, and sold at 6s. per gross, or a half penny each! These low articles are exported in vast quantities in casks in all parts of the world. Snuffers and trays are also articles of extensive production, and the latter are ornamented with landscapes, etched by a Sheffield artist, on a resinous varnish, and finished by being dipped in diluted nitric acid for a few seconds or minutes.

EFFECTS OF REFRACTION.

Captain Scoresby, on his return from the first landing on the coast of Greenland, at Cape Lister, in lat. 70 degrees 30 minutes North, gave the following interesting account in his journal, of an extraordinary instance of the optical phenomena produced by refraction. 'It was about 11 P. M. the night was beautifully fine, and the air quite mild. The atmosphere, in consequence of the warmth, being in a highly refractive state, a great many curious appearances were presented by the land and ice bergs. The most extraordinary effects of this state of the atmosphere, however, was the inverted image of a ship in the clear sky, over the middle of the large bay or inlet before mentioned—the ship itself being entirely beyond the horizon. Appearances of this kind I have before noticed, but the peculiarities of this were, the perfection of the image, and the great distance of the vessel that it represented. It was so extremely well defined that, when examined with a telescope, made by Dolland, I could distinguish every sail, the general rig of the ship, and its particular character: insomuch that I confidently pronounced it to be my father's ship, the Fame, which it afterwards proved to be—though on comparing notes with my father, I found that our relative position at the time gave the distance from one another nearly 30 miles, being about seventeen miles beyond the horizon, and some leagues beyond the limits of direct vision. I was so struck by the peculiarity of the circumstance, that I mentioned it to the officer of the watch, stating my full conviction that the Fame was then cruising in the neighboring inlet.

AFFECTATIONS IN COMPOSITION.—The secret of good composition is to explain clearly, in the fewest possible, and most appropriate words, the thing to be expressed. The inflated style went out with Johnson, and his imitators—the antithetical died with Junius. The first-rate writers of our day think more of the matter than the manner: they occupy their minds with what they have to say, instead of fretting themselves about the mode of saying it. This was all that was wanting to produce perfection in English composition. Style has given way to perspicuity, which makes the best style. Diction, or elaborated or polished periods, is no longer the end instead of the means. Formerly people wrote to display their fine language, now they make language display their thoughts. That which is subservient in nature, they made artificially supreme; and when you expected to imbibe ideas, you were only involved in a labyrinth of phrases. If every man were to demonstrate first to himself what he desires to demonstrate to others, and then to transfer to paper the precise chain of reasoning by which he made the matter clear in his own mind, all writings would be intelligible. It is the laboring after modes of expression that produces obscurity. The less labor, the more simplicity, and simplicity is a quality of clearness.—The worst of all literary vices is that rhetorical flourish, which invests poverty of thought in a profusion of ornament and unnecessary verbiage.

MISCELLANY.

GEORGE BARNWELL.

Lillo's tragedy of 'George Barnwell,' which is a very great favorite in the country theatres, and which is usually performed once during the holidays every season, at Covent Garden and Drury Lane, was so popular when first produced at the latter theatre, that it was performed twenty nights in one season, to crowded houses; and Caroline, queen to George II, sent to the theatre for the manuscript, in order that she might peruse it.

This tragedy has generally been considered as an useful admonition to youth, and on one occasion at least, was the means of rescuing a young man from perdition. This was during the Christmas holidays, in 1752, when Mr. Ross played George Barnwell, and Mrs. Prichard, Millwood. A few nights afterwards, Dr. Harrowby, the physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, was sent for by a young gentleman in Great St. Helen's, who was apprenticed to a very eminent merchant. He found him very ill, and, as he suspected, of a complaint beyond the reach of medicine. The nurse told him, that she sighed at times so very heavily, that she was sure something lay heavy on his mind. The doctor requested to be alone with the patient, when, after much solicitation, he prevailed on the youth to unbosom himself. He said he was the second son of a gentleman in Hertfordshire; that he had formed an improper acquaintance with a female which had caused him to embezzle and expend money belonging to his employer, to the amount of £200. Two nights before the doctor saw him, he had seen Mr. Ross play George Barnwell, and was so forcibly struck with the coincidences between his own case and that of Barnwell, that he had not enjoyed a moment's peace since, and wished to die, that he might avoid the shame which he saw hanging over him. The doctor offered to intercede with the father of the young man for the money, and assured him that if he failed in getting it by that means, that he would furnish it himself. The father, who had been sent for, soon arrived. The doctor took him into a private room, and after explaining the whole cause of his son's illness, entreated him to save the honor of his family and the life of his son. The father instantly went to his banker for the money, while the doctor returned to his patient and informed him that everything would be arranged to his satisfaction, as his father would soon return with peace and forgiveness, and never mention, or even think of the subject again. The youth relieved from the load with which his mind was oppressed, soon recovered, and afterwards became a very eminent merchant. Mr. Ross, the performer, who had been so instrumental in saving the young man, and who relates the circumstance, said, he never knew either the gentleman or his name, but that for nine or ten years afterwards, he always received on his benefit a sealed note enclosing ten guineas, with these words:—'A tribute of gratitude from one who was highly obliged, and saved from ruin, by seeing Mr. Ross's performance of George Barnwell.'

The Newport, N. H. Spectator states, on the authority of a gentleman who keeps a record of the weather, that it had rained for fifteen successive Sabbaths previous to the 29th ult. This must have been a severe disappointment to dairy maids, who contrive to make a 'pretty considerable' display on the Sabbath, in their go-to-meeting clothes.

[In honor of the glorious Revolution in France, the abdication of Charles X. and the assembling of the Chambers of Deputies at Paris, the Marseilles Hymn of Liberty, was sung at the Tremont Theatre on Monday evening, last by Mr. Howard, and a full chorus, embracing the entire strength of the company. The tri-colored flag was flying through the day in front of the Theatre.

MARSEILLES HYMN.

Ye sons of freedom, wake to glory!
Hark! Hark! what myriads bid you rise;
Your children, wives, and grandaies hoary!
Behold their tears, and hear their cries!
Behold their tears, &c.
Shall hateful tyrants, mischief breeding,
With hireling host, a ruffian band,
Affright and desolate the land,
While peace and liberty lie bleeding.
To arms, to arms, ye brave!
Th' avenging sword unsheath!
March on, march on, all hearts resolv'd
On Victory or death.
March on, &c.

Oh Liberty! can man resign thee,
Once having felt thy gen'rous flame?
Can tyrants, bolts, and bars, confine thee,
Or whips, thy noble spirit tame?
Or whips, &c.
Too long our Country wept, bewailing
Blood-stained swords our conquerors wield,
But freedom is our sword and shield
And all their arts are unavailing.
To arms, to arms, ye brave!
Th' avenging sword unsheath!
March on, march on, all hearts resolv'd
On Victory or death.
March on, &c.

THE CONSTITUTION FRIGATE.

Proud ship! that earned our naval fame—
Highest on ocean's billow,—
Art thou to lose thy glory—name—
And wear the weeping willow?

Thy trophies, gained by daring—blood—
Must they at last be sold?
A nation's fame—a nation's good—
Bartered for paltry gold!

No, never! ship of peerless prow!
No, never, hope of seamen!
Hallowed of old!—yes, hallowed now,
Thou art the pride of freemen!

Unconquered still, by foreign foe,
Rest in thy quiet haven;
Let him who would desert thee, know
The lashes due a craven.

The noble blood spilt on thy deck
Makes holy all about thee!
Be, if thou pleasest, but a wreck,
We cannot do without thee!

Sail with but one timber, firm and sound;
One rag of canvass o'er thee;—
A thousand sailors can be found
On board who would adore thee!

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING SEPTEMBER 18, 1830.

HON. THOMAS KENDALL.

Our friends will read the subjoined communication from Mr. KENDALL, with much satisfaction. Not particularly that it exposes the reprehensible measures adopted by our opponents, for the accomplishment of their unhallowed purposes; but because it exonerates the respectable author from the disputable imputation which his supposed and apparent connexion with a faction, alike destitute of honor and of principle, necessarily attached to his reputation. And we would say to Mr. Kendall, in behalf of ARCHITECTUS and for ourselves, (and we will assume the responsibility in this case to speak in behalf of the members of the Masonic Institution,) that the fair and candid manner in which he has thrown off the stain that a few designing demagogues would, for their own personal aggrandizement, fasten upon his character, is honorable to himself and satisfactory to his vilified and persecuted Masonic friends. Mr. Kendall admits that 'Architectus had some reason to conclude that he approved' of the antimasonic address to the people of this State; and we are sure that he will admit also that Architectus treated him with all the delicacy and gentlemanly decorum that, under the admitted circumstance, he could expect. The public could not know, nor had Architectus any right to know, under what circumstances Mr. Kendall's name was attached to that address. To render Mr. K. responsible for the statements and arguments therein contained, it was sufficient that his name, without note or comment, was thereunto appended. Architectus did not consider either one of the other gentlemen of the committee worthy of public notice. He very properly selected Mr. Kendall as the only member of that committee whose weight of character was calculated to attach an importance to that document. He therefore held Mr. Kendall personally and singly responsible for whatever effect it might produce.—Mr. Kendall frankly and openly disclaims all agency in the production of that address. It therefore assumes the character of an anonymous slander, or a libel sent forth to the world by irresponsible individuals; and is no longer a matter of importance or of public interest.

We would not, by any means, question the purity of the motives which induced Mr. Kendall to lend his name, at all, to the antimasonic faction of this city. We have no doubt that his motives were pure and his intentions honorable; but at the same time we must express our deep regret that he permitted himself to be so egregiously deceived. It would be charging him with a want of knowledge of the common occurrences of the day, to suppose that he was ignorant of the principles and of the design of the antimasonic party, in other sections of the country. Indeed, he informed the gentlemen who solicited the use of his name, that he understood the nature of the excitement in the State of New-York; that it was proscriptive, and that if attempted to be introduced here, he 'should most decidedly oppose' it. The gentlemen assured him that 'no such measures were contemplated.' On this assurance he rather imprudently, (we must use the term,) loaned them his name and the weight of his character. They deceived him—they spoke after the manner of the father of lies; and Mr. Kendall was incautiously taken in the snare. Perhaps we ought not to blame him for this: other men, as wise and as good, have been deluded in like manner. We must say however, and we do it in perfect good nature, that he was imprudent in connecting himself with men whom he did not know, and in lending his influence for the promotion of an object, the character of which he did not understand, and the effect of which he could not foresee. Nor can we stop here. If we do not censure him for the act, we must regret its occurrence. We most sincerely regret (and we doubt not that Mr. K. will join us in the expression,) that he has permitted the unlawful use of his name for so long a time; that he has quietly permitted his signature, illegally attached to a document which he now acknowledges to be obnoxious, to be circulated throughout the country; to pass through several editions; to go forth before an intelligent and discerning public, sanctioning sentiments which are not his own and for which he is unwilling to be held responsible. We do not attach censure to Mr. K on this ground. We attribute this omission of what may be considered a duty he owed to himself, to his extreme reluctance to appear before the public in the character of a newspaper controversialist. We only regret that his diffidence in this case should have gained the ascendancy over his judgment. The moment the address of the 'Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts' went forth, that moment went forth the alleged sentiments of the Hon. Thomas Kendall. They instantly become a species of public property; and it was not only their right, but a duty belonging to the people, individually and collectively, to inquire into their validity; and to estimate the talents and to infer the motives of the writer, from the result of their inquiries. If the statements were found to be false in point of fact, the argument predicated on false promises and the reasoning illogical, (which is strictly true in regard to the address,) it is fair to call in question the motives or to implicate the intellectual powers of its authors. That the motives of the Committee have been seriously considered, and that they have been adjudged by an impartial public, to be sinister and reprehensible, is sufficiently indicated by the present state of public opinion. If the people believed the authors of that address, the Masonic Institution would have, ere now, been immolated on the altar of public vengeance. But they do not believe them. The authors themselves do not believe what they have written. The public have adjudged them and their motives. They had a right to do so. No matter what extent of modesty and self-distrust may have marked his former life; no matter with what retiring delicacy, he may have shrunk from the glare of public observation, the moment an individual throws his sentiments and his weight of character into the scale of party contention, that moment he puts himself on the public, and he trusts to that public for the issue, whether of weal or woe. Though it cannot be said that Mr. Kendall placed himself before the public in this position, yet he has so stood. He was unwittingly placed there by men, alike reckless of their own and of the characters of others. That he has suffered, in consequence, in the estimation of many of his friends, is a truth within our knowledge; but that the honorable course he has now pursued, will redeem him in the estimation of those friends, is morally certain. Indeed, he may not be held responsible for the use made of his name; though it is to be regretted that he has so long deferred the explanation. The use of his name was a down right forgery. The Convention had no more right to attach his name to their address and pass it upon the public, than they had to fix it to a note of hand and discount it at one of our Banks. It is as much forgery in the first case, as it is in the latter. It is a false use of his name, and the Convention, or whoever committed or authorized the forgery, should be held responsible to the violated laws of the country. It is true there was no pecuniary value attached to it; but there was a value of more consequence: his character and influence were put at stake; the weight of which was of as much consequence to the Convention, as would be the weight of his purse. No Bank was to be defrauded of its funds; yet the public were to be cheated and deceived, or there would have been no occasion for the forgery. If nothing were to be gained by the use of Mr. Kendall's name, why was it attached to the address, when he had no agency whatever in preparing that production? Why was he not consulted in relation to the matter? Did the managers of the concern know Mr. Kendall's views? Did they know that he would not sanction the sentiments contained in that document? and did they fear that he would forbid them the use of his name if applied to? Such seem to be the facts.—We leave the public to estimate the character of this transaction; to say to what respect such men are entitled; and what degree of credence should attach to their slanderous productions.

To the Editor of the Boston Masonic Mirror.

In your paper of the 21st ult. I have read a letter addressed to me by Architectus, who seems to hold me responsible for all the sentiments and doctrines contained in a report, prepared and published by the Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts, addressed to the people. I am sensible, Architectus had some reason to conclude that I approved of that Address, inasmuch as my name was appended to the printed copy; but I would inform him that whatever praise or censure attaches to the authors of that production, I disclaim having any share therein, as I had no agency in it whatever; unless it be that I offered the motion to raise a committee to report an address. A simple statement of facts will, I presume, convince Architectus, and every candid mind, that I am not answerable for any sentiment or principle contained in that report. I went into this hall about an hour after the time appointed for the meeting of the Convention. I was soon placed on a Committee for the purpose of reporting an address to the people of this State. After remaining about two hours at the meeting, I returned home and wrote a note to the Moderator, informing him that an afflictive occurrence in my family would prevent my serving on that committee, and another gentleman was immediately appointed in my place; here ended all my connexion with that Convention. I never saw, or heard that report, or any part thereof, until after it appeared in print: of course I could not have signed it, neither did I give my consent to have my name appended to it, nor was I consulted upon the subject in any way whatever. I do not consider myself called upon at this time, to make known my views relative to Masonry or Antimasonry; but Justice to myself requires me to state some of my remarks to the Gentlemen who solicited me to accept the appointment of delegate to the Convention. I observed to them: 'I expect the gentlemen have mistaken their man; it is true I am not a Mason, and that is all the anti there is about me, and if the object is to get up an excitement, similar to that which exists in the State of New-York, I shall oppose it with all my might, and should there be any thing like proscription attempted, that also I should most decidedly oppose.' After these remarks, and others of similar import, I was assured that no such measures were contemplated. One more remark and I will quit this subject, I hope forever. Should any of my friends wish further to ascertain my sentiments on the the Masonic Question, I respectfully refer them to a pamphlet written by one of the best of men, (although a Mason) Rev. JOSEPH EMERSON, of Wethersfield, Conn. and published in the year 1829, being a letter addressed to the members of the Genesee Consoociation of N. Y.

THOMAS KENDALL.

Boston, Sept. 9, 1830.

THEATRICAL.—We have not room to speak of the performances of the past week as they merit. The attractions have been unusually numerous and varied. Mrs. Sharpe, from N.Y. appeared on Monday evening, as the representative of Belvidera, in Otway's popular tragedy of Venice Preserved: Pierre, by Mr. Pearson. Both parts were creditably sustained. When Mr. P. shall have become better acquainted with our stage, and with those by whom he is to be sustained, we have no doubt that he will prove himself to be the best stock performer in his line, that we have had in this city for many years past. Mr. Russell made his first appearance on Wednesday evening, and fully satisfied the high expectations of his friends. M. Barbere and Madame Labasse have added much to the richness of the entertainments of the week, by their 'pirouettes and pigeon-wings.' Miss George and Mr. Howard are engaged, and will appear in the early part of next week.

A Liverpool paper of the 9th ult. (Monday) has been received at New-York. The Archbishop of Rheims, who was confessor to Charles Tenth, landed at Dover, August 6th. Several vessels, American and English, were said to be proceeding from Liverpool to French ports for the purpose of conveying persons who may wish to emigrate to the western world in consequence of recent events.

ANOTHER ANTIMASONIC RIOT.

From the Springfield Journal we learn that a scene not very dissimilar to that which was recently enacted here, to the ruin of ant Masonry and to the disgrace of ant Masons, was exhibited on the 31st ult. to the quiet citizens of Springfield. There are a few restless political demagogues in the western part of this state, who have been unusually active for a year past in their efforts to create an excitement among the people: to introduce into our most peaceable and flourishing villages, the antimasonic curse. But the incorruptible integrity and sterling intelligence of the yeomanry of Massachusetts, have rendered those efforts, if not wholly, in a great degree, unavailing. The little contemptible clan of anties, at the head of whom is Gen. Elihu Hoyt, 'Sheriff of Franklin County,' have been taught a lesson by the people of Springfield, that they will not soon forget; one which, if properly regarded, may be of incalculable benefit to them. It tells them, in unequivocal language, that the constitutional rights of any portion of their fellow-citizens are not to be trampled under foot with impunity; and if they so view it, they may save themselves from further disgrace. The people of this city and of Springfield have publicly and unequivocally declared, that they hold Masons to be as good citizens as others:—they care not a rush, if a man be an honest and useful member of society, whether he be a Mason or not.—They will not, therefore, permit the persecuting and proscription spirit of ant Masonry to reign among them. They will not stand quietly by and see their friends and neighbors robbed of their birthright; they will not see them hunted down like convicts fleeing from justice, and branded as outlaws, by an unholy combination of men, for whose characters or talents honest people can have no respect. Whatever influence ant Masons may heretofore have had—whatever claim their motives and opinions may have had to the respect and consideration of the reflecting part of the people of the commonwealth, has been sacrificed to their own unheated ambition and uncontrollable passions. They have voluntarily, by their own rashness, by a premature development of their own corruption, brought ruin upon their party, and covered themselves with disgrace. They are fallen beneath all redemption. They are become as harmless, as their motives are contemptible.

On the evening previous to the day appointed for the meeting of the antimasonic convention, the citizens of Springfield assembled and elected forty delegates. 'And be it understood, that not an individual acting in that meeting was a Mason.' On the succeeding morning, Tuesday, the 31st ult. the delegates convened in the Town Hall, for the purpose "of choosing a County Antimasonic Committee, as recommended by the State Convention; and also, one or more delegates to represent said County in the National Antimasonic Convention, at Philadelphia, on the 11th of September next; and also to take into consideration the expediency of establishing a Free Press in the County, and for such other purposes as may then and there come before them," and so far organized the meeting as to make choice of Col. JAMES BARLOW, of Granville, for President of the Convention; Mr. Calvin Stebbins, of Wilbraham, Vice President, and Doct. Samuel B. Barlow, of Granville, Secretary.

'The next thing in order,' says the Journal, 'was to ascertain who were delegates, and a motion was made that the credentials should be read. The secretary then read the returns of the delegates from Granville, Wilbraham and Springfield—delegates attended from Monson, but produced no credentials. The returns from Granville were signed by the President and countersigned by the Secretary—the returns from Wilbraham wanted the signature of the Secretary of their meeting—the returns from Springfield wanted the signature of the President of their meeting. The last was explained by the Secretary of the Springfield meeting, as also subsequently by the President of said meeting, who put his signature to the proceedings.

A motion was then offered that all who were certified should be considered as legally returned—this motion was declared by the chair to be carried but was doubted. The question then recurred, Who are legally returned delegates to the Convention? and this was the bone of contention!—A portion of the Granville delegates contended that their delegation only were legally returned—that they were the only the 'Simon Pures'—that they should organize themselves into a Convention and subsequently act upon the claims of other delegates. This modest proposition was refused. A motion was then offered, that all the delegates returned from the several towns, should be considered as entitled to a seat. This motion the president did not offer to the meeting. The debate then commenced in earnest, and consumed the time of the convention until the hour of one P. M.—the convention then adjourned for one hour.

At about 2, P. M. the Convention again met, and the previous question, if there was one, was again debated in a stormy and almost riotous manner for two hours. A motion was then offered, by one of the Granville delegation, that the convention adjourn without day. This motion was debated for some time, when another of the Granville delegation moved that the convention adjourn for one hour—the previous question [there being some twenty previous questions open] was then called for, and the chairman said, as he could no tell who was entitled to vote, he should declare, of his own power, the meeting adjourned. The chairman's power to declare the convention adjourned was questioned and denied, and the chairman, feeling his incompetency to control so stormy a debate, left the chair, and the delegates of Granville, Wilbraham and Monson left their seats, and a portion of them were any thing but orderly. The meeting now began to be even more tumultuous than hitherto, and some hissing was heard in the galleries. The seceders then retired to the Eagle Tavern and listened to an address from Gen. HOYT, High Sheriff of Franklin County. Of its merits we know nothing, but we have been informed that it was of the 'death's head and bloody-bone' character, usual in Antimasonic addresses.

Upon the former chairman's leaving the chair, the remaining members of the convention called ELIAZER WILLIAMS, Esq. to the chair and appointed Mr. Charles A. Mann, Secretary. A resolution was then offered by George Ashmun, Esq., 'that whereas no proceedings have been at any time had, by any secret societies within the county of Hampden, which have been productive of mischief or disturbance in the community, and whereas we look upon the individuals composing the several Masonic bodies as quiet, peaceable, orderly citizens and neighbors; and whereas there are no less than four free presses within said county—therefore, it is at this time inexpedient to choose an antimasonic county committee as recommended by the state convention—or a delegate to the National Antimasonic Convention in Philadelphia, or to establish another free press in this county.'

The convention then adjourned without day.

And thus ended the Convention, and though amusing, yet take it all in all, we hope 'never to look upon its like again.' It was the most farcical farce that we ever witnessed, and sincerely hope that it may prove the means of preventing the antimasonic excitement from ever coming within our borders. It has at least proved to some of our would be reformers, that the good citizens of this town will oppose the intrusion, of any subject, calculated to disturb the peace, order and good fellowship that now characterize this town.

THE GRAND CONVENTION!

By the New-York papers we learn that the antimasonic political missionaries, now assembled at Philadelphia, had the bare-faced impudence to petition the authorities for the use of 'Independence Hall!' That Hall, sacred to liberty, they would profane by their unhallowed presence! Of course, their petition was promptly rejected. Had the authorities been imprudent enough to have granted their request; had this gang of political demagogues been permitted to pollute the place where the banner of Independence was first raised, the freemen of Philadelphia would have rattled the walls about their ears.—They would not have quietly submitted to such a base and villanous outrage. The petitioners ought to have been tarted and feathered, and rid out of the city on a rail, for their insolence in making such a request. Were the antimasonic party composed of honest men, we should have some pity for them; on account of the defeat and disgrace which attend all their recent movements. But they are a combination of political knaves, and merit only the scorn and contempt of an insulted and indignant public.

The Philadelphia Gazette of Saturday says, the Convention commenced its session, on the District Court Room, that morning. A Mr. Ritner was appointed Chairman pro tem. and a Mr. Clarke, Secretary. Then Amasa's 'occupation 's gone!' Poor fellow! like Sawney, he 'd better be ganging back agen! The delegates present, ninety-nine in number, then elected Frank Granger, the would-be governor of New York, President. Four Vice Presidents were then chosen, viz. Mr. Ritner, of Pennsylvania, Doctor Abner Phelps, of Boston! and a gentleman from Ohio, (probably the lost delegate, spoken of in the article below,) and another from Michigan territory (the Judge Dexter who recently figured in this city?) A committee was appointed to consider the subjects which should be discussed! Fudge! They have but two objects in view—to slander the Masons, and to devise means for their own elevation to office. They must be stupid blockheads, indeed, if they have not learned to do this secundum artem, after three year's practice! Here endeth the work of the first day.

POST OFFICE.—The Post Office was removed on Saturday evening last, to the elegant and commodious apartments, fitted up under the direction of Mr. GREENE, in the 'CITY HALL.' Our Post Office is now, where it ought to have been years ago. It is one of the most commodious and elegant in the country, and our citizens are deeply indebted to Mr. Greene for his enterprise and liberality. To him, more than to any other individual, we are indebted for all the improvements which have been made on the building where the office is now located. We believe that it is generally admitted, on all hands, that the office was never under better regulations; nor have we ever had a Post Master who has more zealously aimed to give general satisfaction.

JUVENILE MISCELLANY.—The first number of the fifth volume of this highly interesting and valuable little work, is just published. We have often spoken of its merits, and need, therefore, at this time, only say, that the present number sustains the high character of its predecessors. It is published by Putnam & Hunt, Cornhill, at $2 a year. Let every parent put it into the hands of his children.

FRANCE.—The latest accounts from France, state that the King had abdicated the throne, given up the crown jewels, and determined to embark, with his family, for the United States. The Duke of Orleans will probably fill the vacated throne.

DELEGATE LOST.—The Erie, Penn. Observer says—'One of the intelligences, representing "nine counties" in Ohio, arrived one day last week, inquiring the way to Philadelphia. The good natured gentleman of "our town," whose business it is to forward men and baggage, we learn was so kind as to label him properly, "this side up," and forward him "with care and speed" "to the care of Grand Master Thurlow Whisker Clipper, Albany." There is no doubt he will reach the consignee in safety.'

MARRIED.

In this City, on Thursday Evening, Sept. 9th, by the Rev. Mr. Malcolm, Mr. Trueman Ripley Hawley to Miss Harriet Augusta Tobey.

In Ellsworth, Me. on the 17th ult. by the Rev. P. Nourse, Col Joseph A. Dean to Miss Eliza Fales, both of Ellsworth.

In Eden, Me. on 3d ult. Mr. William Somerby, of Ellsworth, to Miss Maria Thomas, of Eden.

In Mendon, Mr. Josiah Gummings, to Miss Celia Capron.

THE WREATH.

THE WHITE LADY.

Translated from the German by Lord F. Levesan Gower.

Our troops went forth on Sarfeldt's morn,
Beneath their monarch's eye,
And merrily peal'd the yager's horn,
As the guard was marching by.

At first and last the howitzers past,
And the battery's iron train,
And all to throw the desperate cast
Upon Jena's fated plain.

The march they play'd was sweet to hear,
The sight was fair to see;
It smoo'd our Frederic's brow austere,
And Blucher smil'd with glee.

That sight was fair to all but those
Who own'd prophetic fears;
And sweet that martial strain arose
To all but gifted ears.

And was there none in dream or trance
Could follow the column's way,
And with the vulture's prescient glance
The death-doom'd troops survey?

Yes, close at hand she had taken her stand,
I saw and I mark'd her well;
'T was she who wanders through the land,
Whose name I fear to tell.

They saw not her form, nor her visage of grief—
It was not that their sight was dim;
But fixed on his troops were the eyes of their chief,
And their glances were fixed on him.

But I knew her at once by her long lank hair,
And the garments as white as snow;
And she linger'd there in her still despair
And scowl'd on the troops below.

I knew her at once for a lady who wends,
Impell'd by the curse divine,
And who wanders abroad when woe impends
Upon Prussia's regal line.

I have kept the night-watch, where she chiefly issaid
To roam by the ruinous stair;
I should not have trembled, I should not have fled—
For I could have faced her there.

For I feared not the sight of the lady in white
By the moonlight's spectral ray,
In the hall of our kings, at the hour of night;
But I shrunk from the vision by day.

Yet I thought that the fortunes of Prussia decreed
By questioning her to know;
So right to that lady I spur'd my steed,
Till no nearer he would go.

For he rear'd at the sight of the lady in white,
And he stopp'd in his full career,
She spoke, and her words, when I heard them aright,
They curdled my blood for fear.

'Now trouble me not—I list to the shot—
On Sarfeldt I see the dead;
Disturb me no more—I weep for your lot'
Was all that the lady said.

She strided away, and I could not tell where,
For a shuddering seized my frame;

And whither she vanish'd I cannot declare,
And as little know whence she came.

But as Sarfeldt's fight, since the morning light,
The Frenchman had fired well,
And the lady had spoken that moment aright
When Louis of Prussia fell.

MR. COLTON'S ADDRESS.

But it is said the Masonic Institution requires a special obligation. And where is there an association that does not, either formally, or by implication require the same? But it is said, this obligation binds the members to the performance of duties inconsistent with the public good.—This insinuation is flatly denied. Nor will any Mason, who understands himself, ever assert it. Seceding Masons, I know, the better to justify themselves before the public in denouncing the Institution, have asserted this. I would charitably hope they can plead ignorance of the obligation, in excuse for their assertion; for it is certainly without foundation. Let the obligation be what it may, every candidate for initiation, is expressly informed, previous to taking it upon himself, that it requires nothing of him inconsistent with his duty to his Country, or to God. He has, therefore, no right to interpret the obligation, as implying a liberty to violate the peace of society in any case whatever. And it is a gross slander to insinuate such a thing concerning the Institution.

What then is there in the Masonic Institution that can form a just cause of alarm? Based on the purest principles of morality, designed as the means of promoting social intercourse; having nothing secret that can in the least degree affect the condition of any without, what is there in it that need excite the public odium? But it is said that it has been made a political engine. And suppose this were true, is the Institution to be condemned because it has been perverted? Why not then condemn the Church; why not condemn every literary association, and every benevolent Institution?

Again, it is said that Masonry has been the means of impeding the course of justice, of condemning the innocent and clearing the guilty. I grant that this has been said, but I deny that it is with any just foundation, so far as the principles of Masonry, or its obligations are concerned.—It is said, also, that Masonry sanctions the violations of private rights. This is downright falsehood, and no man would ever think of asserting it unless to support a bad cause, and the better to vindicate himself in defaming the character of the Institution. But it is still further said, that Masonry encourages partiality in society, by binding its members to particular duties among themselves. I admit that the members are under peculiar obligation to each other, but not to the detriment of society, nor when their duty as good citizens require them to take an opposite course. And what association is there, where a similar feeling is not expected? Does not every member of a Mechanic, an Agricultural, or Literary Association cherish the same feeling? But Masonic charity, it is said, is a system of selfishness, being wholly confined to the members of the Association. This is not true. All men are to be objects of his concern, but if a Masonic brother is to be the first object of attention, what is there in this, inconsistent with reason, or the practice of the best of men? Would any one expect a brother to leave a brother to perish, that he might help a stranger? Where then is the crime, that a Mason should first exercise his charity upon his suffering brother?

But it is said that the Masonic Institution, operating in secret, is liable to be perverted. This objection is not without foundation. Bad men, obtaining the control of such an association, may sometimes make use of the secrecy, as the means of carrying on their selfish schemes. Against this evil a remedy is provided, in the union of virtuous men; for as all the transactions of a Lodge are open to each individual member, any improper proceeding is liable to be exposed, if good men are found in the body sufficient to do it. In reply to this, it is said they would not dare to expose a fault. Such an assertion is too idle to be admitted by any one, who knows anything of the Institution. No member is bound to keep as a secret, an act done in a Lodge, to the injury of the community. Nay, more, he is bound to proclaim every such act, and so far from having anything to fear, there is not a Lodge in the land, that would dare to censure him for his boldness. Is it reasonable then to decry an Institution as base and destructive, against which, no other objection can be urged? Is it reasonable to denounce an Institution, which, if not possessing all the positive excellencies it might, is yet harmless in its character?

But, beside this unreasonableness in opposing the Institution, there is a like unreasonableness, as well as much inconsistency in the manner of conducting the opposition.—At one time, we are told, it is contemptible, and then all the arts of ridicule are mustered to make it appear odious. At another time, it is clothed in all the array and terror of the Inquisition, and then men are called upon to watch its movements with a jealous eye. At one time we are told, that its members are not worthy of confidence—at another, the same bold calumniator honestly confesses that the members with whom he is acquainted, are as upright and honorable men as any that Society numbers. At one time, we hear an individual denouncing Masonry in every stage, and in every feature of the Institution—at another, this same individual, pressed for proof of his assertion, confesses that the wickedness consists, not in anything he has seen, but in higher departments, to which he has not been admitted. Against individual members of the Association, a like unreasonableness and inconsistency has been manifested. Some are told that if they do not renounce, patronage in business shall be withdrawn from them. Some, who cannot be persuaded to renounce, are told that if they will abstain from all actual connection with Masons as such, this shall be satisfactory as the means of securing a continuance of confidence. And when for the sake of peace the proposal has been met by a pledge, the whole transaction on the part of the persons demanding, has proved like an Indian Treaty, the obligation of which, the country feels no disposition to perform, because the opposite contracting party has no power to compel the performance. The more peaceable, the more unoffending, the more defenceless the victim, the greater has been the violence shewn in attacking him. And to such an extent has this violence in some instances been carried, that nothing has seemed capable of satisfying the cravings of the appetite for persecution. Detraction and slander are but common weapons that have been used, and there seems to be a determination, that right or wrong, the whole fabric shall be hurled to ruin. Such is the manner in which this war upon Masonry has been conducted;—with a persecuting spirit, resolving to pursue its victim to death.

Hitherto I have considered the opposition of antimasonry chiefly as connected with Masons. We will now notice some of its effects upon society. And alas! how sad have its ravages been! What divisions, what animosity of feeling, what separation among friends, what alienation among members of the same community! Private character has been traduced; stories a thousand times refuted, have been unblushingly repeated; tales the most ridiculous and absurd have been soberly published. The fountains of public morals have been polluted; the passions of men have been inflamed; the press, already heated, has burst into a flame, and is throwing out torrents from its overcharged furnaces. Add to this, a spirit of jealousy and distrust has been awakened; suspicion has been engendered and encouraged to such an extent, that the most tender ties of friendship are in danger of being torn asunder, and man set at variance with his fellow man. Political demagogues have seized the occasion as favorable to their ambitious views, not hesitating to use their utmost exertion to widen the breach that has been so inauspiciously created. Professing christians, forgetting the dictates of that religion, which forbids all angry feelings, have in many instances stigmatized their brethren as vile, and treated them as enemies to the Church, and to Christ. And some, even among Ministers of the gospel, descending from the dignity of their station, have condescended to lend their aid to strengthen the exertions of those, who are striving to kindle into a flame the worst passions that rankle in the human breast. While professing to wish for the prosperity of the Redeemer's kingdom, they have literally joined hands with those, who would rejoice at nothing more than the destruction of those benevolent Institutions, which constitute so bright a gem in the crown of him, whose cause they are bound to protect. Such have been the devastating effects of the wide-spreading pestilence that there is scarcely a nook or corner of the land that has been wholly exempt. The poisonous effluvia sent forth from the caverns of corruption, have spread far and wide, already producing a sickly state of public feeling; and in instances not a few, the blain has become so deeply fixed, that a sure and speedy death must be the result.

To all this, I am aware it will be said that Masonry is the cause, and therefore must be chargeable with the evil. But, as well might Gibbon and his infidel compeers charge all the wars that have existed since the Christian era upon the religion of Christ. As well might the Jews charge all the calamities that happened to them in the destruction of their city upon Christ and the Prophets.

Masonry, it is true, has been the occasion, but not the cause of the excitement. Where is the man to be found, who really believes that the death of the man (if he be dead) about whom, so much has been said and written, was the authorised act of the Masonic association? There is not a seceding Mason in the country, who in the sober moments of reflection will dare to utter such an assertion. Suppose, then, he was murdered, as has been alledged:—shall the unauthorised act of a few individuals be a sufficient reason for denouncing an Institution, and proscribing its members? Associations of men are not to be judged by the evil, which may accidentally spring from them: for if this be considered a correct rule of judging, we shall at once be thrown into this strange paradox, 'The better the Institution, the worse its character.' Allow that Masonry has been the occasion of evil; but was it necessary that men should run mad, in order to show their disapprobation of the cause of this evil? Must the worst passions be kindled into a flame; was it necessary to resort to all the acts of intrigue, detraction, falsehood, and the concomitant train of mischief to destroy the Masonic Institution? If, as some pretend, the Institution is contemptible, why throw society into confusion to destroy it? If dangerous, as some assert, why not bring it before the bar of public opinion, order a regular impeachment, and support the cause by fair argument? Why not appeal to real fact, rather than hunt the world over for stories of murder and abuse that never had an existence, except in an old woman's fancy, and which admit of no better defence than the slanders of a drunkard's shop. Why not come out in an open and dignified manner; why not march boldly to the combat, enter the open field, rather than undertake to support the cause with volleys of terrific sounds, which serve only to frighten the timid, and render the actor contemptible in the eyes of the undaunted.

The manner in which this excitement has been produced and conducted savors too much of passion, prejudice, and party zeal. To denounce, to proscribe, to crush without investigation, has been too much the mode of procedure. Some have indulged themselves in throwing out insinuations, tending to lead people to suspect more evil than exists. Some have resorted to ridicule, as if to bring into contempt, were to convict of wrong. Others have imputed to Masons the worst of crimes, and have not hesitated to impeach character without a shadow of proof.

PHILADELPHIA ANTIMASONIC MEETING.

A few days ago a collection of individuals from four or five states, held a public meeting in a musical saloon in Philadelphia. They called to the chair Francis Granger, of Ontario, N. Y. and a candidate for Governor in this state, and, under the name of Antimasonry, commenced a series of singular inquiries into the various classes of society. About fourteen or fifteen committees were appointed, to investigate as many of the public concerns of life. Freemasonry appears to be not the only prominent topic. The following are a few of the resolutions:—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to make inquiry as to the influence of freemasonry on the public press, and whether it be expedient to adopt any measures in relation thereto.

Resolved, That a Committee of five be appointed to consider the nature, principles and tendency of freemasonry, as regards its effects on the Christian religion.

Resolved, That a Committee of five be appointed to inquire and report concerning the effect of the ties and obligations of freemasonry upon the commerce and revenue of the United States.

Resolved, That a Committee be raised to inquire into the pecuniary circumstances and situation of the family of Captain William Morgan, and to report what measures, if any, should be adopted for their support.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider and report the most expedient time, place and manner, for making nominations of candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States.

By these resolutions it would appear, that Francis Granger and his associates intend to form this meeting at Philadelphia into a Grand Inquest, not only in relation to Morgan and Masonry, but into every thing public and private, sacred or secular, that society contains. We have often heard that antimasonry in the west had been perverted into an engine of division and dissension in churches, families, and the most sacred relations of life. It has not been hitherto believed—it has not been hitherto credited. We must now give up our doubts. In the face of day—in a populous and intelligent city—before the whole world, we see an individual—a respectable individual, standing in the delicate relation of a candidate for Governor of New York, occupying the president's chair of a meeting who avow themselves in favour of mingling up, in one dangerous, fanatical and horrible compound, religion, relationship, the presidency, the public revenue of the country, and the freedom of the press. The following are extracts from the debates held a few days ago:—

‘Mr. Irwin, in submitting this resolution, said that if the information which he had received on the subject were correct, smuggling and piracy were favoured by the tendency of the Masonic obligations, and partiality often shown to masters and commanders of vessels who were members of the Fraternity. The subjects of commerce and revenue, and of smuggling, had occupied the attention of all our statesmen; and this inquiry might result in facts which would call for the consideration of the National Legislature.

‘Several members considered the subject of Freemasonry as important in its effects on the Christian religion as upon morals or government. It was improper to draw a distinction between them. The love of country and of God was the same. The interests of religion and of the State were the same.’

In these avowals there can be no mistake. Their course is marked out: it is simple and precise. For the first time since our glorious independence was declared, do we see a party, marshalled under the presidency of Francis Granger, of Ontario, making a solemn and deliberate effort to renew the age in which men were burnt at the stake for religious belief—in which the spirit is invoked that condemned to the faggot the poor old women for witches, and banished the peaceable Friends out of the community into the wilderness. Under the flag of Antimasonry, and the pretence of avenging the abduction of an individual, which all reprobated, an attempt is now made to organize a party to put down and trample upon the liberties of the press; to disfranchise a portion of American freemen—to declare them unqualified for office or honor—to throw new impediments upon commerce and navigation, by unsettling law and practice—to inquire into every man's religious opinions, and to reduce all to a particular creed,—and ‘though last, not least,’ take the power from the people of the Union, and give Presidents for the whole country.

To do all this is the evident tendency of all these resolutions and speeches. Who gave a few transient individuals the power to revolutionize this country back to the fanaticism, barbarism, intolerance, and gross ignorance of the middle ages? Mr. Granger is their head, and their leader—the persumpit of all these mighty projects. And who is he? A young gentleman of very ordinary mind, superficial attainments, some convivial powers, light and frivolous in his character—who has been distinguished only for his anxiety to reach the office of Governor in this State. We have hitherto believed Mr. Granger to be a harmless man, though vain and ambitious. He now puts himself forward to the people of New York, not only as a candidate for Governor, but as the open and avowed leader of a small knot of men whose object is to throw down the barriers of good sense, freedom, order, religion and law. Where is the man of intelligence in this community, whose heart has not throbbed at the glorious dawn of liberty and light in France?—And while the people of France are throwing off the shackles of bigotry, slavery and superstition, shall we allow a small knot of men to forge chains for us? to put us under the foot of a most unholy and fanatical faction? to carry us back two centuries into the depths of gross delusion, religious wars, and almost bloodthirsty proscription? When the faction of the Agrarians hoisted their standard in this city, the people came out in their majesty, and put down their principles, as pernicious as they were dangerous to the well being of society. The avowals of that or any other faction that ever appeared among us were not half so contemptible—so pernicious—so utterly reckless and unprincipled as that which Mr. Granger is now heading in Philadelphia. The Agrarians wanted only to take our property—to divide the hard earnings of the poor and industrious; Mr. Granger's antimasonry declares it to be their purpose to take away the mind—to divide the ‘immaterial being’—to reduce all to fanatics and fools—and that all liberty, light, knowledge and religion, must bow to its daring mandate; it is worse than a Robespierian decree.

The people of this city and state will see with astonishment, the first deliberate attempt made, in the person of

Francis Granger, to debase and degrade their self-respect and intelligence, by supposing them capable of supporting such principles, or men who take the lead in propagating such principles. The meeting in Philadelphia is still in session, and we shall advise them of the results.

THE ANTIMASONIC CONVENTION adjourned yesterday, sine die, after delivering many harangues, and adopting an Address and various reports and resolves, but without nominating a President. If any part of the proceedings of the last day can be deemed important, it may be the following.—

‘Resolved, That it is recommended to the people of the U. States, opposed to secret societies, to meet in the convention on Monday the twenty-sixth day of September, 1831, at the city of Baltimore, by delegates equal in number to their representatives in both houses of Congress, to make nominations of suitable candidates for the office of President and Vice President, to be supported at the next election; and for the transaction of such other business as the cause of antimasonry may require.

Prior to the adoption of this resolution, Mr Todd of Pennsylvania, moved so to amend it as simply to recommend a call of another national convention at the time and place mentioned, for the transaction of such business as the cause of antimasonry may require; excluding the nomination of President and Vice President.

The amendment was supported by Mr. Todd and Mr. Irwin of Pennsylvania; and Mr. Terry of Connecticut, Mr. Stevens of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Ruggles of Massachusetts, opposed it; and it was lost. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Irwin remarked that he had been surprised the other day to hear a gentleman express his surprise that the convention had assembled for political purposes. Mr. Irwin declared that they had met for no other than political purposes.—National Gazette.

It seems somewhat strange, that the greater the degree of Liberty men are blessed with, the more prone are they to abuse it. We cannot blame the subjects of despotism for cherishing what tyranny would call a factious spirit; but the children of freedom are without excuse. Of all forms of government, none gives more ample opportunity for the exercise of this spirit than the republican; and in none is the opportunity better improved. The factious, by which is meant the ambitious, the designing, and the unprincipled of all parties, in the enumeration of their guaranteed rights, include that of persecuting, even to disfranchisement, all who differ from them in opinion, and who refuse to do homage to the idol, which it may please them at any time to set up. Disguised by the mask of pretended patriotism, and loudest in their professions of anxiety, for the public welfare, they prosecute their designs with an untiring zeal; and by threats, persuasions, appeals to the worst passions of human nature, and the dissemination of specious falsehoods, many are drawn into their ranks.—The consolidated power of monarchical governments has, in most cases, been found equal to the task of suppressing this spirit—or, at least of keeping it under salutary control; but in a popular government, it is to be laid at rest only by the force of public opinion—frowned out of existence by the steady, undeviating, and truly patriotic part of community; who never suffer themselves to be blown about by every novel wind of political doctrine, to which demagogues may see fit to trim their sails. So long as factionaries act constitutionally, they must be met on constitutional ground; but if, in the madness of their fiery zeal, they overstep the prescribed limits, suitable provision is made for arresting their progress.

All countries have in their turn, and at various times, been cursed by the visitations of the spirit of faction; but it remained for this republic—these United States—to exhibit to the world a specimen of its operation unparalleled in the annals of nations. A party has been suffered to arise in this country, which, by the apathy of some, and the unsuspecting honesty of others, has increased in numbers, and become deserving of notice—worthy of opposition. And what is it? It is an antimasonic party—a scourge to the republicans who permitted it to grow amongst them. Antimasonry itself, if analyzed, would be found to be a heterogeneous mass of avarice, ambition, vanity, envy and malice, and 'all uncharitableness.' Among its supporters are to be found some, the sole object of whose desire is political distinction; some, whose avarice sighs after the emoluments of office; and some, whose vanity is highly and fully gratified, with the publicity given to their obscure names, as committee-men, secretaries, &c, who do the drudgery of public meetings, and who would sacrifice the best interests of their country, for the vain gratification of seeing their names in a newspaper in large capitals. The great body of the party is composed of disappointed federalists, apostate republicans, men of all religious creeds and denominations, however discordant, and men who believe in the creeds of none of them—in short it is composed of the mere recreation of the body politic. There may be a few, who are antimasons from an honest conviction; but their honesty cannot avail them much;—when they come to act, they are carried along with the rest, by the impetuous current of antimasonry. This anomalous faction is at this moment disgracing the country with its 'fantastic tricks,' wherever tricks will serve its ends. It is flying abroad through the nation, discord in its van, and devastation in its rear, dealing 'damnation round the land' on all who will not join in its war of extermination—devastating the fair fields of private character—polluting the purity of religion—attempting to corrupt our judicial tribunals—destroying the confidence of man in his fellow—shaking the foundation of social order—and affording matter for rejoicing to those croaking birds of ill omen, who have prophesied, and continue to hope for, the downfall of our republic.

Suppose the objects of the party gained—Masonry, which they falsely suppose so formidable, prostrate—and antimasons in possession of all power and emolument—what would be the consequence? The party, composed as it is of jarring materials—the discordia rerum, united as they now are for a common object, would then find itself to be a mere 'rudius indigestaque moles,' a chaotic mass, without a single bond of union; and having gained the victory, the conflicting claims of the different sections for pre-eminence, would soon produce quarrels about the distribution of the spoil. Who is prepared for such a state of things? Who wishes to see the country weakened by domestic discord, and made a fit and easy prey to a foreign invader? If there is one such in the country, that one is a traitor! United as we now are, and firmly fixed in republican principles, we can defy all foreign aggression: nothing but domestic strife, dissension or internal divisions, can destroy the edifice raised by the blood, and treasure, and wisdom of our fathers. It then becomes the duty of every honest man and true patriot, not to talk, but to act—to interpose his influence, be it ever so small, and assist in turning aside the torrent of evil, which an active, vigilant and persevering enemy, is pouring in upon our land. It were waste of time and pains to call upon the antimasons themselves to stop in their mad career; their political insanity has made them deaf to the voice of reason. They are sowing the wind; and it is easy to foresee that they will reap the whirlwind.

COLTON'S ADDRESS. We would invite the attention of our readers to this excellent discourse. It will repay an attentive perusal. We have seldom met with a more appropriate or abler production. We would also direct the attention of the reader to 'Antimasonic Symphonies.' He cannot be otherwise than highly gratified.

3-MASONIC TEMPLE.

LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE.

It is with much pleasure that we are enabled to inform our readers, that the Corner Stone of the Masonic Temple to be erected in this city, will be laid, in due form, on THURSDAY, the FOURTEENTH of October next.—Our brethren, throughout the state, and such from adjacent states as can make it convenient, it is presumed will attend and assist in the performance of this peculiarly gratifying ceremony.

ANTIMASONIC SYMPHONIES.

NO. II.

A NEW REVOLUTIONARY SONG.

Set to an old Revolutionary Tune.

Attention give while I relate
How Anties did assemble
At Faneuil Hall, to make a row
And make the Masons tremble:

Yankee doodle, bow wow wow,
Yankee doodle dandy;
When Anties wish to make a row
They find materials handy.

How Abner took the highest seat
To moderate the meeting,
And how the people hissed and groaned
In giving him a greeting:
Yankee doodle, &c.

And there they had a famous scribe,
A very famous walker;
They say he lathered all the folks,
He was so great a talker:
Yankee doodle, &c.

Likewise there was a Norfolk man,
A noted man for thatching;
He had a brood of goslings, too,
That he had just been hatching;
Yankee doodle, &c.

And there was seen a man in green,
Who made a caterwauling,
Because that in Batavia town
He had a good churchmauling:
Yankee doodle, &c.

Then rose a man from Michigan
Who made some dexterous motions,
He found he wouldn't suit our folks,
They were so full of notions:
Yankee doodle, &c.

The man from York began to talk,
But found he made a blunder;
For all the people shouted out
As loud as any thunder:
Yankee doodle, &c.

Says he 'I'll speak, though Turk and Greek
Should here oppose their forces:'
He little knew of Boston Boys,
Nor understood their courses:
Yankee doodle, &c.

They made, you see, a cup of tea
For other folks in 'fore-time,
And vow'd they'd make another dish
If they had little more time:
Yankee doodle, &c.

When Yorker saw, upon the floor,
Some preparation making,
He thought it would be quite too strong,
And couldn't think of taking:
Yankee doodle, &c.

Then 'way went York and Michigan,
And Norfolk and Batavia;
And Abner ran, and lathering-man,
Nor stopped to cry peccavi:
Yankee doodle, &c.

So every man away they ran
To Philadelphia city;

And there's an end to Faneuil row.

And finis to my ditty:

Yankee doodle, bow wow wow,
Yankee doodle dandy;
When Anties wish to make a row
They find materials handy.

THE POST-OFFICE.

MR. EDITOR:—I know not what others may think respecting the late removal of the Post-office, nor do I care; but, sir, I have my own thoughts on that subject—thoughts, so heated, that if it were possible to make them more so, my intellectual faculties, as well as my corporeal system, would instantly be made fit objects for the attention of the Insurance companies; fortunately for me my life is insured; therefore, there is no danger. You know, sir, that I have left the antimasonic ranks; you know my hatred of the principles which govern that faction; but you have yet to learn, sir, that I have many dear and valued friends in that now degraded class; it is on their account I now write, to ascertain why the said removal was made. My best friend is connected with the antimasonic paper printed in the same building with the old Post-office, and he, with the rest of the party, must be a sufferer by the late change. I hate party spirit, sir; I left the anties for that reason, and was ready to join your friends to put it down; but what could equal my astonishment when, at the very threshold of your temple I learned—dreadful truth!—that 'Masonic influence' was the cause of the change referred to; at first I did not believe it—I could not believe it; but when I opened your last number, and read the flattering paragraph about the Post-master, my eyes were at once unclosed, and the hydra, Party Spirit, flit before me as if it were in a vision. I am no longer to be deceived, sir; it is evident that you and your friends have bribed, yes, sir, bribed and frightened the Post-master to consent to such an unworthy action. Need I use a speaking trumpet, sir, to tell you that the change was made to benefit your establishment? No, sir! a two-penny whistle would answer every purpose—and from the sound of that little instrument, breathing forth its shrill melody, yourself would shrink as though imperial Jove had hurled a thunderbolt at your devoted head.

To be plain, Mr Editor, you should have been ashamed of yourself to use such a paltry artifice to injure the antimasonic cause. That by this removal you have broken up the secret room of the indefatigable 'Committee for the County of Suffolk'—that you have trampled on the cause of this deserving, though deluded people, is beyond a doubt. There is a rod in pickle for you, sir; a certain 'doctor' has returned to this city from a weary and heart-worn pilgrimage to the land of Friends, who will tell you 'whether or no' you are to do these things with impunity.

To the writer of the 'Antimasonic Symphonies' I now appeal; he certainly, if he has a heart, must feel that this grievance is too severe to be borne with patience: tell me, my friend, do you not think, after our Post-master's late conduct, (he must be a Mason, for otherwise, he never would thus have acted) that the Masons are unworthy to hold any 'office in the gift of the people according to the true nature of our free institutions?' Answer me, I pray you!

As for you, Mr. Editor, you are too much of a Mason for me—I thought you were an honest man; but I have been most grossly deceived—I have discovered that you are a MASON! fatal discovery!—finding this to be the fact, all confidence in you is at an end! Go away Mason! Let the earth hide you and your iniquities!!

A SECEDING ANTIMASON.

One of the correspondents of the Erie Gazette says:—'I am called a liar and a perjured wretch even by those who profess the religion of JESUS.' We have no doubt they correctly understand his character, and it detracts nothing from their piety that they have the plain, blunt honesty to tell him their real opinion of him. There are many such men in the party. The cause owes its origin to perjury and is sustained by lying.—Erie Observer.

SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

CLIMATE, GEOLOGY, &c. OF OHIO: BY CALEB ATWATER, OF CIRCLEVILLE.

ATMOSPHERIC PHENOMENON.—Before a storm here, I have noticed in an evening of the latter part of autumn, and sometimes in the winter, a phenomenon not recollected by me to have been seen on the east side of the Alleghenies. Some one spot or spots near the horizon in a cloudy night appeared so lighted up that the common people believed there was some great fire in the direction from which the light came. I have seen at once two or three of these luminous spots not far from each other; generally there is but one, and a storm, invariably proceeding from the same point near the horizon, succeeds in a few hours.

Diluvial Remains. In the vicinity of the Ohio river, in the counties of Washington, Meigs, Gallia, and Lawrence, and on the waters of the Muskingum and Perry counties, I have carefully examined not a few of the small fossil trees, existing. Among them the following, viz:—Black oak, black walnut, sycamore or button wood, white birch, sugar maple, (acer saccharinum), the date tree or bread fruit tree, cocoanut bearing palm, the bamboo, the dog wood, and I have in my possession, the perfect impression of the cassia and the tea leaf! Of ferns I have beautiful impressions of the leaves; and of the bread fruit trees, flowers fully expanded fresh and entire, I have specimens so perfect, and so faithful to nature, as to dispel all doubts as to what they once were. The larger trees are found mostly in sandstone, although the bark of the date tree, much flattened, I ought to say perfectly so, is found in shale covering coal. The date is a large tree, not very tall, but having numerous and wide spreading branches. Nine miles west of Zanesville, lying on the brink of Jonathan's creek, and near the road leading to Somersets, Lancaster, and Circleville, the body of a bread fruit tree, now turned to sandstone, may be seen. It is exactly such sandstone as that in which M. Brogniart found the tropical plants imbedded, in France, mentioned in a former number of this journal. It contains a considerable quantity of mica in its composition. The cassia was found in such sandstone, in the Zanesville canal. The bamboo is mostly impressed upon iron stone, at Zanesville; especially in the roots, and the trunk and leaves in micaceous sandstone. The iron stone is sometimes, apparently, made of bamboo leaves, the leaves of fern, and bamboo roots. It happens frequently, that the trunks of small trees and plants are flattened by pressure, and the bark of them partially turned into fossil coal. Thus the shale often contains a bark, now become fossil coal, and a stratum of shale in succession, alternately for several inches in thickness.

The date of the bamboo, the cocoanut bearing palm, the cassia, the tea plant, &c. are found at this day only in tropical regions, or in a climate where there is very little frost. At Zanesville, so severe is the winter at present, that the mercury sinks several degrees below zero.

The supposition that these tropical plants were transported northward by the ocean, unfortunately for such an opinion, is disproved by the fact, that some of these trees, or rather roots and a part of their trunks, stand upright, evidently on the spot where they grew, and others with every root entire, lie to appearance exactly where they fell, when, turned up by the roots. Again it floated from tropical regions, how happens it that their flowers were uninjured? These show all their original beauty of form; they are fully expanded, and could not have been transported from any considerable distance. Scarcely a day could have intervened between the period when they were in full bloom, and that in which, by that catastrophe which long since overwhelmed our globe, they were 'embalmed,' in the spot where they are now found.

SCENERY AND CLIMATE OF INDIA.

'The natural features of India are by turns the most sublime, and the most beautiful. Our loftiest mountains are but as mole hills to its stupendous ridges, the summits of which are as lofty as Ben Nevis would be, if piled on the top of Chimborazo. Our noblest rivers are but rills compared to its mighty streams, upon which navies can ride in the extremest drought, and which in the rainy season, are seas, hundreds of miles in extent.

'The scenery is the most varied. In one place there are dry and thirsty deserts stretching beyond the limits of vision; in others, fat meadows, where reeds and grass are so luxuriant, that the rhinoceros and the elephant gambol unseen. Here and there are bold naked rocks, crumbling into dust by the action of the atmosphere, dells and groves of the greatest beauty, and the richest foliage and perfume, interspersed with glowing lakes and spotted with buildings of the most light and fantastic shapes. In one place there are the richest fields, repaying the husbandman with several crops in the course of a year; and in another, there are thick jungles of forest, which no man can penetrate, and yet which he dare not clear away, or the soil on which they grow would be washed into the ocean, and the lands behind, to which they are at once a pestilence and defence, would share the same fate.

'The climate too, presents the greatest variations. The summits of the mountains rise far above the limits of animal life and vegetation, into the regions of perennial snow; and the great rivers have their remote sources hung with icicles in the most ardent seasons, even when they issue from the earth in a state of ebullition. In other places the heat is excessive, even in situations far without the tropics so that vegetation languishes and disappears, and Europeans are confined to their apartments, in which they are compelled to have recourse to artificial currents of air for refrigeration. In places, however, which lie much nearer to the equator, the rain is for six months of the year so violent, that all out-door operations are nearly suspended, and the people are obliged to victual their house in a manner almost similar to that in which a ship is victualled for a voyage of the same duration; and at the very season when this happens, (about fifteen degrees north near the west coast) the heat is so intense at Calcutta, six hundred miles further to the north, but on the opposite side of the country, that pigeons are killed on the wing, and drop down dead in the streets; while a very brief exposure to the heat with the head naked, is sufficient to bring on a fatal coup de soleil.'

Those who most readily find a God to swear by, seldom find one to pray to.

MISCELLANY.

WILLIAM WITH THE STRONG HAND.

William with the Strong Hand, was the elder son of Wm. de Albine, who came into England with William the Conqueror, and held large possessions by Knight's services in Norfolk. He is represented by the historians of those days as a man of great personal prowess and extraordinary agility and strength of body. Bunsdale tells us why he was called William with the Strong Hand: the occasion was thus, as related by that judicious antiquary:—'It happened that the Queen of France, being then a widow, and a very beautiful woman, became much in love with a knight of that country, who was a comely person, and in the flower of his youth; and because she thought no man excelled him in valor, she caused a tournament to be proclaimed throughout her dominions, promising to reward those who should exercise themselves therein, according to their respective merits; and concluding that if the person whom she so well affected, should act his part better than others in the military exercises, she might marry him without any dishonor to herself. Hereupon divers gallant young men, from foreign ports, hastened to Paris, among others came this our William de Albine, bravely accoutred, and in the tournament excelled all others, overcoming many, and wounded one mortally with his lance; which being observed by the Queen, she became exceedingly enamored of him, and forthwith invited him to a costly banquet, and afterwards bestowing certain jewels upon him, offered him marriage. But having plighted his troth to the Queen of England, then a widow, he refused her; whereat she grew so discontented, that she consulted with her maids how she might take away his life; and in pursuance of that design, enticed him into a garden, where there was a secret cave, and in it a fierce lion, into which she descended by divers steps, under color of showing him the beast. And when she told him of his fierceness, he answered, that it was a womanish and not a manly quality to be afraid thereof; but having him there by the advantage of a folding door, she thrust him in to the lion. Being therefore in this danger, he rolled his mantle about his arm, and putting his hand into the mouth of the beast, pulled out his tongue by the root; which done, he followed the Queen to her palace, and gave it to one of her maids to present to her. Returning the Queen of England accepted him for her husband, whose name was Adeliza (or Alice) widow to King Henry I. and daughter to Godfrey, Duke of Lorrain; which Adeliza had the castle of Arundel, and country in dowry from that King.' And in the beginning of King Henry II. time, he not only obtained the castle and earldom of Arundel to himself and his heirs, but also a confirmation of the earldom of Sussex, granted to him by the third penny of the pleas of the country, which in ancient times was the usual way of investing such great men in the possession of any earldom, after those ceremonies of girding on the robes, were performed, which have till of late, been thought essential to their creation.

THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA.

This stupendous monument of human art and industry exceeds every thing that we read of in ancient or modern history. The pyramids of Egypt are little when compared with a wall which is conducted over high mountains, some of which rise to the height of five thousand two hundred.

and twenty five feet; across the deepest vales, over wide rivers by means of arches; and in many parts is double or trebled, to command important passes; at the distance of almost every hundred yards is a tower or massy bastion. The extent is computed at fifteen hundred miles, and is of such enormous thickness that six horsemen may ride abreast upon it.

Sir George Staunton, who accompanied Lord Macartney in his embassy to China, considers this great barrier to have been erected at least two thousand years. Du halde also says 'this prodigious work was constructed two hundred and fifteen years before the birth of Christ, by the orders of the first emperor of the family Tsin, to protect three large provinces from the irruptions of the Tartars.' One third part of the able-bodied men of China were employed in constructing this wall and the workmen were ordered, under pain of death, to place the Materials of which it is composed, so closely, that the least entrance might not be left for any instrument of pointed iron; the labor in its construction must have been immense, as the materials must often have been carried over a desert country to eminences inaccessible to horses or carriages. This 'wonder of the world' was completed in the short space of five years, and it is reported that the labourers stood so close for many miles, that they could hand the materials from one to another BLUSHES. What a mysterious thing is a blush! that a single word, a look, or a thought, should send that inimitable carnation over the cheek, like the soft tints of a summer sunset! Strange, too, that it is only the face, the human face, that is capable of blushing! The hand or the foot does not turn red with modesty or shame, any more than the glove or the sock which covers it. It is the face that is the heaven of the soul! There, may be traced the intellectual phenomena, with a confidence amounting to moral certainty. A single blush should put the infidel to shame, and prove to him the absurdity of his blind doctrine of chance.

SETTLING COFFEE. A gentleman, a while ago, at a boarding house, complained to his landlady that his coffee was not settled, [clarified.] She, having probably got up backwards that morning, tartly told him to put his foot in it and settle it.—Thus directed, the gentleman did not hesitate, but putting his cup on the floor, he coolly applied his foot. But in making thorough work with his coffee, he unfortunately smashed the cup and saucer into powder.

'O heavens!' screamed the lady, 'you've spoilt my new set of china!'

'I beg your pardon, madam,' replied the gentleman, 'if in my zeal to follow your directions I put down my foot a little harder than I should have done. But it was to me an entire new mode of doing business, and some allowance should be made for my awkwardness. However, we must all 'live and learn.'—Id.

ROYALTY FROM A BREWHOUSE. During the reign of Charles the First, a country girl came to London, in search of a place as servant maid, but not succeeding, she hired herself to carry out beer from a brewhouse. The brewer observing a good looking girl in his occupation, took her into his family as a servant, and shortly after married her; but he died whilst she was yet a young woman, and left her the bulk of his fortune. The business of the brewery was dropped, and the young woman was recommended to Mr. Hyde, as a skilful lawyer to arrange her husband's affairs. Hyde (who was afterwards the great Earl of Clarendon,) finding the widow's fortune considerable, married her. Of this marriage there was no other issue than a daughter, who was afterwards the wife of James the second and mother of Mary and Anne, Queens of England.

A hungry Scotchman took up a raw egg, cracked the shell, and was raising it to his mouth when his ear was suddenly saluted by the shrill pipe of an unborn chicken. 'Ye spoke too late,' cried Sawney, and down went the pullet feathers and all.

A TIRESOME GUEST.

*Sedet, eternumque sedet.
He sits, and will forever sit.*

There is, belonging to the race of human bipeds, a sort of troublesome beings, who, setting no value on their own time, care very little how much they trespass on that of their more industrious neighbors. They are a sort of stay-forever persons, who having talked over the whole world at one sitting, commence again and talk it over anew, from beginning to end, before they are ready to take their leave. In a word, they sit, and sit, and sit, long enough to fully justify the motto we have just quoted. Besides their disposition to hang on, there is generally about these persons a wonderful hebetude, a slowness at taking a hint, unparalleled with the rest of the human race.

To give a single instance of this sitting propensity, we will introduce the story of a plain spoken old lady from the land of steady habits.

'I never seed the beat of that 'ere Capt. Spinitout,' said she; 'would you believe it, he called at our house last evening just as I had done milking, and wanted to borrow my brass kittle for his wife to make apple-sauce in. Oh yes, says I, she may have it in welcome, Capt. Spinitout; and I went directly and fetched it out of the backroom, and set it down beside him. Well, presently our tea was ready, and I could n't do no less than ax him to take tea with us. O no, he said, he could n't stay a minute; but however, he concluded he'd take a drink of cider with my husband,—and so he did. Well, after we'd done tea, I took my knitting, and worked till I thought it high time that honest people should be a-bed. But Capt. Spinitout had forgot his hurry, and there he was still setting and talking with my husband, as fast as ever. I hate above all things to be rude, but I could n't help hating to the Captain, that it was a growing late, and may be his wife was waiting for the kittle. But he did n't seem to take the hint at all—there he sot, and sot, and sot.

Finding that words would n't have any effect, I next rolled up my knitting work, sot back the chairs, and told the gals, 't was time to go to bed. But the Captain did n't mind the hint no more than if he had been bit with a flea—but there he sot, and sot and sot.

I then kivered up the fire, and thought he could n't help taking the hint; but la sus! he did n't take no notice on 't at all, not the least grain in the world—but there he sot, and sot, and sot.

Think, says I, you're pretty slow at taking the hint, Capt. Spinitout; so I said plainly that I thought it was bed time—speaking always to my husband, but so as I thought the Captain could n't help taking it to himself—but la, it did n't do no good at all—for there he sot, and sot, and sot.

Seeing there was no likelihood of his going home, I axed him if he would stay all night.—'O, no,' he said, 'he could n't stay a minute;' so, seeing there was no use in saying anything, I went to bed. But, la, would you think it, when I got up in the morning, as true as I'm alive, there was Captain Spinitout, setting jest where I had left him the night before—and there,' concluded the old lady, lifting up her hands in a despairing attitude, 'and there he sot, and sot, and sot.'

PERJURY.

*Of all base and complicated crimes,
That doth infect and stigmatize the times,
There's none that can with perjury compare,
Where vice and folly have an equal share.*

There is, perhaps, no evil which threatens our country with so much confusion and desolation as the crime of perjury. It has become bold and unblushing. It stalks abroad in open day, and lifts its haggard head in high places. It is flattered and caressed by public journals, and fostered and patronized by men in responsible stations. Certain Free Presses, week after week, and month after month, disgorge, by scores, their false, malicious and prevaricating affidavits; palming them upon the ignorant and the unwary, for sacred and incontrovertible truth. So intent and zealous are their conductors in the great work of demoralization and corruption, that (in one instance at least) not even the first day of the week is permitted to enjoy its sacred and accustomed repose.

The doctrine advanced by these presses, that the breach of extra-judicial oaths, and of course, the taking of them, constitutes no crime, is openly inculcated, and openly and extensively reduced to practice. Storms, tempests, pestilence and famine, may, by turns, desolate fair portions of our happy land, but this incurable evil pervades and infects the whole habitable extent. So common and so fearless has it become, that we have seen men stand up, put their hands upon the sacred book, and commit the most wilful perjury, as calmly and deliberately as they would drink a cup of cold water, and yet these same men (or rather monsters in human form) will largely and gravely talk of humanity, of principle, of truth, of virtue and of religion.

This wide-spreading and deadly leprosy, if not checked in its progress, will sooner or latter, sap the foundations of our republican government, and prostrate its most splendid and admirable superstructure. In my view, the prevalence and practice does not alter, or in any way diminish the crime. I have the most appalling and horrid idea of that man who would deliberately take and subscribe a false oath. No matter whether taken before one man or three; in a judicial court or a presbyterian assembly—no matter whether it is relative to things sacred or profane; to matter material or immaterial—no matter whether tangible by common, or statute laws, or by the laws of any other nation—it is false, basely false. This, it is, together with the injury that constitutes the crime; and in my opinion, it is of the deepest dye; the most to be deprecated and the most to be feared of any in the whole dread calender. That man who would advisedly and voluntarily call God to assist him to speak the truth relative to the matter under consideration, and basely and falsely misstate, that man, I say, of all others, is most to be dreaded, and most to be despised. He would not hesitate to steal, to rob, to murder—lost to all the attributes of virtue—an apostate from integrity and principle—a curse to society—he deserves not the name of man.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 25, 1830.

FRANCIS BRINLEY.

We ought to apologise to our readers for the evident impropriety of introducing to their notice, the eminent individual whose name stands at the head of this paragraph. If it be true that there are some things too sacred for vulgar eyes to look upon, it is also true that there are other things too obnoxious and sickening for public exposure.—In which relation Mr. Brinley ought to be considered, if in either; or, whether he should be regarded as one, the purity of whose character and principles is sui generis, is a problem, to us somewhat difficult of solution. We are not sufficiently well acquainted with the gentleman's domestic and retired life, to say that his exemplary career and splendid virtues have been such as to raise him to the rank of the gods, or that his profligacy, degraded and abandoned habits have covered him with disgrace, and sunk him beneath the level and notice of men. We know not in which light to regard him. The party, whose champion he avows himself to be, have gone into the 'purlieus' of the city, and dragged him forth as the only one among them, whose CHARACTER—ay, whose CHARACTER is calculated to give any importance to their public decrees. It would appear then that he is esteemed by his party as an object of adoration; as the idol of their worship; as the 'pillar of strength,' on which their hopes and expectations rest. In by-gone times, such men were elevated, by their partial and devoted partisans, to the rank of gods: the piety and character of the favorite, were not so much regarded, as the magnitude and splendor of his achievements. But in these times, we are accustomed to judge of the principles and motives of men, by the nature and object of the cause in which they are engaged. If we determine the character and motives of Mr. Brinley by this criterion, (albeit his declaration that he is an antimason 'from principle, and not from motives of interest, or thirst for power and office') we fear we shall not be able to make more than a demi-god of him. But this is a moot-case, and we would submit it as a suitable subject for the high consideration of the 'learned doctors' of the Boston Antimasonic Investigating Committee.

But whether Mr. Brinley rank with gods or devils; with nobler or inferior men, as he has arrayed himself against a society of men, honorable and reputable as any other class of community; as he has come forth the avowed champion of an unholy cause; we shall, at the hazard of polluting the sacredness of his principles, or at the risk of contracting foul contamination therefrom, (as the case may be,) approach him and tell him plainly to his teeth, however rash or sacrilegious the act, that he, himself, is not a more virtuous or kinder husband; a better neighbor, nor a worthier member of society, than are the men, whom he, as the leader of the antimasonic faction, basely and falsely calumniate. If he have any doubts of the correctness of this declaration, we would respectfully invite him to an examination of the lives and characters of his Masonic neighbors; and then we would, as respectfully, desire him to turn his thoughts homeward. The wholesome reflections to which such an examination will necessarily give rise, may be instrumental in removing those doubts. If, however, they should fail to do so, we would lead him to the cemetery, and ask him to remove the sod that presses heavily on the bosom of departed virtue—to look upon the mouldering remains of the broken-hearted mother, the disconsolate wife—her whom the inhuman brutality of a dissolute husband sent frenzied to a premature grave. We would respectfully invite him to this examination; and when we have finished, we will lay our hands upon our own hearts and inquire—'Is this the work of a Mason? or is it the damnable work of an Antimason?'—Let the answer decide the point at issue. If we should not succeed in finding a case of this description, we will look further. We will inquire who it is that has raked up and scattered upon the winds of surmise, of conjecture, the ashes of the man, who, when living, lived above suspicion?

Who is it that has arraigned, judged, and condemned, without a hearing, the heart that beats not, and the tongue that is palsied in death? Who is it that has profanely dragged before the public and held up to the execrations of an infuriated, fanatical mob, the shrouded form of the venerated Clinton, accused, but without an accuser? Let Mr. Brinley ask himself, if it be just, if it be honorable, if it be humane, thus to harrow up the feelings of the relatives and friends of that great statesman and patriot, and to tarnish his memory with surmises and conjectures, such as would be reprobated, were it in the case of the most abandoned villain before the bar of justice? Yet this is the work of antimasons—of a party to which he is affianced,—the result of principles which he publicly espouses and advocates! If we do not impeach the intellectual faculties of Mr. Brinley, we must conclude that he has connected himself with this faction, with a full and perfect knowledge of its character and objects. We must conclude that the sentiments of the party, however base and dishonorable, are in coincidence with his own. Indeed, when he attached himself to the party, he virtually adopted the sentiments of that party; and must be held responsible for their consequences. If he were not before on a level with the men, to whom he is now attached, the very act of espousing their interests has placed him on an equal footing with them. 'What must be the priest where a monkey is the god?'

We know not what considerations operated to induce Mr. Brinley to appear before the public under his own name, in an address 'to the Mayor of the city of Boston.' Surely he had not the vanity to believe that such a production would have greater influence on the mind of the Mayor, than would the splanetic anonymous productions of any of his antimasonic associates. Did he expect that Mr. Otis would so far compromise his own dignity, and the dignity of his office, as to appear in a newspaper controversy with the redoubtable champion of antimasonry?—Certainly he could not have expected this. Mr. Otis will not probably consider himself called upon to enter the list, even though Francis Brinley has thrown down the glove. Mr. Brinley may find his equal in the 'purlieus' of the city. The Mayor is not his man. That Mr. Brinley is regarded as the most talented and respectable individual in the ranks of antimasonry, is deducible from the fact that he has been selected, by that party, to perform this important and responsible duty. If the 'Suffolk Committee' wish us so to consider their champion, we have no objection. That he so estimates himself, we can readily believe; for he would, otherwise, have declined the honor in favor of one more respectable. The committee would of course select their best man, for an undertaking of such immense magnitude, and of such vital importance to their interests. And further, it would be uncharitable to presume that he has been made a tool of to do the questionable work of his more reputable associates. We cannot admit this; and must, therefore, regard him as the most respectable—the Simon Pure—of antiism. But it was certainly an act of consummate ingratitude, on the part of his antimasonic friends, and of the greatest imprudence in him, that he has permitted himself to be dragged forth from the retirement and apparent obscurity, of his own peculiar 'purlieus,' to perform a task so little calculated to add to the redolent lustre of his fame or to his happiness. We did not expect that a gentleman, formerly so well known to our citizens; so universally admired for his VIRTUES, and so eminently conspicuous for his CONJUGAL AFFECTIONS, could have been induced, by any considerations, to leave the sweet retirements of private life—the enjoyments of connubial bliss—to mingle in the strifes of a party, whose principles tend directly to the destruction of the peace and happiness of families; to the prostration of those kindlier sentiments, and to the severance of those sacred ties which should bind kindred to kindred in one indissoluble bond of affection; and to the total prostitution of those endearments, without which even life is not desirable. We say we are surprised that any man, in the sear and yellow leaf of life, should lend himself, however small his influence, to the advancement of such an unrighteous cause.

We scarcely know in what light to view the long philippic with which Mr. Brinley has kindly vouchsafed to honor our worthy Mayor. We cannot perceive that it is indicative of anything, other than the folly of its author and the chagrin of the 'one hundred apparently respectable gentlemen,' to whom the use of Faneuil Hall was inconsiderately granted. Mr. Brinley informs us that there was no unusual disturbance, until after Mr. Otis had addressed the meeting. The Mayor, then, was the cause of the riot!—the Mayor made all the disturbance!! Many thanks to you, my kind sir, for transferring even this charge from the already overburdened Masons and Masons' Jacks. The broad shoulders of our respected Mayor can bear much.—But, if there were previously no disturbance, why was the Mayor 'invited by antimasons, to endeavor by his presence, to restore order to the meeting?' If it be true that Mr. Otis said to the chairman 'that if he did not dissolve the meeting, the Mayor and Aldermen would,' he said no more than his duty required him to say. He had previously suggested the propriety of this measure; but his suggestion was insolently disregarded. It was time, then, for him to speak imperatively. He did so, and the people were satisfied. They sanctioned the measure by their acclamations, and they will sustain their Agent, even at the hazard of encountering the hoarse and angry croakings of the 'one hundred apparently respectable' petitioners.—But notwithstanding all the disturbance complained of, Mr. Brinley very consistently tells us that his antimasonic friends were 'quietly discussing a subject of great national importance, peaceably in open face of day!' Whence the cause of complaint? He thinks that a 'fair discussion of the subject of Freemasonry, by well informed men, would allay the excitement.' Does Mr. Brinley consider vituperation, slander and abuse, 'fair discussion'? Is it 'fair discussion' to denounce a large class of the community as villains and murderers, and then very modestly ask them to prove that they are not so? 'Fair discussion,' indeed! By 'well informed men,' too! By such men as Ebenezer Clough, John D. Williams and Francis Brinley! No, no, gentlemen!—the 'excitement' is a monster of your own creating—you brought him into life,—Masons will not foster him. You have done your worst; and now come on—and 'damned be he who first cries hold, enough.'

Mr. Brinley smiles at the idea that the mysteries of the Masonic Institution are too sacred to be examined by the uninitiated. It has never been contended that they are too sacred for examination; though it may be somewhat difficult to divine how the 'uninitiated' are competent to examine 'mysteries.' Nor do we know by what right they claim the privilege of such examination. The portals of Masonry were never closed to the worthy and honorable. To such the 'mysteries of the Masonic Institution,' have ever been open and free. None but the vile poltroon—the profligate being, whose worthlessness of character debars him from the society of respectable men—him who has squandered his days and his nights in the 'purlieus' of infamy, has been denied the privilege of examining the 'mysteries of the Masonic Institution.' No uninitiate, except him to whom this character applies, will dare to claim, as a right, the privilege of such examination. The PRINCIPLES of Masonry are before the world—they are open for examination—we invite examination. More than this no man has a right to demand of us; and more no honorable man will ask.

Mr. Brinley speaks of the 'orderly conduct' of his antimasonic brethren, on 'all occasions which have come to his knowledge.' We know not by what standard Mr. Brinley's notions of 'orderly conduct' are graduated. But if he intended to speak the truth, and wished his words to be received agreeably to their general acceptation, he discovers a most unpardonable ignorance of the character of his own party. At the bidding of the 'leaders,' (among whom Mr. Brinley now seems to hold conspicuous place,) their pensioned minions have called into action all the malevolent passions of the human heart: they have embittered every department of human society. In private families and peaceful neighborhoods, their 'orderly conduct' has engendered ill-will, and stirred up strife: in Christian churches, where unanimity and love prevailed, their 'orderly conduct' has polluted the bitter waters of contention, interrupted the peace and harmony of public worship, driven the pious pastor from his flock, and set brother against brother in deadly conflict. No station has been too exalted for their attack, no place too sacred for their intrusion, no life too pure or name too dear and venerable, for their vituperation and slander: they have libelled with equal profanity, the living and the dead: their hoarse and hateful croakings have penetrated the devotional closet, and broken in upon and disturbed the solemnities of the funeral procession. With an insatiable and inhuman malignity, they have pursued the victim of their displeasure until, and even after, the grave had closed over his ashes; deriding the widow's grief and the orphan's tears, and planting the scorpion's sting in the bosom of both. These are some of the evidences of the 'orderly conduct' of antimasonry. We might swell the catalogue until the heart would sicken; but we forbear. The facts alluded to, are fresh on the memories of all who have watched the progress of this 'orderly' excitement. We would not call to remembrance the horrid acts which have passed into forgetfulness. Enough—too many—are already before us.

The jesuitical insinuation that those, whom Mr. Brinley is pleased to arraign as having 'outraged decency and decorum,' were 'instigated and employed' by Masons, is a base libel. We cast it back into his teeth, as unworthy of further comment. We would say, en passant, to Mr. Brinley, that such a charge, from him, comes with an ill-grace.

Mr. Brinley concludes with an eulogium on the characters of the fathers of the itinerant lecturers from Michigan and New-York, who recently honored or disgraced our city by their presence; and expresses a hope that if his remarks be considered 'personally offensive' by the Mayor, they may not 'place him without the pale of his civilities.' It is probable the Mayor will give to this erudite epistle all the consideration its great importance demands.

PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.

We present our readers to day with such accounts of the antimasonic Convention at Philadelphia, as have come to our knowledge. We have neither room nor leisure for comment. Next week we shall examine the matter.—The following from the Pennsylvania Reporter gives a very good idea of the light in which the Convention is regarded by Pennsylvanians.

Extract of a letter dated Philadelphia, September 13th, 1830.

'Supposing you feel some curiosity to know what the assembled wisdom of Antimasonry are at, I have concluded to spend a little while in giving you a short history of their proceedings. Francis Granger is President, and Joseph Ritner, Abner Phelps, Robert Hanna, and Samuel W. Dexter, Vice Presidents; and John Clark, and Noble B. Strong, Secretaries.

You will perceive from the proceedings, that it is a Yankee concern from beginning to end. The man who figured so largely at the Antimasonic convention in your town, Frederick Whittlesey, is also the prime mover and dictator here. He nominates the officers, makes nearly all the motions, and is the Bombastes Furioso of the speech makers. I have learned the history of this self-conceited man very fully, but as I am limited to a letter at this time, I will have to defer giving it to you for the present. Suffice it to say, that he is an ill-tempered, cross-grained fellow, who has always been dissatisfied with himself and every body else. This assemblage, agreeably to a good old Yankee custom, was opened by a prayer from the Rev. Moses Thacher. This Yankee custom, I confess, I approve of, but if the prayers are to proceed from a man so destitute of all principle, one who for the purpose of distinction, has renounced Masonry, and is joining in the persecution of those whom he has himself induced to become Masons, I do think the custom would have been 'more honoured in the breach.'

Henry K. Strong, a gentleman of whom I think you have some knowledge, cuts a pretty considerable swarth here among his brother nutmegs. During the winter at Harrisburgh, I did not learn his name—but seeing him dashed round pretty much after the same manner that he did at Harrisburgh, I could hardly help exclaiming, why Monsieur Tonson's come again. His unprecedented modesty, in occupying the seats of members while the house was in session; in squaring himself before the fire, and running about the hall of the House of Representatives, attracted my notice of course, but whenever I asked who he was, the only reply that I could get, was that 'It is Wiestling's reporter'—his name I could not learn, and from what I have since learned, I suppose there was a reason why it was not to be known. Upon seeing him here, I was determined if possible, to learn his name, and upon inquiry found it to be the same Henry K. Strong, whose character was developed a few weeks ago in the Reporter.—Notwithstanding he is so well surrounded by his nutmeg friends, the Yankees, who compose this convention, (for independent of the representatives from N. England a great portion of the representatives from the other States, were originally from New-England,) he appears to be in constant fear of being abducted.

What can be the feelings of the Pennsylvania delegation, sitting as they do in the convention as mere cyphers, I am at a loss to conjecture. It is evident from their looks that they have discovered that they have been gulled by the Yankees, and that they are likely to be yet more taken in than ever. In order to prevent their being more completely entrapped, Mr. Middleswarth this morning, made a motion, 'that the delegations from the different States take their seats together;' this, however, the Yankees thought would not do, they could not gull the Pennsylvanians so easily, or carry their own measures with as little opposition, if that were to be the case.

'It is the most singular combination of politicians that I have ever known assemble together in this State. You find federalists, democrats, Adams men, and Jackson men, with, however, an evident preponderance of Adams men and federalists all huddled together.

'From the other States, (if there are any exceptions they are very rare,) the delegates are those who are opposed to the present administration of the general government. A number of the members of this convention were members of that political 'gull trap,' the Woollens Convention. You may recollect to have seen, at that time, their President, Francis Granger.—The non-descript politician Joseph Ritner who was for both Adams and Jackson, thought that as he had been president of the Woollens Convention, he ought to have been president of this, but the Yankees were too cunning for him.—What this mighty body will do is yet uncertain. They have not yet determined whether the subject of their story shall be religion, politics, murder or the revenue laws. Committees, however, have been appointed, to take into consideration each of those subjects, and each has been freely discussed. There was a proposition made to day, to appoint a committee 'to fix upon a time, place and manner, of nominating a President and Vice President of the United States,' but the Yankees say they guess it is not best to be too quick in the matter; though I rather guess they will take some steps upon that subject before they adjourn.

FRANCE. By the last accounts from France we learn that the new Chamber of Deputies had been organized and were proceeding with business. A modified constitution has been adopted, and the duke of Orleans declared King of the French. The article in the old constitution respecting religion has been altered in a most material provision, viz. by striking out the declaration that the Catholic religion was the religion of the State. This is a change of the highest importance. A proposition declaring the ex-ministers guilty of high treason has been submitted to the Chamber of Deputies. Comparative tranquillity prevails. Charles X had not left the country. The American ships Charles Carroll and Great Britain were at Cherbourg ready to receive him and his family.

Dreadful Steamboat Accident.—On the morning of Thursday the 16th inst. the Steamboat Wm. Peacock, Capt. Fleeharty, left Buffalo, destined for Detroit, with about one hundred passengers, a considerable part of whom consisting of men, women and children, emigrating to Ohio and Michigan, were steerage passengers. When about three miles out, the pipe which conducts the steam from the boiler to the cylinder, burst off at the lower connecting joint or flange, and the steam rushed out with terrific violence into a small forward cabin over the boiler, where about 20 of the deck passengers, principally women and children were collected. The scene that ensued beggars description. One woman in flying from the steam jumped overboard and was instantly drowned. Fifteen others were scalded; nine of whom are already dead; and of the remaining six, four are expected to die. The person drowned was a Mrs. Curiveau—she is represented by one of the hands who saw her go overboard to have been shockingly burnt—her face literally skinned—the body has not been found. The two children of Mrs. Curiveau were almost instantly killed. The father was on the upper deck. When he came below, he found that he had been bereft in a moment of his whole family. They were from Quebec on their way to Detroit. Mr. John Parker of Livingston county N. Y. who was on board with his wife and six children going to the St. Joseph country, had 3 of his children scalded. He says that his wife stood at the door of the cabin with a child in her arms and by the instantaneous rush at the time was pushed out on the deck and thus escaped. Mr. Johnson of Dover, Vt. going to Ohio with his family, is himself uninjured, but lost his wife and his two children—all dead. The wife we understand sacrificed herself in her attempts to rescue the children. Mrs. Palmer of the same place, a brother in law of Mr. Johnson, was in company with his wife and three children. The children were all scalded to death, and the mother is suffering under a mental derangement occasioned by this sudden and awful calamity. A Mr. Davis with his wife and daughter are all scalded. The two last dangerously.—They are Swiss emigrants, and were on their way to Michigan. An Old Lady, Mrs. Hopkinson of Ohio, is also injured, but not dangerously.

THE EUTERPEIAD.—The eleventh number of this popular and meritorious periodical, has just come to hand. The music to 'There's a language that's mute,' is very pretty. The contents generally are creditable, and the work is worthy of extensive patronage.

THEATRE. We are please to learn that our old favourite Cooper is engaged for a short season. He appears on Monday evening in Macbeth. Hackett is also engaged and will make his appearance on Tuesday.

SENTENCES. Francis Knapp, convicted of the murder of Mr. White, of Salem, is sentenced to be executed on the 28th inst. Some of the papers think he ought not to have been sentenced until after the trial of his accomplices. The Literary Subaltern contends that his second trial was unconstitutional. The two Grays lately convicted of murder in Genesee co. N. Y. have been sentenced to be executed on the 5th November. These men are both signers of the 'Antimasonic Declaration of Independence!'

ESSEX CHRONICLE. We have received the first number of a weekly paper just commenced in the flourishing little village of Haverhill, in this State, under this title. It is edited by Charles Robbins, Esq. late editor of the People's Advocate. The general appearance of the paper is highly creditable; the selections are judiciously made, and the original matter evinces talent and spirit. We wish the enterprising publishers all the success they merit.

MAINE. The Hon. SAMUEL E. SMITH, of Wiscasset, has been elected Governor of this State, by a majority of about 1500 or 2000 votes over Gov. Huntton.

THE WREATH.

PRIZE POEM.

Written for the Second Centennial Celebration of the Settlement of BOSTON.

BY MRS. SARAH JOSEPHA HALE.

Spoken at the Tremont Theatre, Sept. 17, 1880, by Mrs. Russell.

Spirit of Memory!

Thou that hast garnered up the joys and fears,
And all the human spoil of buried years,

We bow to thee!

O, lift thy veil and bid the Past appear!
It is gathering—slowly gathering—on my sight—
Those dark, old woods, where Death and Night
Held their companionship—were here!

Here, where the Muses' Temple stands,
Among the fierce yell of savage hands,

And save that withering cry,

Or glimpse of savage warrior's flight,
Like the red meteor's flashing light

That meets, yet mocks the eye—

Save these, the water and the wood
Stretched in unbroken solitude—

Lone, fearful, desolate, and sad the scene,
For here the Dove of Peace had never been,
Brooding o'er human heart's till Hope was given,

And the rude child of earth became the glorious heir of heaven.

A sail! a sail! o'er yonder wave

A freighted bark is sweeping on!

Land of the learned, the proud, the brave,
Mourn'st thou no treasure gone?

Thou Island—empire, forth from thee

Like Wisdom from the Thunderer's brow,
Sprung the bright form of Liberty,

And high-souled men have joined the train,

Nor faggots blaze, nor dungeon's chain

Can their firm purpose bow—

They would have held the guarded pass,

Or shared thy doom, Leonidas,

Had faith and duty cheered them on—

They come! that Pilgrim band—they come!

This lone land is their chosen home,

And this broad world is won!

These were our fathers—these were men—

When shall we look upon their like again?

Slowly as spreads the green of earth

O'er the receding ocean's bed;

Dim as the distant stars come forth

Uncertain as a vision fled,

Has been the old-world's toiling race,

Ere she could give a nation place.

Come hither ye, who countless ages scan,
Searching the doubtful course of social man;
Come, learn that Freedom mocks Time's slow career,
Seizes his hoard, and showers his treasure here;
But spurns his errors, hallow'd e'er so long
By seer or sage—in sermon or in song.
And ye, who would the deathless spirit bind,
Come hither, and its unshorn strength be taught,
Nor till ye calm the wave, and curb the mind,
Dare to set bound'ries to the realm of thought.

And now, while here in Freedom's light we stand,
And hail this birth-day of our glorious land,
Who does not feel a mighty power presides
For good or evil, as the Drama guides?
That while Opinion regulates the age,
Virtue should rise guardian of the Stage?
Friends to the Drama, who with ready smile,
Approve our efforts, and reward our toil,
It rests with you to banish folly's train,
And leagu'd with Virtue, bid the Drama reign;

Rousing the soul of high and generous deeds,
Melting the bosom when soft Pity pleads,
Till reverend age, and pure eyed youth draws near,
And feel the sanctity of home is here:
And Genius, waking, strikes his harp of flame,
And in the proud career of Mind our Country seeks for fame!

THE MASONIC TEMPLE.

LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE.

It is with much pleasure that we are enabled to inform our readers, that the Corner Stone of the Masonic Temple to be erected in this city, will be laid, in due form, on THURSDAY, the FOURTEENTH of October next.—Our brethren, throughout the state, and such from adjacent states as can make it convenient, it is presumed will attend and assist in the performance of this peculiarly gratifying ceremony.

From the Hampshire Sentinel.

MR. COLTON'S ADDRESS.

[Concluded.]

And by whom has this excitement been kindled? Far be it from me to say that in the ranks of those, who are opposing Masonry, there are not some upright and conscientious men,—men, who honestly mean to do their duty. But, who have been most forward in opposition, most bold in denouncing? Seceders, men, who feel it necessary to go to all lengths to make good their assertions, and to say a great deal in order to prevent a suspicion of mistake, or wrong in the course they have taken. Who have been their most powerful coadjutors? Such men as love nothing better than change—such as hope in the general rain to secure some advantage to themselves—such as are too bigotted to admit anything as good, which does not exactly accord with their own opinions—such as love to find fault, and are always ready to condemn everything, of which they have not the direction—such as through envy wish to destroy a reputation, which they know they cannot equal—and such as would prefer to see everything good destroyed, rather than fail in a purpose they had undertaken. These are the men, who have undertaken this crusade against the Masonic Institution; who have raised the hue and cry, proscribing all who do not denounce as they do, and all, who think there is less occasion for alarm in suffering the Institution to be continued, than in encouraging this unreasonable excitement. These are the men, who must answer to society for the evil that this excitement is producing. For such of them as have engaged in the world from unworthy motives, there ought to be no pity. But for such as have been unwarily drawn in, there ought to be less severity of censure. That Seceders should undertake to vilify and denounce was to be expected. As none have so much occasion, so none are commonly so bold as Traitors. He, who sells his Country, must, to justify the sale, prove that it was unworthy of the privileges it enjoyed. So with the Seceding Mason. The louder and wider he can extend his cry of wickedness, the more he hopes to vindicate himself. Abuse, slander, detraction in every form may, therefore, be expected from him. But that people wholly unconcerned, should volunteer to cover the retreat of the Traitor can be attributed to no other cause than a misguided zeal, or a love of change.

A Robinson and a Baruel frightened themselves, and frightened half the world by their suspicions of illuminism. They dreamed of nothing but swords and spears, of war, blood and carnage proceeding from these supposed nurseries of iniquity. They were honest men, but they raised a needless alarm about a project, half of which existed only in their own imagination. Honest men in like manner have been drawn in to encourage the antimasonic excitement, and through their means, suspicion has been strengthened where there was no occasion for suspicion, and a spirit of distrust has been fostered, not warranted by facts, nor justified by any prospect of good to be gained. Even allowing the worst to be true of Masonry, which enemies assert, on what principle can this violence in the mode of attack be justified. But making the deductions from these assertions, which circumstances demand, how can sober men justify themselves for taking an active part in this work of proscription? I do not say it is the duty of people to approve; I do not ask that they should undertake to vindicate; but is it unreasonable to ask that every one remain neuter till he has more than suspicion to call him into the field? What if solicited by Conventions to express their opinion? is that a reason why any should place themselves in the ranks of opposition, and in alliance with those, who consider bold denunciation a sufficient proof of the baseness of the Institution they please to decry?

Let honest and sober men estimate the evils, which to the present and future generations, must grow out of this excitement, and then answer to their consciences, if they can, for the part they have taken. In view of this strange excitement, it is natural to inquire what course ought the Masons to pursue? That the public mind has been thrown into a state of great agitation cannot be denied. That this agitation is deeply to be regretted is equally certain.—What then is the Mason's duty? Shielded under a consciousness of his integrity, I might say to him, go on in the enjoyment of your rights. But even with conscience on your side, we are not always to be strenuous in defence of our privileges. All things are not expedient that are lawful. For the sake of peace, and the public good, we are sometimes to surrender what we may esteem a right and privilege. Is the present case one that demands of the Mason a surrender of his Institution to the public good? Some, and even friends have proposed, thinking it better that they give up their privileges, than that society be thrown into confusion to support them. But CAN the Institution be abandoned while circumstances continue as they are? I answer plainly it cannot, because enemies by demanding too much, have rendered it impossible to do anything without surrendering unalienable rights. The question of abandonment under existing circumstances ought not to be named. I will not undertake to say that under different circumstances it might not be abandoned. Many good men, and even worthy Masons, have supposed the continuance of the Institution is not necessary. The general aspect of society has materially changed since Masonry was introduced. There is now no longer occasion for those special pledges, which were so necessary a few centuries since for the security of individuals. The improvements in Education, and the extension of social intercourse furnish the protection and assistance, which formerly were secured by special obligation. I will not therefore, take upon me to say how much society would gain or lose by the extinction of the Masonic Institution. But, though I am no enthusiast in support of Masonry, I feel bound to enter my solemn protest against the hostile and disorganizing spirit, which to prostrate an enemy, would level every valuable Institution in the dust. So long as this spirit of proscription prevails, I cannot, I will not think of a surrender of my rights. I feel myself called upon to stand forth with firmness against every effort to wrest from me the precious privileges conferred on me by the great Author of my Being. And it is to bear my testimony against this unwarrantable assumption of power, that I the more readily stand here this day to address you on these important subjects. I love my liberty. I venerate the spirit which prompted our Fathers to cross the ocean, and seek an asylum in these inhospitable wilds. I admire that noble resolution, which nerved them to brave the dangers of the deep, to endure the cold and heat, the frost and snows of a New-England clime rather than submit to be dictated in the right of thinking and acting for themselves. From them I humbly claim to have received a portion of the same disposition, and rather than prove myself unworthy of the descent by tamely surrendering my right at the point of demand, let me be caged in some solitary spot, no more to disgrace the name of Pilgrim on New England soil.

If then, as I have supposed, the Institution cannot honorably be abandoned, what is to be done? I answer, patiently and quietly perform the duties of life, nor be disturbed by the whirlwind that roars around your dwelling. The degree of violence that accompanies the tempest is commonly an indication of the extent of its duration. This bold spirit of demand, which antimasonry assumes, will not be tolerated for a long time in a well informed community. And already, if I mistake not, there are more than equivocal indications that they who have been so forward in kindling a fire for the destruction of others, have only been collecting materials the better to accomplish their own ruin.

Let enemies go on and traduce, let them proscribe, but let Masons be patient in well-doing. If they are denied the confidence of their fellow men, it is better to submit to the injury than run the hazard of disturbing society to avenge the wrong. Let them not return evil for evil, but rather imitate Him, who returned good for evil, and when he was reviled, reviled not again. But it is not enough with Masons that they be passive in duty. They are to show by their conduct that they do not deserve the odium that is attempted to be heaped upon them. This they are to do, by a consistent walk, and by active diligence in all the duties of life. Masons may not be able to convince their enemies by argument, but they can live down the spirit of opposition by a faithful attention to duty. And I will add, if the aspect of the times has changed, there may also be a change in the Institution, without deviating from its original design. And perhaps the present is a favorable time to introduce some of those changes in the operations of the Institution, which the improved state of society possibly requires. If the state of society furnishes less occasion for the special pledges of Masonry, let the Institution, be devoted to the further improvement of that very society whose defects it was originally intended to remedy.—Among other things, which ought to be patronized, allow me to recommend to every Lodge the establishment of a well chosen library. An appropriation for this purpose will be of immense service to all the members. I speak from experience on this subject. I have seen the experiment tried, and can bear testimony to its favorable result. Knowledge is thus diffused through society, the Lodge is honored, and the world convinced that Masons are looking for improvement in life. Masons should also be active in aiding the various benevolent and humane operations of the day. In the great cause of temperance, they should be found among the foremost of friends. That Lodge, which meets only for the purposes of conviviality, is unworthy of its place, acts not in accordance with its own professed principles, but brings a stain upon the whole Institution.—Pardon me then, if I say in strong terms, that the Mason is the last man, who should be backward in pledging himself to use every possible exertion to banish intemperance, and the first to set the example that he will neither 'touch nor taste, nor handle' the poisonous draught. The time has come when society has a right to expect that every friend to order, will take a firm stand in this important work of reformation. Let no man, therefore, who professes to bear a Masonic character, forget that TEMPERANCE stands foremost in the list of the virtues required of him.

There is another object, which at this time may properly present its claims to the consideration of Masons. It is the establishment of an Institution on a broad and extensive scale, as an Asylum for the children of Masons, that have been thrown out friendless upon the cold and stinted charity of the world. Such an Institution where these unfortunate orphan children might be collected, taught in the rudiments of Education, early trained to habits of industry, would form a splendid column in the Masonic Temple, which none could condemn, and which every good man would decidedly approve. And how, let me ask, can the Grand Lodge, the subordinate Lodges, and the other Masonic Institutions of this state better appropriate their funds, than in thus providing means to raise the helpless orphan from degradation, and to furnish him an honorable station in society? In some central situation within the commonwealth, let a suitable farm be purchased, proper buildings be prepared, some discreet person be appointed to superintend the concern; there let the children of a given age, and under particular circumstances, be collected; let them be instructed in such various branches of business as their taste may warrant, and in such kind of learning as will lay the foundation for usefulness; and when they have arrived at proper age, let them be transferred to some regular occupation for life.

What object can be presented more interesting than this? What sight could be more delightful, what more cheering than a group of such children training up under the patronage of a society founded for benevolent purposes, becoming the protector of the defenceless, and the guide of the young pilgrim in the journey of life. Among all the humane institutions that exist, there is no one more interesting than that designed for the rescue of the defenceless orphan. And to what object more worthy can the charities of the benevolent be directed than that of saving the fatherless child from want, and raising him to usefulness in life? How grateful must be the reflection to a tender parent, when recollecting that he must be separated from his beloved children, and knows that he must leave them friendless and poor in the world, that they will find in the bosom of the Masonic Fraternity, friends and guardians, and protectors, that will provide for their wants, and rescue them from danger—an Asylum where the moral habits will be carefully formed, where they will be instructed in the elements of human knowledge, in the principles of religion, and trained up to industry in the occupations of life. Happy shall I be if these few hints on a subject I deem so important may lead any in stations of influence to think in earnest of the suggestions I offer.

Brethren of the Masonic Institution. The special directions that need be urged upon you at this present time, are few and simple. Guard your Institution from abuse; take heed to yourselves and let your light shine before men.—It is our lot to live in an age justly styled an age of Benevolence. If, in accordance with the benevolent spirit of the times, all our movements are directed, enemies will assail our Institution in vain. Go then, let Masonry appear in practice what you profess to consider it in the theory.—Live you like Masons, and the tongue of slander shall be let loose upon you in vain. Nor be you disturbed about what may be the result of the present excitement in relation to your Institution. If you are compelled to behold the destruction of this Edifice, remember there is a building not made with hands that shall never decay. Into that let it be your endeavour to gain admission. Thither let all your treasures be borne, and their seek for that inheritance, which can never be taken away. You are at present professedly engaged in the season of apprenticeship; passing through a state of pilgrimage; seeking a Country, and a city that hath foundations. Think it not strange then if you are visited with trials. It is the furnace of affliction that men are prepared for a place in the Temple above. And happy shall you be if you shall be numbered with those, whose trials have wrought together for their spiritual benefit. See then that you walk honestly, and that in all things you be a pattern to others, prompt to forgive injuries, ready to do good, humble for your faults, always cherishing a most affectionate regard for him, who has been constituted and appointed to be your leader.

Go then, my brethren, and redouble your diligence.—Let the whirlwind blow its threatening blast; let Traitors raise the cry of denunciation; let enemies foam out their rage, but be you firm to your posts, be undaunted and unwavering amid the threats that assail you. In the end you will see that every trial has had its benefit, and if you shall be so happy as to reach the celestial city, you will find that your way, though it led you over a rough and rugged Country, was yet the most direct to the place of Habitation.

ANTIMASONIC SYMPHONIES. NO. III.

A PATHETIC STORY.

'You that have tears, prepare to shed them now'—
'List! list! Oh, list!'—to the great Faneuil Row.
So bright a morning—and so dark a night!
Such expectations—such a dismal sight!
Such charming eloquence—such horrid screams!
Such bright realities, all turned to dreams!
Oh, never, never, since the world began,
Did equal disappointment fall on man!
The place well chosen—orators employed—
The whippers-in well drilled—the dupes decoyed—
So well prepared, and with such ample means—
No one dared whisper such a change of scenes.
For loud applause—loud hisses, cries and groans,
For silence—shouts that shook the very stones
For that respect due to old Faneuil Hall—
Each one cried out as loud as he could bawl.
Not Babel's self could with that scene compare,
When their loud acclamations rent the air.
Ten thousand voices, in ten thousand keys,
Made each hair stand erect—the heart's blood freeze,
Oh, never, never may I feel again
My knees so knock—my breathing such a pain!
I didn't think the Anties quite so low,
To talk so loud—to make so poor a show.
A public question should be tried with care;
The vote be put with Anties only there.
At some such meeting, pass what votes you may;
Then swear 'twas done in public, open day.
Thus though we miss the truth, we save our mark,
And prove our works best fitted to the dark.

The affidavits of the Coroner of Belfast, and the members of the True Blue Lodge, which we publish to-day, are conclusive.

We do not publish these refutations of electioneering falsehoods for the purpose of vindicating masonry, but to exhibit in the glare of day light, the horrid depravity of the men by whom they were got up, and the wickedness of those who have given currency to them. Conspicuous among this latter class stands JOHN RIDDELL, the antimasonic candidate for the legislature. Before he gave place in his columns to the foul perjury of Anderton, the most conclusive proofs of its true character were before him! We call upon him as members of that community whose feelings he has outraged and insulted, to fulfil his promise, to publish a refutation when one should be received, by republishing these affidavits, in connexion with Mrs. Bell's counter-affidavit, and the article which we copied a few weeks ago from the Belfast News-Letter; on failure to do which he must stand before this community branded as an abettor in the impudence and perjury of Anderton.

ANTIMASONIC EDUCATION.—At the dinner given to the Court of Errors last week, our friend Mr. Frank Granger gave the following toast:

By Mr. Granger—Public instruction—the leveller of all aristocracies but those of virtue and intellect.

As Paul Pry says, we are curious to know what sort of public instruction Mr. Granger intends to level with? For several years past Mr. Granger has been instructing the age in the glorious secrets of antimasonry. From the placid lake of Canandaigua west to Buffalo, east to New-York, and south to Philadelphia, Frank has been constituted High Priest of Antimasonry—the preacher of intolerance, fanaticism and folly. If Mr. Granger and his party could get into power, they would no doubt introduce into every school of the state, that precious volume, 'Morgan's Illustrations of Masonry, with Plates, colored from nature,' a school book for the rising generation. We should then have antimasonic colleges, antimasonic schools, antimasonic churches. Statues and pictures of Morgan would be elevated in all public places, and those of Washington and Clinton pulled down as masonic idols. The race of boys would be taught the grip, the secrets, and the rules of antimasonry, instead of those stupid, useless studies, called reading, writing, and arithmetic. Noah Webster, and Root's Arithmetic, Lindlay Murray's Grammar, and all other school books, would give place to the reports, documents and speeches of the Lewiston Committee, and Frank Granger's speeches. The troublesome things called Geography, Grammar, Philosophy and Science, would all be banished, under the new regime of antimasonry.—In short let Mr. Granger be elected, and Ferdinand of Spain, Don Miguel of Portugal, and such-like intelligent and tender-hearted men would be particularly delighted with the success of the lobby cause in the new world; and as there is a little speck of hope that they may be driven from their thrones by the people, or the Masons, (sad rascals!) they would no doubt come over here, and find a little sympathy in the pious fraternity, of antimasons.

MASONS AND ANTIMASONS. In consequence of the clamor raised in some parts of this state, about the political influence which, it is alleged, has been exercised by the Masonic fraternity, an examination has been made in six or eight counties to ascertain what number of Masons have held offices in them for the last twenty years. The result in every one of these counties proves most conclusively, that there does not exist the slightest ground for suspecting that any undue influence has ever been exercised.

In Washington county, of the persons appointed or elected to office, within twenty years, nine were Masons, and sixty-six were not Masons.

In Allegany county, there were ninety-two Masons, three hundred and three not Masons.

In Butler county, in twenty one years, seven were Masons and seventy not Masons.

In Armstrong county, from 1805 to 1830, there were three Masons, and one hundred and forty-eight not Masons.

Examinations have been made in several other counties, the result of which is nearly the same as above. It would be well if something of the same kind were done in every county in the State. It would, perhaps, convince some honest, well meaning people who have been deceived by the clamor of political antimasons, how groundless are the charges of political management, which have been so pertinaciously urged against the Masonic fraternity—at least in Pennsylvania.

The Antimasons are but sorry logicians. They say that the Masons hold and have held from the foundation of the government, all the offices. Now if the Masons have held all the offices, of course the administration of the government of the U. States has been in their hands, and the Government of the U. States has been so wisely administered as to be the admiration of the world. It thus appears by the logic of Antimasons, that the offices ought to be filled exclusively with Masons.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SAMUEL G. ANDERTON.

The impudence manifested by the friends and patrons of this infamous wretch, surpasses every thing of the kind we ever read or heard of—it staggers credulity itself. In the face of the most clear and conclusive evidence of his infamy and turpitude, his antimasonic friends in this city, strenuously persist in declaring the spotlessness of his character, and the truth of his base and libellous fabrication! To cap the climax of their own disgraceful transactions, the Boston antimasons recently drew up a communication, which Anderton was made to sign, or to which they attached his name, and addressed it to the Philadelphia Convention, 'the object of which was,' to use their own words, 'to confirm, in the most solemn manner, the truth of an affidavit which he sometime ago gave, on the subject of the alleged horrid oaths and obligations of masonry, and of certain enormities committed under their influence.' 'Mr. Anderton, under date of Boston, August 20, 1830, makes his acknowledgments' for the exertions making by the convention for the suppression of the evils of Masonry; says he has had the misfortune to be hauled up and dismantled by the Masonic crew; that he had witnessed the execution of the bloody penalties, in due Masonic form, attached to the violation of the oaths and obligations of Masonry; that these executions had been more frequent than was supposed; that the death of Artemas Kennedy, a neighbor, had induced him to develop the bloody murder which had been perpetrated at Belfast in Ireland; that Masons had reported that he had denied his affidavit, and that he was drunk when he made it; but that this was not true, and that without reward, or the hope of reward, from the antimasons, he had made the developments which appeared in his affidavit.' To say that Anderton wrote this communication, would be saying that which is not true. It was written by the antimasons in this city—by the men who dragged him from the sink of infamy, to serve their purposes. They make him say that he perjured himself 'without reward, or the hope of reward.'—This is not true—he was rewarded; he is now at sea under the patronage of antimasons. But as the matter is in a train of 'judicial investigation,' we will not waste words on the subject. The 'Boston Investigating Committee' may yet have an opportunity to hear the 'whole truth,' and to read a faithful development of the whole transaction.

The New York daily Standard of Saturday last, is principally filled with an article and documents on the subject of the alleged murder of Miller. The documents consist of the affidavit of the Coroner of Belfast, and accompanying papers, published by us a few weeks since:—together with a letter from a gentleman of 'undoubted integrity,' who was addressed on the subject and who is not a member of the Masonic Institution. The letter alleges that the three papers, published in Belfast, have been carefully and closely examined, from a period before that at which the murder is said to have been perpetrated; and there cannot be found one word concerning such an occurrence as that related by Anderton. The only murder mentioned as having been committed in 1813, is that of an old woman, murdered in Scotland. The oldest and most respectable people of the place have been questioned, but none recollect such an event. The coroner, who has been in office since 1813, never held inquest on the body of any person of the name of Miller;—he has examined his register, and no such event is entered. The members and Secretary of the Lodge in which the murder is alleged to have been committed, testify that no such person as S. G. Anderton, was ever a member of or visitor in said Lodge. The Belfast committee of investigation deny the whole of Anderton's statement, in positive and indignant terms, and declare that they will with the greatest promptitude and vigilance probe the matter, and pluck out the heart of the story. They further declare that a memorial shall be forthwith sent to His Royal Highness, the Duke of Sussex, Grand Master of England, to open a communication with the British Consul in America, to have the fabricator of the story, S. G. Anderton, apprehended as an accessory in the alleged crime. The Boston Committee will probably attempt to conceal Anderton; but they will do it at their own hazard. They cannot succeed—Let them attempt it. In our next, we shall publish the correspondence alluded to above.

ANTIMASONIC EXCITEMENT IN VERMONT. This species of madness is raging in the State of Vermont, to an extent that must surprise the sedate, and astonish the considerate part of mankind. The members of the fraternity, have deemed it proper to address the public on the subject of this unnecessary clamor; and we have thought it not improper to republish what we conceive to be a fair and able protest against the wild enthusiasm of a people, who have a zeal, but not according to knowledge. It is a matter of gratulation to us, that we are in a section of country little disturbed by vociferation, and seldom known to be agitated by the outcry of aspiring demagogues: it is true that this part of Tennessee, like every other part of the world, contains some persons who may be properly styled upstarts, and could they call vassals to their aid, would only regard their own aggrandizement. But, with us the force of public opinion has been tolerably well directed and we fear no danger while an enlightened people will hear, read, judge and act for themselves. But, should we at any time prostitute our judgment, and act agreeably to the desire of the dictatorial, then we shall be governed by the caprice of aspirants and influenced by the whims of those who may undertake to think for us. Who then would check the overflowing tide of error? or who would be able to set bounds to the desolating flood of iniquity?—Wrong notions received, have too often been indulged until they grew into the most violent hatred, and terminated in the most cruel persecution. Ignorance has often led men into the most wretched perfidy; while the leaders in an unholy crusade, had a plausible pretext but a cruel design. When clamor flows as a torrent or rages like a storm, it sometimes attains a power which no force can resist, no sugacity elude.

Such have been the effects of unlawful outcries raised by those who desired political or ecclesiastical preferment, and we are fully persuaded that such is the object of the principal leaders of this faction in Vermont, while the mania extends even to the simple and undesigning. The institution that is most wilfully attacked may be assailed, but cannot be demolished; it ever has, and will be supported by good and able men. The names of WASHINGTON, WARREN, FRANKLIN and LAFAYETTE, will outweigh the names of all the pedagogues that will rise in the phalanx of antimasonry. Those who are now the objects of persecution may have to suffer for a time, but wherever integrity is found success is always near at hand: this was manifested in the case of Haman and Mordecai.

Bolivar Palladium.

Ought not the antimasons to protest against the late glorious Revolution in France? Gen. LaFayette, a HIGH MASON is the prime mover of it, and is now at the head of the army, and consequently holds the chief power in his hands.

In Spain and Portugal, those amiable Antimasons, Ferdinand and Miguel, proscribed all Masons. In France, Masons drive tyrants from their thrones, and in imitation of Washington, Franklin, and other high Masons, establish the liberty of the People. How gratifying this must be to all true, 'whole hog' Antimasons!!

OHIO ANTIMASONIC CONVENTION.—A convention of delegates from twelve or thirteen counties, out of seventy-three, and called a state convention, assembled at Canton a few days since, passed sundry resolutions, and adopted an address to the people—all in the mode of the New York Antimasons. As is customary with the people the meeting was opened with prayer. If they were influenced by pure motives, if they had the welfare of their fellow creatures at heart, if they wish to promote the happiness and prosperity of their country, an appeal to the almighty for his blessings, might be proper; but as we consider their objects exactly the reverse of this, and their affected sanctity a hypocritical attempt to deceive the truly pious, we think are highly reprehensible; and although the following lines are somewhat rough in expression, we have but little doubt that the application will be considered a good one:

'What pious souls! how well their parts
These canting knaves can play!
With war and mischief in their hearts,
They go to fast and pray.

'So Noll* of old in freedom's breast
Resolved to plant the sword;
In holy guise the treason dressed,
And wept to see the Lord.'

ORIGIN OF ANTIMASONRY.—A great many innocent people imagine that antimasonry has its origin in Western New-York, among the Morganites. Our friend Frank Granger gives out the idea, but Frank is not a Walsh in learning. Antimasonry has a much more legitimate origin than many imagine. His Majesty Ferdinand VII. of Spain, has the honor of commencing the first regular antimasonic party. The following will explain this:

Madrid, Jan. 17, 1815.

'The Inquisitor General has published an edict of the King, that 'with the advice of His Majesty's council, and of the Holy Inquisition, he will receive with open arms, and with all the tenderness suitable to his character and office, all such Freemasons as shall, within fifteen days, spontaneously and voluntarily denounce themselves; but if any of them shall persist in following the way to perdition, he shall then be obliged to resort to the rigorous measures enjoined by the civil and canon law.'

Don Miguel, of Portugal, afterwards became the next grand convert to antimasonry, and his decrees and edicts were quite characteristic. We have several of his acts in certain Lisbon gazettes, which we shall serve up as soon as possible. The next movement made in antimasonry was by Fred. Whittlesey, Thurlow Weed and Frank Granger—the last by Alderman Stevens. These last antimasons follow the foot-steps of their great teachers, Ferdinand and Don Miguel, with great precision, and proper veneration. Some fear that the 'liberals' of Spain and Portugal will rise up and upset the legitimate antimasons of the houses of Bourbon and Braganza; and we should not be much surprised, if the 'liberals' of New-York were to do the same with the antimasonic houses of Granger and Stevens.—N. Y. Courier.

ANTIMASONIC LOGIC.—The Anties assure us that the Masons hold all the offices, or grasp at them all.

The antimasonic print at Harrisburgh gives the names of several members of Congress for Pennsylvania, who declined a reelection, and assures the people that this is done because that they are afraid of loosing their election, on account of their being Masons.

We do not know whether the gentlemen named are or are not Masons, but it is not in character for ambitious men, who grasp at the political power of the country, to decline being candidates for office, when a political squall occurs. That is the very time for them to attempt to seize the reins of power, and we accordingly see the unchastened ambition of such in full action at this particular juncture.

It is far more easy to pull down, than to build up, and to destroy than to preserve. Revolutions have on this account, been falsely supposed to be fertile of great talent; as the dregs rise to the top, during a fermentation, and the slightest things are carried highest by the whirlwind.—And the practice of this proposition bears out the theory; for demagogues have succeeded tolerably well in making ruins; but the moment they begin to build anew, from the materials that they have overthrown, they have often been uselessly employed with regard to others, and more often dangerously employed with regard to themselves.

KINLOCK OF KINLOCK:

'There is something peculiarly interesting in a grand national air. The following little incident is, in itself, scarcely worth relating; yet it is connected with associations which must interest the feelings of those who are conversant with the history of Scotland.

On board the steamer Rushlight, which plied between Boston and Nahant, there was an excellent band of music, composed of blacks. While on my way to this delightful retreat, the band played this Scottish air, and although, at the time, it was unknown to me, I became affected,—instinctively drew up to the musicians. When the music ceased, I asked what air is that you just played? 'Kinlock of Kinlock' was the reply.—'Tell me, was it inspiration that awakened my sympathy; or was it a vital panting for liberty, that so thrillingly vibrated on every chord? When I reflected that this divine Slogan* probably, once issued from the Pibroch of Wallace, and the Bugle of Bruce, and that it operated like an inspiration upon the virtuous and high-minded Scotchman in his long gallant, but unsuccessful struggle with the ferocious Southron, when I reflected that he was at that very moment hopelessly panting for the pure air of liberty which my lungs were so freely inhaling, that he remembered days long gone by with a feeling distinctness, I sat down and wept,—who could forbear?—I could not.

ANCIENT DEXTERITY.

One of the early kings of Egypt being desirous to secure his riches, commanded a treasure-house to be built; but the architect, intending to have some share of the treasure, instead of finishing the building completely, placed one of the stones in so artful a manner, that it could be taken out and put in again by one man. As he was prevented by death from accomplishing his design, on his death-bed he gave full instructions to his two sons how to execute it. After they had for some time plundered the treasury, and carried off large sums, the king who observed the gradual diminution of his wealth, without being able to discover how the thieves had access to it, finding his seal upon the door always whole, ordered several strong traps to be left in the treasury. By this means one of the brothers was at last taken; but, finding it impossible to escape, he pressed his brother to cut off his head, and retire with it, to prevent any discovery. The king, next morning examining the success of his project, upon finding a man without a head in the snare, hastened out in the greatest alarm and confusion; he ordered the body to be exposed on the outside of the wall to the public view, charging the guards placed round it to observe the countenance of the spectators, and to seize those who appeared sorrowful. The surviving brother, urged by his mother's entreaties and threats of exposure, formed the design of carrying off his brother's body. Accordingly driving his asses thither, laden with skins of wine he found means, by the stratagem of letting his wine run out, to intoxicate & stupefy the guards. When they were in a deep sleep, he shaved the right cheek of each of them, by way of derision; and in the night carried off the body on one of the asses. This action still more astonished the king; who being now more earnest to discover the thief, ordered his daughter to receive the addresses of all suitors promiscuously, on condition that each should previously, confess to her the most ingenious action he had ever managed, and the greatest crime he had ever committed.—The young man, resolving again to perplex the king, went to the palace of his daughter, and confessed to her that he had cut off his brother's head, and afterwards carried off his body. When she then offered to lay hold of him, he stretched out to her the arm of a dead man, which he had carried in under his cloak (suspecting the intentions of the king,) and, while she supposed she had detained the culprit, he made his escape. The king's resentment being now converted into admiration, he promised a pardon and rewards to the person who had robbed his treasury, if he would discover himself. The young man, upon this proclamation, immediately made himself known; and the king, thereupon accounting him far superior in dexterity to any man then living, gave him his daughter in marriage.

AN ABSENT MAN.

There are few that have paid any attention to the finance of England, but must have heard of Dr. Robert Hamilton's Essay on the National Debt, which fell on the house of parliament like a bombshell, or rather, which rose and illuminated their darkness like an orient sun. There are other writings of his, too, in which one knows not which most to admire, the profound and accurate science, the beautiful arrangement, or the clear-expression, and yet this most profound and clear-headed philosophical thinker, and most amiable of men, become so completely absorbed in his own reflections, as to lose the perception of external things, and almost that of his own identity and existence. In public the man was a shadow. He pulled off his hat to his own wife in the street, and apologized for not having the pleasure of her acquaintance; went to his classes in the college on the dark mornings, with one of her white stockings on the one leg, and one of his black ones on the other; often spent the whole time of the meeting in moving from the table the hats of the students, which they as constantly returned;—sometimes invited them to call on him, and then fined them for coming to insult him. He would run against a cow in the road, turn round, beg her pardon, 'Madam,' and hope she was not hurt.—At other times he would run against posts, and chide them for not getting out of his way; and yet his conversation, at the same time, if any body happened to be with him, was perfect logic and perfect music. A volume might be filled with anecdotes of this amiable and excellent man, all tending to prove how wise the distinction is between first-rate thought, and that merely animal use of the organs of sense which prevents ungifted mortals from walking into wells. The fish market at Aberdeen is still where it used to be near the Dee, and has a stream passing through it that falls into that river. The fish-women expose their wares in large baskets. The doctor one day marched into the place where he was attracted by a curiously figured stone in a stack of chimneys. He advanced towards it till he was interrupted by one of the benches, from which however, he tumbled a basket into the stream, and the fish which it contained were speedily borne towards their native element. The visage of the lady was instantly in lightning and her voice in thunder, but the object of her wrath was deaf to the loudest sounds, and blind to the most alarming colors.—She stamped, gesticulated, and scolded; brought a crowd that filled the place; but the philosopher turned not from his eager gaze, and his inward meditations on the stone. While the woman's breath held good she did not seem to heed his indifference, but when that began to fail, and the violence of her acts moved not one muscle of the object, her rage felt no bounds; she seized him by the breast, and yelling in an effort of despair, 'Speak to me, or I'll burst!' sank down in a state of complete exhaustion, and before she had recovered the doctor's reverie was over, and had taken his departure.

AGES OF EUROPEAN KINGS.

The oldest sovereign is Charles X. late King of France, who is seventy-three years of age, tall in person, and very hale. The Pope, Pius VIII. is sixty-eight, and in tolerable vigor. Bernadotte, king of Sweden, is sixty-six, and has recently had a severe illness, but is a strong and healthy man. The next is William IV. of England, who is sixty-five, and in good health, and does not appear to be more than fifty. Felix king of Sardinia, is of the same age, and enjoys good health. Frederick VI. of Denmark, is sixty-two years old, and is a very healthy man. Frederick William III., king of Prussia, is in his sixtieth year, possesses a good share of health, and bids fair to live to a good old age. The king of the Netherlands, William I., is fifty-eight; he has the appearance of a weather-beaten soldier, as he is; and, although subject to chronic complaints, is robust. Francis, emperor of Austria, is fifty-two, and healthy. Francis king of Naples, is fifty-one, and gouty. Mahmond II., sultan of Turkey, is forty-six, and possessed of great vigor of body and mind. His countenance and his eyes are particularly striking and impressive, and he is naturally a very superior man. Ferdinand VII., of Spain, is forty-five years old, and has long been a prey to diseases.—He has the gout constantly, and is quite incapable of any active exertion; he has, however, lately married his third queen. Louis, king of Bavaria, is in his forty-fifth year, and has lately recovered from a long illness; his merits as a sovereign and as a man of letters are acknowledged to be very high. Nicholas I., emperor of Russia, is thirty-four, is tall and handsome in appearance, hardy and active, and accustomed to laborious exertions. The youngest and only female sovereign is Donna Maria de Gloria, the legitimate queen of Portugal, who is in her thirteenth year. She promises to be beautiful, but her health is delicate, and she is very lame.—London Times.

CONUNDRUMS. Why is a maid servant, when a procession passes nigh her master's house, like a ship on the coast at the commencement of a heavy gale? A. Because she always runs out to sea (see.) Why is a beautiful and fascinating girl like a butcher? A. Because, a la beau monde, she is a 'killing creature.'

Toss: being told that he had a fair opportunity of taking advantage of a bitter enemy; 'I wish not to plunder him,' said he, 'but there are things I wish to take away from him; not his honor, nor his wealth, nor his life, but his ill-will.'

SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

THE WHITE MULBERRY.—This tree is said to be worthy of attention on account of its beauty as a shade tree. A late writer speaking of this tree says, 'it would add greatly to the beauty of our farms and villages, to have them interspersed with rows and groves of the white mulberry.' This alone is sufficient reason for cultivating it—but when its use in rearing the silk worm and the profit that may be realized from this business are considered, it seems to us an object of great consequence to the Agriculturists and people of this state.

The seeds may be obtained in Boston, Mansfield, Connecticut, and various other places. In four years from the time of sowing, the tree, it is said, will be large enough to begin to feed the silk worms.

Some idea of the importance of the silk business, may be formed from the fact, which appears from the records of the Treasury, that the importations of silk during the year which ended on the 30th of September, 1828, amounted to $8,463 563—of which $1,274,461 were exported; and that in the same year the exportation of bread stuffs from this country amounted only to $5,414 665—leaving a balance against us, by a comparison of these two articles, of about two millions of dollars,

BULWER THE NOVELIST.—Edward Litton Bulwer, the novel writer, resides at an ancient seat of his family in Norfolk, called Heydon Hall. He is an only son and his mother, who is a widow and a lady of fashion, dwells in London, where Bulwer himself has lived the greatest part of his life.

In England, his name is pronounced as if it was spelled Buller. The curacy of Saul near Norwich and two or three other small livings are in the gift of the family. There are three brothers of his father still living—General Bulwer, Doctor Bulwer, and the third is a curate, who has two sons that are clergymen. Two of his cousins are also clergymen. This circumstance has given rise to a report that the author himself was attached to the church, and is a minister of the gospel. Bulwer is about thirty-five years old.—In his last work he has been charged with the vanity of endeavoring to underrate his age. His appearance, however, is youthful, and the strict attention he pays to dress, gives him the look of quite a young man. He has rather a thin and thoughtful looking visage. His features are somewhat sharp and shrewd, and he is much addicted to satire in his conversation. He is fond of the chase, and is an object of much attraction in the neighborhood where he resides. He was married several years ago in Liverpool to a daughter of Gen. Gascoigne, and he has now four or five children.

ANECDOTE OF FRANKLIN.

In Philadelphia, the merchants many years since, set up an assembly for dancing, and desiring to make a distinction and to assume a rank above the mechanics, they at first proposed things among the rules for regulating the assembly:—'That no mechanic's wife or daughter should be admitted on any terms.' These rules being shown by a manager to a friend (Dr. Franklin,) for his opinion he remarked, that one of them excluded God Almighty. 'How so?' said the manager. 'Because,' replied the friend 'he is notoriously the greatest mechanic of the universe, having, as the scripture testifies, made all things and that by weight and measure.'

MARSEILLES HYMN.

MR EDITOR:—I send you a literal translation, (the work of a young friend, whose name I am not permitted to make use of) of the celebrated Marseilles Hymn;—those who have heard that soul stirring air will be pleased to see the correct translation; the words at present sung, fall far short, in my opinion, of the verses sent—I also send you the correct French copy. W. H. C.

We are indebted, says the Baltimore Gazette, to a correspondent for the annexed account of its author.

The name or the author of this celebrated production is Joseph Rouget de Lisle, born in the year 1760. At the commencement of the French Revolution, Rouget was stationed at Strasbourg as officer of an Engineer corps.—At this time nothing but low vulgar ballads were sung in praise of the war, and Rouget being a man of talents, a good musician and a great enthusiast, was solicited by some friends to furnish a war song; in a moment of enthusiasm he retired to his chamber, and in one night produced the words and music of a piece, which in every respect is worthy of admiration. The effect of this song on the army of the revolution is well known, and requires no further illustration; it first appeared by the title 'L'offrande à la liberté,' but subsequently known by the name, 'Marseilles hymn, or march,' on account of its being first publicly sung and used by the Marseilles confederates, in the year 1792.

The services of Rouget de Lisle in the cause of liberty did not shield him from the persecutions of the terrorists; he fled to Germany. In Hamburg, the great poet Klopstock, with whom he had an interview, intimated, that this hymn alone 'had caused the death of 50,000 brave Germans.' Rouget was wounded at the attack of Quiberon, and lived retired from business in 1824.

LA MARSEILLAISE

Allons, enfans de la patrie
Le jour de gloire est arrivé,
Contre nous de la tyrannie
L'étendard sanglant est levé.—
Entendez-vous dans les campagnes
Mugir ces féroces soldats?
Ils viennent jusques dans vos bras
Egorger vos fils, vos compagnes.
Aux armes, citoyens; formez vos bataillons;
Marchez;—qu'un sang impur abreuve vos sillons.

CHOEUR.

Aux armes, citoyens; formons nos bataillons:
Marchons;—qu'un sang impur abreuve nos sillons.

Que veut cette horde d'esclaves,
De traîtres, de rois conjurés?
Pour qui ces ignobles entraves,
Ces fers dès long temps préparés?
Français, pour nous, ah! quel outrage!
Quels transports il doit exciter!
C'est nous qu'on ose menacer
De rendre à l'antique esclavage!
Aux armes, etc.

Quoi! des cohortes étrangères
Feraient la loi dans nos foyers!
Quoi! ces phalanges mercenaires
Terrasseraient nos fiers guerriers!
Grand Dieu! par des mains enchaînées
Nos fronts sous le joug se ploieraient
De vils despotes deviendraient
Les maîtres de nos destinées!
Aux armes, etc.

Tremblez, tyrans; et vous, perfides,
L'opprobre de tous les partis;
Tremblez—vos projets parricides
Vont enfin recevoir leur prix.—
Tout est soldat pour vous combattre:
S'ils tombent, nos jeunes héros,
La France en produit de nouveaux
Contre vous tous prêts à se battre.
Aux armes, etc.

Français, en guerriers magnanimes,
Portez ou retenez vos coups,
Espargnez ces tristes victimes
A regret s'armant contre vous;
Mais ces despotes sanguinaires,
Mais les complices de Bouillé
Tous ces tigres qui, sans pitié,
Déchirent le sein de leur mère
Aux armes, etc.

Amour sacré de la patrie,
Conduis, soutiens nos bras vengeurs:
Liberté, Liberté chérie,
Combats avec tes défenseurs:—
Sous nos drapeaux, que la victoire
Accoure à tes mâles accents;
Dan tes ennemis expirans,
Vois ton triomphe et notre gloire.
Aux armes, etc.

[THE TRANSLATION]

Now, native children of the soil
The day of glory is come,
Against us the bloody standard
Of tyranny is raised
Hear you how in the fields
These ferocious soldiers bellow?
They come even into your arms
To ruin your children, your consorts.
To arms! to arms, citizens! Form your Battalions
March! March! Let an impure blood drench our furrows.

What wills that horde of slaves
Of traitors and of plotting kings?
For whom those ignoble fetters,
Those irons long since prepared?
Frenchmen for us! Oh! what an outrage!
What transports it ought to excite;
It is we that they have dared to menace
With restoring to our ancient slavery.
To arms! To arms, &c.

What! shall strange legions
Make the law of our own fireside!
What! shall a mercenary phalanx
Trample upon our spirited warriors!
Great God! By hands linked to-gether
Our necks would bend under the yoke,
Vile despots would become
The rulers of our destinies.
To arms, &c.

Tremble tyrants; and ye perfidious:
The shame of all parties,
Tremble! your parricidal projects
Are about to receive their due:
All are soldiers to combat with ye;
If our young heroes fall
France will teem them forth anew
All in readiness to fight against you.
To Arms, &c.

Frenchman, like magnanimous warriors,
Strike or forbear your blows;
Spare those weeping victims
Arming themselves against you with regret,—
But those sanguinary despots,
But the accomplices of Bouillé
And those tigers who would without pity
Rend the bosom of their mother
To arms, &c.

Sacred love of country
Conduet, sustain our avenging arms
Liberty, beloved Liberty
Fight with thy defenders.
Under our banners, let victory
Hearken to thy exulting notes,
In thy expiring enemies
See thy triumph and our glory.
To arms! To arms, &c.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 2, 1830.

PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.

Parturient Montes.

It would be uncharitable in us not to pay a passing tribute to the worthy members of the late Philadelphia Convention: we are a little puzzled to know in what manner to commence our encomium—for if we say nothing, we shall be accused as one of the 'muzzled'—if we say much, we shall say more than was known—if we praise, 'twill be deemed flattery—if we find fault, we shall be acting under the influence of Masonic Oaths, and if we speak 'the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth!' [Thacher] we shall have all the FreePresses in the Union unmuzzled in terrible array against us:—truly we are in a most pitiable dilemma;—but we seize the pen and without forethought will endeavor to find our way through the following incongruous mass of quoted nonsense.

We hope our readers will pardon us for this aberration of duty—for we must notice the most ridiculous and farcical farce of all farces that has been enacted by the congregated antimasonic wisdom from all quarters at Philadelphia—even the delegates themselves are ashamed: but they have these consoling lines to ease their consciences, which we quote for their edification and as a heading to the 'Grand Convention' following, they run thus:

Man, proud man!

Dressed in a little brief authority,

Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven

As make the angels weep.

MONDAY, SEPT. 13, 1830.

The Convention opened with a prayer (?) from the REVEREND Mosts Thacher!

The business was commenced by a Mr. Irwin, who had, it seems, been diving deep into the smuggling profession; he must be an adept at the calling, for he roundly accused the Masons of 'smuggling and piracy,' and the old adage says, 'set a thief to catch a thief.' It is of no use to give his speech, for, without hearing a word of it, every body will be convinced of the truth of his quoted assertion.

After Mr. Irwin was seated, Mr. Adams, from Medford, Mass. arose, and presented a communication from Samuel G. Anderton; probably, written by the amanuensis of the 'Boston Investigating Committee,' in which he still persists in the truth of his diabolical fabrication. Verily, friend Anderton, when the Devil gets thee he will show thee no mercy; for if ever a soul should be damned for lying, thy soul, my old fellow, will come but poorly off. Not one of the Boston delegation dared to present the ridiculous document.

Next came a resolve, which was carried, to make a President and Vice President for the United States! How kind these antics are: their candidates, of course, will be selected from their virgin flock. Certainly these men deserve immortality.

Next, some dispute between Messrs. Middleswarth of Penn., McCulloch, and Hopkins, respecting seats.

Mr. Street of New York, offered the following:

Resolved, That a committee be raised to inquire into the pecuniary circumstances and situation of the family of Capt. William Morgan, and to report what measures, if any, should be adopted for their support.

Mr. Stevens, of Penn. 'thought that this convention, as such, had nothing to do with the family of Capt. William Morgan. The abduction and murder of that individual did not constitute the basis of antimasonry! [Indeed! this is new news to us. Let us ask, do you begin to feel ashamed of your Morgan excitement?] That was, PERHAPS, a providential circumstance in its favor!' Mr. S. is certainly a wiseacre; if king Solomon were alive in these Masonic days, he would place Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, on the right of his council board.

Mr. Street rose to explain: then Mr. Reed, of New-York, 'could not perceive that the resolution was calculated to lead the public mind astray.' That, probably, was the reason why the others were opposed to it. Mr. McCulloch, of New-Jersey, who had just been reading the Knight of LaMancha, 'considered the resolution Quixotic!' Oh, you Sancho Panza, you! he also said 'the object of the convention was to prevent future mischief.' He must have looked far ahead for his light. Mr. Ballou, of Mass. rose to observe; and hoped the resolution would prevail. The 'everlasting Amasa' alias Mr. Amasa Walker, of Boston, 'thought it inexpedient—great sympathy felt for Morgan—his name had been immortalized,' etc. etc.

Mr. Cook, of New-York, 'had made it his business to become acquainted with the family of Capt. Morgan, and hoped the question would be waived for the present.' Has this man ever read Sprague's 'Curiosity'? He must be a 'gentleman,' otherwise he would have some other 'business' to do beside that of prying into 'family' affairs.

The resolution was postponed—and Mr. Taylor of New York, gave the following:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to make inquiry as to the influence of Freemasonry on the public press, and whether it be expedient to adopt any measures in relation thereto.

Mr. Todd, of Penn.; called for the gentleman's reasons.

Mr. Taylor replied that, 'he was aware that when he alleged anything against the public press, he touched a hornet's nest. He had lived near the prison where Morgan had been confined. The press had been there muzzled by Freemasonry. He did not know whether the convention could do any thing with effect upon this subject; but he thought it was proper for them to take it into consideration.' No one can doubt the propriety of the question for a moment.

Mr. Hopkins, of New-York, 'did not hesitate to say, that since the abduction and murder of Morgan, the press had presented a phenomenon!' How could he have the temerity to assert such a thing? Was he not afraid of having his throat cut from ear to ear? He then spoke at length, with a most happy flow of terrifying words, about an English banker who was lodged by the Masons of New York, through mistake, in a palace!—Morgan—could not learn facts—Our friends acted nobly!—the Masons, like d—d blackguards—our friends were hooted at—doors closed against us in this city—the question was, whether WE were to be ruled by the secret influence of a secret combination, or by representatives freely elected by a free people!!! [Qu. Whose shoulders does this remark alight upon?—we merely ask for information.] He concluded with the following beautiful language—the Orators of the United States are unrivalled:—'The press is your forum! the press is the Orator of twelve millions of people! if the press and the juries are against you, where are your liberties and safety?' We will answer this:—Your 'liberties' are in your free presses devoted entirely to antimasonic subjects; it is a liberty you now enjoy, and know how to make use of: your 'safety' is the contempt of the human race—and your retreats are in your secret committee rooms, established to endeavor to break up the society of Masons, merely because they have secrets you can't get at.

Mr. Terry, of Connecticut, informed the learned gentlemen of the convention that 'Connecticut, the Athens of America, had but one single press in which truth was published, and that paper (of course) was an antimasonic one; which has the repute of being a good for nothing paper, not to be believed, and edited by a worthless fellow from New-York.' It gives us much satisfaction to perceive that these men can, sometimes, when occasion requires, speak the truth. Now hear him fib—for he has just said there was ONE free press in Connecticut, and immediately afterwards we have these words: 'If we had possessed a free press in this country there would have been no occasion for this convention to have assembled here. The people only required information to set them right.' Yes, my honest delegate, they do but require information, and when they get it, and they are now in the way of it every day, they will set you and your coadjutors to rights, and, we fear, much too soon for your comfort.

Mr. Miles, of Penn., 'thought there was no difficulty about free presses if they were only paid well!'

Mr. Whittlesey, of New-York, then repeated the history of William Morgan. What treacherous memories these fellows must have to require such frequent tuition.

Mr. Todd, of Penn. stood up to explain something he had previously said; he then continued the story of Morgan where Mr. Whittlesey had left off.

Mr. Ruggles said something wise about the king of France and muzzling the press and thence drew wiser conclusions.

Mr., commonly called Doctor, Abner Phelps, 'Rejoiced that the resolution had been thus introduced. He hoped it would be agreed to, without waiting for the committee, of which I am chairman, to bring forward the subject!'

Mr. Boileau, spoke; but was called to order. Mr. Cook made observations to the same effect.

Mr. Seward, of New-York, continued the Morgan story.

Mr. Stevens spoke at length about Masonic influence, &c. Seemed to be chagrined when he adverted to the distressing fact that, comparatively, not one knew of their 'Great Meeting.' He concluded with the following antimasonic language, 'So long as it [the outrage on Morgan] was sanctioned by them, the ghost of the murdered should move before them, even though it [the ghost] should sear [burn] their eye-balls!' Gracious me! how you talk!

The resolution was adopted; and on motion of Mr. Whittlesey, it was Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report to this convention what judicial evidence exists as to the truth of the disclosures relative to the Masonic obligations.

We thought they had no doubt whatever in regard to Masonic obligations; but, lo, and behold, the cat is let out at the little hole in the bag.

The convention, after a list of names and places of residence had been made, adjd. to Tuesday, 9 o'clock.

The preceding, though an abridgment is a very perfect sketch!

TUESDAY. The delegates reassembled at the Saloon of the Musical Fund Society.

Mr. Clark, of Vt. reported that it was inexpedient to admit other persons than members to take seats for the purpose of voting, &c. Mr. Stevens, of Penn., amended it by allowing honorary members to participate.

[Had we been there we would have introduced the following resolutions:

Resolved, That no professional gentleman, unless he be one of us, shall have the barbarity to neglect a dying sister, that he may, by so doing, serve his Country and his God, either in a State Legislature or in an antimasonic SECRET Committee-room.

Resolved, That we do honor and esteem that man who holds a diploma which he knows he has used improper means to obtain—being aware, at the time of procuring it, that he had fraudulently obtained an instrument, by which he became licensed to destroy those, who, not suspecting villany under so fair a mask, placed themselves under his protection.

Resolved, That we think that any professional man, who, for fear of having his own ignorance exposed, will have the barbarity to let an unprotected girl suffer and die under his empiricism—who knows he is doing wrong yet so continues to do—who sees his kindred writhing in the agonies of death, dying for want of proper and skilful attendance, and yet looks on with cold indifference—who thus becomes, in fact, a murderer—is a worthy member of society—a suitable person to represent a moral community in the Grand United States Antimasonic Convention: for, if it be true that he has, by wanton neglect, caused the death of an innocent and lovely girl, it is no concern of ours, if he be a useful man to us!!!]

Mr. Dexter, of Michigan, opposed the resolution: Mr. Terry, of Conn., was in favor of the amendment: Mr. Ruggles, of Mass., was opposed to it; so was Mr. Slade, of Vt. and Whittlesey of N. Y.; but, the 'Everlasting,' from Mass., insisted upon the propriety of the amendment. Whereupon, the resolution was again amended so as to admit all honorary members merely to the privilege of participating in debate.

Mr. Stevens expressed the opinion that 'there was no danger, in the admission of honorary members, of any Mason attempting to take a seat among them!' He never before, in so few words, spoke so much truth. Masons take seats with ye! Sooner will the clouds eject pitchforks than will the Masons so degrade themselves!

The resolution was agreed to; and Mr. Linley, of N. C. was admitted as an 'honorary'!

Mr. Whittlesey, of N. Y., submitted a report containing a lucid account of the abduction and murder of William Morgan! which 'occupied one hour in perusal.'

Mr. Seward, of New York, 'rose and said that it was an exceedingly interesting document!' How they like to puff each other.

Mr. Cook, of N. Y., gave some additional facts connected with the abduction of Morgan: the following LIE he put into the mouths of Masons, 'high in their order,' viz: 'that the lives of a half dozen such men as Morgan and MILLER (!) were nothing in comparison with the importance of preventing the publication of that book!' Does Mr. Cook recollect this commandment—'Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.'—Holy Bible. 'He also mentioned a fact [this word is used so frequently, by the anties, for every surmise of theirs, that we feel disposed to edify them a little by giving its proper definition, which they seem not to comprehend:—'FACT. s. A thing done; REALITY, not SUPPOSITION; action; deed; Walker.] for which he could not but feel a blush on his face, [he blushed!] in relation to some Mason who had been confined in prison. The daughters of many of his brother Masons had waited upon him in jail, and when he was released, a cavalcade was formed to honor him! And this caused a blush!—a mark of affection shown to an injured man caused this feeling one to blush! We hope the 'blush' was an omen of repentance.

Mr. Merrick 'wished to turn their attention to the proper means for effecting a cohesion of the antimasonic party.' He should have added, 'E pluribus unum.' Had we asserted this fact we should have heard of 'Masonic obligations,' &c.

Mr. Maynard, of N. Y. complimented the ability of the report. 'The facts it contained, were, he was satisfied, all TRUE! [We thought that they were in a dilemma about their 'FACTS,' but it was desirable to ascertain whether they were ALL such as should at present be disclosed to the public! Take care of the Cat; the bug is open. What! antimasons keep a secret from the public? Impossible! They are going to do away with secrets forever, for the benefit of the world. This looks like effect!

The 'New-Yorker' 'pungently ridiculed the antiquity of Masonry.' Will the Masons ever get over this 'pungent' ridicule?

Mr. Maynard made a report about 'honorary' members, and the convention adjd. to 4 o'clock. In the afternoon a committee was appointed to look after a President and a Vice President for the United States.

WEDNESDAY. Considerable discussion on the Presidential question. Mr. Stevens thought that if they did not do something on that subject 'the convention had met in vain, and worse than in vain.' What a declaration.

Mr. Thacher, the Reverend Mr. Moses Thacher, made a report on 'the nature and spirit of antimasonry,' &c. &c. Several others spoke; and several resolves were acted upon.

Mr. Phelps, the 'Doctor,' submitted the following:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to report upon the effects of Freemasonry on the Christian religion.

Is the doctor afraid that Masonic influence will drive him from the flock? Does he stand on ice?

The convention adjd. and at 4 the clan reassembled. A resolution, 'authorizing the committee of finance to obtain subscriptions to defray the expenses of the convention,' was adopted!

After some arrangements had been agreed to the convention adjourned.

THURSDAY. Messrs. Read and Holley, of N. Y. offered resolutions. Mr. Taylor, of N. Y. gave a history of the Press of the United States, for which editors and publishers will feel themselves indebted. He says, 'the whole number of presses is 983, 123 of which are truth-tellers, alias antimasonic; the rest are composed of those under Masonic influence; which "live in an atmosphere of falsehood; draw their nutriment from calumny of the best and purset,"' [the anties] &c. Mr. Taylor dwelt upon the fate of poor Morgan. By-the-by, these gentlemen, it seems, are somewhat interested in the free press business. Recollect, there are one hundred and twenty-three FREE presses in this country, and only 111 members connected with those establishments present: why not make up the full 123: surely your disinterested workies should be rewarded! Have ye no funds appropriated to this charitable object? Probably the following is intended to settle that batgain:

Resolved, That we will give OUR patronage and support to such newspapers and periodical publications as are conducted upon independent principles, unshackled by the influence of Masonic ties.

Our limits will not permit us to pursue this 'interesting subject' as far as we could wish; we therefore will sum up the remainder in as few words as possible. During the remainder of this day, and the next, (Friday) 13 resolves, beside reports, &c. were acted upon; from which we extract the following, and then we bid the subject a speedy journey on towards its goal—oblivion.

Resolved, That in the judgment of this convention, an actual adherence by Freemasons to the principles contained in the obligations of the order, is inconsistent with the higher and paramount duties which they owe to the state, and is a disqualification for offices of public trust.

If we understand this rightly, the true meaning is—that they are opposed to all societies that are bound together by mutual ties of friendship and of love—and that all such societies, acting on the principle of good will toward all men, are unworthy institutions, the members of which are disqualified for offices of public trust; and, that the antimasons, not being under such salutary ties, are the only persons who are qualified for offices of public trust, and who are worthy of public confidence!

Resolved, That the political character of Freemasonry is established in the clearest manner! Indeed! And therefore should be abolished. Let us ask, what is the character of Anti-masonry? vide Resolve, below.—Do ye not say, that 'the candidates to be nominated [for the presidency] must be animated by the spirit and principles of antimasonry?' and yet ye are opposed to party distinctions: oh, what a bundle of inconsistencies is antimasonry!

Mr. Bernard said, 'that agreeably to the resolution, the seceding Masons could not certify to the truth of any obligation of Masonry of which they did not possess personal knowledge. Now, although he had received the most indubitable testimony of the accuracy of the passage or obligation reported by the chairman of the committee, none of the seceding Masons composing that committee personally knew its truth. They could not, therefore, certify it' (!!!) and cannot, therefore, be entitled to any belief.

Resolved, That it is recommended to the people of the United States, opposed to secret societies, to meet in convention on Monday, the 26th day of Sept. 1831, at the city of Baltimore, by delegates equal in number to their representatives in both houses of Congress, to make nominations of suitable candidates for the offices of President and Vice President, to be supported at the next election; and for the transaction of such other business as the cause of antimasonry may require,

With this resolve ends our report and the 'Grand Antimasonic Convention' of Philadelphia. This little paragraph has been the main spring on which depended the great machine called antimasonry. Now, be it known to all men, by these presents, that we, the anties, declare that 'the POLITICAL character of Freemasonry is established'—and, for the development of this wonderful truth, we offer the above resolve to you in lieu of payment for our important services! Not that we wish to hold political offices! No, God forbid! but that we may have a check on the overgrown influence of Masons.

Truly, we may conclude as we began:—The mountain labored, and brought forth—What?—a MOUSE!—Take care of the cat for she is out of the bag!

PLAYING OF THE CORNER STONE.

In reply to our Portsmouth correspondent, we would remark, that the shortness of the time, which the advanced stage of the season allows for preparations, precludes the possibility of extending the invitations, to the extent, and in the manner he intimates. But we assure our friends in New-Hampshire, and in all the New-England states, that the Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of this Commonwealth, would be gratified to have them attend and unite in the interesting ceremony. For ourselves we would be happy to see every Mason in New-England present.—We would show our vile and profligate libellers that Masons are not ashamed to declare themselves—that they are not ashamed to meet their fellow-citizens, with ALL the decorations and badges of Masonry upon them.—We hope that every Mason, whether in the State or out of it, if he can, will attend.

THEATRE.—Cooper, the great favorite of the play-going people of this city, appeared on Monday, and ably sustained the arduous and difficult character of Macbeth.—We have not seen him for many years in, apparently, better health. He enacts his parts, for all that we can see, with as much spirit and energy, as he did ten years ago.—He is truly the 'veteran of the American stage,' and may he long continue to gratify the 'admirers of the legitimate drama, and the lovers of fine acting.' Mad. Ravenot and M. Durissel have given general satisfaction. Mad. R. is said to be the most accomplished and graceful dancer ever witnessed on the American stage. On Tuesday, Hackett appeared as Solomon Swap, in 'Jonathan in England.' His broad yan-keisms were irresistible. To say that he kept fifteen hundred or two thousand people, men, women and children, in perfect good humor with themselves, and all the rest of the world besides, for the space of two hours, is paying no small compliment to his comical powers. There is no such thing as withstanding his 'Uncle Ben.' It would make misanthropy itself laugh. We wish our antimasonic friends would go and see him next week. It might be the means of eradicating some of their base passions, and putting them in better humor with their neighbors. Cooper personated the 'crooked-back tyrant' on Wednesday evening. The part was sustained with his usual ability. Mrs. Sharp's Queen Elizabeth was an excellent representation. Buckingham seldom has a more faithful representative than he found in Pearson this evening. The talents of this young gentleman will eventually place him high in his profession.

THE GREEK FAIR,

Of the New Haven fair: a short poetical epistle addressed to Miss——, one of the fairest of the fair.

New Haven, Sept. 2, 1830.

FAIREST MISS,—

IT was my chance to speculate
A scene, last eve, most delicate,
Of which the muse might predicate,
Never such in Connecticut
So fairly shone;—and to dispense
The beauties of FAIR EXCELLENCE:
'Come to my aid,' ye sisters nine,
And help to string this lyre of mine,
With FAIR design to sing of charms,
Which, wrapt in love, the bosom warms:
To sweetest contemplation given
Of female group, a type of heaven;
'To range around celestial faces
And 'forms divine,' with all their graces.
FAIR EXCELLENCE in all its forms
The spacious room so large adorns—
As if a host of female angels,
That nor lip, nor quill, nor tongue tells
Nor can the aid of language reach,
Or mortal on the topic preach
In the adequacy of style—
Yet let us dwell the theme awhile.

'There ne'er on earth before did muster
Of female worth so fine a cluster;—
Fine gentlemen, (the name that wear
Without dissemblance) too, were there;
Nor call my too advent'rous song
'To sing they moved a thousand strong,
Whom all the social virtues warmed—
(By which ne'er mortal yet was harmed.)

See tables full as they can hold
Of goods for silver and for gold—
Of star-dazzles and earthly gems
'To suit the women's tastes and men's—
In sidelong ranges to the angles
Of the room, so filled with spangles
Of all variety of sorts—
Each item the purse-string courts,
And humble non-resistance names,
And always making good its claims.

Goranium sprigs were sold as follows,
For quarters, halves, and whole dollars;
As were of flowers of various mixture
Of every different kind and fixture—
As yellow, blue, and green, (for Greek,)
And such as red and pink bespeak.

See fine ice creams for warm young hearts,
(O how their taste a chill imparts;)
These sold, each, at a New York shilling,
And quick to keep the goblet filling;
Cakes sold well, of the shape of hearts,
And jellies and puff-paste tarts—
And a thousand prettinesses
So sweetly handed round by Misses,
And quicker sale, as winning graces
Showed prettier fingers, prettier faces.
The witchery of a female tongue!—
When moved, the purse and all was gone.
Who can resist a woman's voice?—
Man makes his own his proffered choice.
O did ye see 'the course of trade,'
And eye in smile each beauteous maid?
And see the features of her face?
That bought and sold with traffic grace
Divinely inexpressible
By the tongue—how then by the quill!

'Twas not the sly man-merchant's tale
To help along approaching sale;
No single tone of male palaver—
(Nor any thing the thing does savor)
But sweet persuasion with good sense,
Of FAIR and fairest eloquence.
To purchase for the suffering Greek—
(Nor fairer words the mouth can speak)—
In all simplicity of truth
And need, as excellence couples both,
So FAIR in pleading for distress,
And how the rich the poor should bless.

Sufficient this;—it was a scene
An earthly paradise did seem,
In full display of heavenly charms
That act the part the heart which warms
Into the ecstasies of love—
That thus the female tribe should move
In all the range (well understood)
Of doing nothing else but good.

Humor was pleased, and kindness too,
'To see the venders 'wed and woo'
The claims of generosity—
And prevalent suggestions ply,
To make the buyers, without lack,
Their new-bought articles give back,
And they in turn to sell again
Where 'happy needful' did remain.
Some fair, perhaps of fairest mould,
That charity loves more than gold,
Would thus rebuy to fill the coffers
Of the Greek, which th' occasion offers.

Sweet Charity! hail sacred name!—
A sound that wakes the sacred flame
Of love to God beneficent—
'T was Ho his Christ to mortals sent—
And help shall we forbear to send
To any case that needs a friend?

O for the Fair let anthems rise—
Then FAIREST FAIR shall kiss the skies.
Their bounties blest the sufferer's need
And heaven approve FAIR virtue's deed.
God bless the FAIR and fairest aims—
They've got themselves immortal names
By acts of this benevolence
Divine of Greek beneficence.
'T was always true (nor need be told)
They are the bright of this world's mould,
'Heaven's last best gift,' in Bible style—
Yes, next to God's a woman's smile.
Of all the boons of human life,
The very best BOON's a FAIR wife.

Yours, OTIANT LINGUISTIC.

OF MASONIC TEMPLE.

LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE.

It is with much pleasure that we are enabled to inform our readers, that the Corner Stone of the Masonic Temple to be erected in this city, will be laid, in due form, on THURSDAY, [next] the FOURTEENTH of October. Our brethren, throughout the state, and such from adjacent states as can make it convenient, it is presumed will attend and assist in the performance of this peculiarly gratifying ceremony.

SAMUEL G. ANDERTON.

FURTHER PROOF FROM BELFAST.

The subjoined correspondence gives the finishing blow to Anderton's infamous fabrication. It seems that Mr. Tucker is an antimason; but he despises the villainous management of the antics of this country. He denounces Masonry, yet he will defend it from the calumny of the vile and interested calumniator. We honor him for his candor and fairness. The editor of the Standard introduces the correspondence with the following remark: we were 'yesterday put in possession of the accompanying letters and affidavits, connected with a charge which has been made, not as in the case of Morgan, against individuals of the Masonic fraternity, but against an entire Masonic Lodge. It is proper to state, that Mr. Clarke had informed Col. Heman Norton, of Rochester, a distinguished antimason, formerly a member of our Legislature, elected on antimasonic grounds, that he had opened a correspondence with Mr. Tucker, and would show it to Col. Norton when completed. In accordance with this promise, Mr. Clarke, on receipt of his letter, yesterday, by the ship Atlantic from Belfast, broke the seal in presence of Col. N., who admitted that the letter, with the accompanying documents, form a complete refutation of the charge that Miller had been murdered. The friend to whom Mr. Clarke made the declaration that he would renounce Masonry if the alleged murder should be proved, was Col. William L. Stone, of the Commercial Advertiser. With this statement, we submit the whole matter to the consideration of an enlightened community, not doubting that the conscientious antimason will be convinced, and that the bubble of political antimasonry will be forever exploded.

To the Editor of the New-York Standard:

Sir—Without a desire to produce any other effect, than to subserve the cause of truth and justice, I submit for publication the following correspondence.

It may be proper to premise that I am a Mason, and sustained, about nine years ago, an important relation to the Royal Arch Chapter in Rochester. Since that period I have never (with a single exception,) attended a meeting, either of a Chapter or Lodge. I had practically abandoned Freemasonry; and but for the affair of Morgan's abduction, should probably have never again interested myself in its concerns. The circumstances attending that event, were dark and mysterious; and assumed to my mind an increased interest, from their happening in the region where the connexion alluded to, had subsisted. Extraordinary in themselves, their interest was still further increased by an affidavit made some months ago by Samuel G. Anderton, of the murder of William Miller, at Belfast. This story was calculated, not only to confirm the worst surmises in relation to Morgan, but also to transfer the atrocity of such deeds from infatuated individuals, to the deliberate, if not official acts, of the Masonic Institution. Such was its effect; and in conversation with a friend on the subject, soon after its publication, I observed to him, that if it was true, I would renounce Freemasonry. He intimated a fear that it was, and assigned his reasons. I thereupon expressed a determination to write to a personal friend of mine at Belfast, upon the subject, and, placing full reliance upon his integrity, would abide the issue of that information. Circumstances occurred to delay my intended purpose until May last, when I wrote the subjoined letter, to which I received his answer this morning, and now redeem my pledge made to several antimasonic gentlemen to disclose the result, whatever the nature of the information might be.

It is, perhaps, proper to add further, that Mr. Tucker is a native and resident of Belfast, and personally known to me as a gentleman of undoubted integrity. His impartiality may be judged of, from the fact that the correspondence was carried on without any knowledge by either party, whether the other was or was not, a member of the fraternity. Whatever may be the opinions of Mr. Tucker, relative to Masonry, yet the facts he adduces are conclusive; and not only relieve the Institution from the odium of the charge, but prove that the statement of Anderton is a gross fabrication.

Disclaiming altogether any political objects in the publication of this correspondence, I offer it for the consideration of the honest and enlightened portion of the community.

Yours, respectfully,

L. H. CLARKE.

New York, Sept. 24th, 1830.

The following is a copy of the letter addressed to Mr. Tucker.

New-York, May 15th, 1830.

My Dear Sir—The friendly feelings that have been manifested towards me, both by yourself and your lamented brother, have induced me to trespass upon you, and to ask of you the favor to give me such information as you possess or may be able to obtain, in relation to an event said to have occurred in Belfast, and which has caused no little curiosity and solicitude on this side of the water.

To understand the scope of my inquiries, it may be proper for me to premise, what may, perhaps, be already within your knowledge, that two or three years ago, a man by the name of William Morgan, a Mason, in the western part of this state, became disaffected towards the fraternity, and published a book, professing to reveal the secrets of Freemasonry. Certain members of the order, being indignant at his conduct, got possession of his person, and hurried him away in a close carriage, nearly an hundred miles to the Niagara River, where, it is generally believed, he was drowned. This outrage very naturally created a great excitement; and as the extent of the offence has never been fully proved, nor the perpetration of it fastened upon any particular individuals, the whole society of Freemasons has been brought into controversy, and a party has arisen determined to put down the institution altogether. This in our free country, can only be accomplished by the force of public opinion; and the drift of the argument is, that oaths are taken by Masons paramount to all civil obligations; so strong, indeed, and so imperative, as to lead to the commission of homicide in its cause. As evidence of such tendency, the case, not only of Morgan is adduced, but it is also said that a man by the name of William Miller was murdered by the Masons in Belfast, in the year 1813, and that his body was thrown into the Limekiln dock. This has been sworn to by a man by the name of Samuel G. Anderton, at Boston, (U. S.) in March last. I enclose you a copy of the affidavit. Perhaps something may be ascertained respecting it at the Coroner's Office.

I should be glad to know—

1. Whether such a murder was actually committed, or if so,
2. Whether it was perpetrated by Masons, and the proof. And
3. Whether, in the absence of proof, there has been at any time, any imputation, other than vulgar gossip, of such a deed by that body.

I likewise enclose the copy of an affidavit by Agnes Bell, dated 24th April, 1830; and a copy of a Report, dated at Boston, 5th April, 1830, of a Committee consisting of Messrs. Jacob Hall, Benj. W. Lamb, and Isaac Porter, on the same subject.

The two latter I have included, merely for the purpose of facilitating inquiry.

I regret to give you so much trouble on a subject in which you have no personal interest; but such is the state of feeling here, that it would be a matter of gratification, not only to myself, but to many others to learn the true state of facts. I am aware of no source to which resort can be had with so fair a prospect of obtaining a candid and impartial statement of the truth, as from one who has the sagacity to perceive, judgment to discriminate, firmness and independence to assert, and the Christian principle to love it, for its own sake.

Accept, dear sir, my apology for asking this favor, and for requesting a reply at your earliest convenience.

I am, with unfeigned respect,

Your friend and ob't servt,
LEVI H. CLARKE.

Edward Tucker, Esq.

P. S.—Will you be so good as to state whether you are yourself a Mason; also, whether an antimasonic excitement exists in Ireland; and furthermore, whether you had before heard of the Morgan abduction?

Yours, L. H. C.

REPLY.

Belfast, Aug. 3, 1830.

Dear Sir—I had almost concluded you had never received my letter conveying the intelligence of my lamented brother's death, when your favor, of May 15, reached me a few days since.

The subject matter of your letter was recently brought before the public of this country through the medium of the periodical press, and created no small sensation, especially amongst that part of the community associated with the fraternity of Masons. The charge was a very serious one, and if it could have been substantiated, would justly entitle the accused body to the execration of all rational beings, as well as justify the exercise of legislative authority to annihilate a society, whose band of union required and sanctioned such sanguinary and horrid deeds to its conservation.

As might be expected, an investigation of the matter took place. The "craft" being in danger, was sensitively alive to its interests and safety, and appeared anxious to wipe off the foul stain attempted to be fixed upon its character. An application to the coroner produced the enclosed affidavit on the subject, which, in connexion with the testimony of James "Kennedy," and several other members of the Lodge implicated, goes to a total denial of the alleged occurrence.

In a case of such awful turpitude, the evidence of interested men, like the latter, will be received with caution, but there are concurrent facts which support their credibility in this instance, and have almost satisfied the inhabitants of this kingdom that the whole story is a gross fabrication, got up for some sinister motive, to impose on the credulity of the uninitiated, and to malign a harmless (and as some think) a benevolent institution.

If such an occurrence has taken place, it is incredible, that in a town like this, where three newspapers were published, so extraordinary a circumstance as the discovery of a man's body in the dock, with his throat and side cut open should escape notice. Now all the papers of that period have been minutely examined, and not the slightest allusion to such an event can be met with. In the 'Commercial Chronicle' of 7th or 8th of June, 1813, which I examined, there is a paragraph headed 'another murder,' but it is in relation to an old woman in Scotland, and has reference to some shocking murders lately perpetrated in London.

The time is not very remote, and yet no one can be found in this place who recollects any such tragical death or its attendant rumours.

Part of Anderton's statement, about the Lodge room and tavernkeepers house. I believe was true, although he was wrong as to the name, which was Greenwood and not Greenlow. This man is since dead. There is, however much description of Miller which does not well comport with truth. He says he spent an evening with Miller, and called on him several times where he wrought. Why then does he not be more explicit as to the street where Miller resided, or the mill in which he was employed.

After all, there is something mysterious in the whole matter. Several persons in America came forward voluntarily, to assert that they recollect the transaction, and yet no one here knows any thing about it.

You asked me two or three questions, which I shall answer seriatim. First, I am not, nor ever was a Freemason. I look upon such associations, if not criminal to be perfectly useless and antichristian. If one may judge from what is obvious and revealed, the mysteries of these arcana are a tissue of puerile and contemptible absurdities.

Second, Whatever may be the private opinion of the wise and reflecting, there is no general antimasonic feeling abroad amongst us. We are too much engrossed with the sayings and doings of opposite political faction to meddle with a fraternity which professes political neutrality, and a desire to unite all parties in the bond of charity.

Third, I do not think that the Morgan abduction is generally known in this country, nor does it appear from your letter, that is has been yet satisfactorily proved to have taken place.*

I beg, dear sir, to tender my thanks for the flattering and I fear unmerited eulogium you have passed on my judgment, independence, and Christian principle. I am a plain man of business, and make no great pretensions to sagacity or superior intelligence, but I hope I shall ever be disposed to act fearlessly from conviction.

I am, dear sir, very respectfully, yours,

EDW'D. TUCKER.

P. S. Please to present my regards to your brother if you have an opportunity. E. T.

*It will be perceived that Mr. T. misapprehended the nature of the doubt I expressed, which related not to the abduction, but to the positive facts of the murder. L. H. C.

The following documents were inclosed in the letter, and bear ample proof of the groundless character of the charge.

FREEMASONRY.—A Philadelphia newspaper, called The Sun, has given publicity to a marvellous account of a deliberate murder, stated to have been committed in a Masonic Lodge in this town in the year 1813 on a person by the name of Wm. Miller, who was accused of disclosing the secrets of brotherhood. Samuel G. Anderton, who gives a detailed account of the alleged crime, asserts that he was himself a spectator of the deed, which was affected in a Masonic Lodge and that he was appalled by the screams or outcry of the sufferer; who, if this slanderer can be believed, was put to death in the most barbarous manner, and his body cast into Limekiln Dock. An inquest, he avers, was afterwards held upon it, and a verdict, 'that Wm. Miller was murdered by some unknown persons was found by the Jury.' We have made inquiry respecting this calumnious story, and find that it is a tissue of falsehood from beginning to end. No such person as Wm. Miller was ever admitted into any lodge in this town; and Mr. Allan, the Coroner, declares that he has examined his books, or registry from a period prior to the year 1813, down to the present time, and that no inquest was held on the body of any individual of that name; and that if any report of such a murder had been current in Belfast, he must have heard of it. Our readers may naturally inquire into the causes which could induce any man to invent and propagate so base a slander on that ancient and honorable brotherhood the Masonic Craft. They must, however be aware, that on the continent of Europe a prosecution has been excited against the Masonic Body, chiefly because they maintain some secrets so inviolably, that the Priests, who think that nothing ought to be concealed from their knowledge, cannot extract the information, which their Reverences, are so anxious to obtain, from their faithful bosoms. In America, also, newspapers have been established for the very purpose of reviling and vilifying them. One of these is termed, 'The Antimasonic Journal.'—

'The Sun' in question is another; and to causes of this nature we attribute the groundless attack made on the Craft in general, through the sides of their brethren at Belfast.—The Guardian.

To the Editor of the Guardian.

Sir—Having seen with regret and alarm a paragraph in The Belfast News Letter of the 21st instant, quoted from the Sun of April 3d, a new publication got up in Philadelphia, holding out a stigma of the order of Freemasonry, in the form of the most atrocious crime, alleged to have been perpetrated in Belfast in 1813, the infamous writer of which must be a tool of a faction, unhappily existing at present in that part of America, and who, to accomplish his nefarious design, has placed the scene of the alleged crime at such distance, in respect of time and place, as he supposes will prevent any contradiction. But the utmost promptitude, vigilance, and exertion, shall be used to have the matter probed to the very bottom; and for that purpose, we will have the assistance of our respectable Coroner in searching the records of his office—of our enlightened and impartial Magistrates—and we will forthwith memorial his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, Grand Master of England, to open a communication with the British Consul in America, to have the writer of that article apprehended, as an acknowledged accessory in the alleged crime.

Our secrecy, we admit, has been the theme of admiration and curiosity, yet our sanctuaries nurture not, even in idea, such crimes; and therefore we spurn most contemptuously such calumny, and do not hesitate to predict to our enlightened Brethren in the Western Hemisphere, that that recently created Sun newspaper, which, contrary to nature and our order, has there arisen, which has taken a retrograde motion, and permitted its rays or columns to be dimmed and contaminated with such infamous fabrications, will ere long set in its own circumscribed revolution—the West, under a dark cloud, to rise no more; for truth will not only eclipse the most glaring flash of such a meteor as that Sun, but will survive the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds!

The above cursory remarks were only designed to be submitted on reading the first publication on the subject; but now that the detail is before the public, we leave it at present; and revert to the more essential duty, viz. a strict and legal investigation of the matter, in justification of our ancient Order; and on behalf of the Brotherhood; and beg you will favor us, by giving the above publicity in your widely circulated and esteemed paper.

Your very obedient servant,

ROBERT DICK, Sec.

Belfast Masonic Committee

ANTIMASONIC SYMPHONIES.

NO IV.

THE MEDICAL PARSON:

Tune;—'All on hobbies.'

Good people indulge me to sing you a song,
I'll not try your patience nor trouble you long,
My heart is so full, 'tis so filled up with grief,
That a little compassion will give me relief:

All in trouble, all in trouble,

All in trouble, oh dear, and dear oh!

So Anties draw near, while of troubles I sing
For trouble they say is a troublesome thing;
And our Medical Parson, while handling that text,
Admitted the fact—he was sorely perplexed:

All in trouble, &c.

He freely prescribed for the poor Anties' ills,
And doctored us all with his real Hunt-ers pills;
But the cunning Freemasons declared him a quack,
So with Anderton's drops he renewed the attack:

All in trouble, &c.

Says the Doctor, 'in Hampden they cure without fail,
They'll subdue your disorders with old Springfield ale;
But practitioners there called our story a sham,
And they hustled and crowded; oh dear, what a jamb!

All in trouble, &c.

Then in Boston we joined a gay party at tea,
But the natives gave nothing but Boston Bohea;
There were aloes and catnip infused in the cup—
Yet each Man was put down that inclined to get up:

All in trouble, &c.

Next to great Philadelphia City we went,
To puzzle the lawyers now fully intent;
But the lawyers declared that the case was so bad,
Not one decent advocate was to be had:

All in trouble, &c.

Oh dear! if a City of Refuge were nigh,
I think 'twould be best there to lie down and die;
For I very well know that, while life lingers out,
I shall carry a troublesome conscience about:

All in trouble, all in trouble,

All in trouble, oh dear, and dear oh!

The destruction of Masonry is not the real design of the Antimasons—far, very far from it. It is merely made the cloak to hide their designs, while it is at the same time used as the means to warm them into offices of emolument and honor. If Masonry alone was the object of their dislike—if it was the hydra which they wished to kill, then the neutrals and tolerants; or as they choose, by the way of derision, to term a large portion of the people, the Jacks and bats would escape their denunciations; but such is not the case. The Jacks and bats are called worse, far worse than Masons, and comes in for a full share of abuse and persecution. They too, with the Masons, if the Anties succeed, are to be deprived of every privilege of a freeman.

Lancaster Republican.

For the Mirror.

MR. EDITOR:—Believing it to be the duty of every individual, who desires the peace and harmony of society, to put in exercise all the power implanted in his breast by the Author of every good gift, for the suppression of every thing which tends to a contrary effect, I will offer a few (though imperfect) remarks relative to the subject of antismasonry, which has for some time raged in our quiet bodies. I know that the aiders and abettors in this wicked scheme, have brought upon themselves everlasting disgrace. I know too that the object they have in view, is to raise a few men (themselves) to power and give them (what they never will obtain where they are known,) an influence, which if they could obtain, would be the complete overthrow of all our civil and religious rights.

From a serious and impartial view of the whole subject, I am convinced that the leaders in this scene, are men of very circumscribed talents, less character; ambitious demagogues. Men who have lost all sense of respect for themselves, friends and society; who have nothing to lose, but all to gain. I find them upon inquiry, and close examination, from the most ignorant, to the most talented, from the non-professor of religion to the Rev. Divine, a set of men whose whole souls are bent upon the destruction of an Institution, which (I am bound to believe, from a knowledge of the characters of those who constitute that fraternity,) is founded upon principles of pure benevolence—an Institution that has consoled, comforted, bound up the broken heart—dried the tears of the widow, and fatherless. And let me ask of every respectable member of society, whose happiness it is to see others happy, whether such men, when their designs are known, are to be countenanced? I for one shall raise my voice and exert what little influence I may have in my humble walk through life, against their unhallowed purposes. It is high time these disturbers of public tranquillity should be marked out.—Every individual who is satisfied, that the motive by which this faction is actuated, is self aggrandizement, to the destruction of social and domestic happiness, has an important duty to perform. He owes it to his God, to society, to himself, to use his influence to suppress every movement which may have a tendency to lessen human happiness. Let every individual seriously reflect on this subject. Let him examine into the objects of the leaders in the late disgraceful scene. Let him become acquainted with the characters of those who were the cause of it, and I am sure he will come to the same conclusion as A. L.

To the Methodists of Portage County.

DEAR BRETHREN:—

I have long had it in contemplation to address you on the subject of Freemasonry—as there is much said, at the present day, on this subject. I will in the first place, give you my experience on the subject. I experienced as I fondly hope, the influence of Religion, and amid strong opposition joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, about twenty four years ago. Previous to this time I had gained a favorable opinion of Freemasonry, and my becoming a member of the church did not lessen that opinion. But I found that Masonry had its enemies, among whom were many professors of Religion, especially my grandfather, who was a Congregational Minister. I heard much said from him, and others on this subject, and the general conclusion was that there was some agency of the evil one in it, or Masons could not designate each other at such a distance, or would not go to the relief of each other in cases of extreme distress, as in the case of the deliverance by a French Officer of General Putnam from the Indians, when tied to the stake, and faggots burning around him. These arguments that were introduced to condemn Masonry, did not appear to be sound. I could not believe that such men as Washington, Warren, Franklin, Green, Putnam, and many that I was personally acquainted with would enter into, and remain active members of an Institution that was radically wrong. Yet I had many reflections, and heavy trials, before I came to a conclusion whether it was my duty to join the Masons, or not, for I did not wish, neither would I knowingly, do any thing to injure the cause of Religion. But after a number of months of prayerful attention to the subject, I came to the conclusion that the only way I could be satisfied was to join the society, and if I found there was evil in it, I could stop. I was not obligated to advance farther than my conscience dictated was right. I made the application, and was accepted. The trials I had passed through on the subjects the fears I still entertained that there might be evil in the Institution, prepared my mind for the scene. I felt solemn as eternity when I entered the Lodge Room for the first time as a Mason. I had a fixed resolution to examine the subject minutely. My mind was calm and serene, as I put my trust in Him who was able to support me. As I began to advance in Masonry, my former fears fled, as I found the Institution required its members to put their trust in the Great God Eternal. I also found that the Institution required its members to take the Bible for their rule of faith, and practice, not only then but through life. After receiving the first degree I had time to reflect, and now declare that every transaction, and the nature, and design of the Institution was so fully, and justly explained, that I had not then, and have never yet had reason to complain that I was led on without knowing why, or where. I then made up my mind to take the second degree, and was still satisfied with the nature, and design, of the Institution—I progressed until I have taken twelve degrees, and I am still satisfied. It urges like a faithful preacher, the doctrines of the Bible. It teaches us, by sensible signs the adoration due to the Great Creator—that as all mankind are brethren, and of the same blood, that charity to all is the first virtue—that as the rough corners of the stones for the Temple were knocked off to fit them for their use, so must the rough vices, and superfluities of our hearts be removed 'to fit us for that spiritual building, that house not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens.' It teaches us humility, by a striking sign of our poverty—and from thence enforces the necessity of charity to the poor. By an apt symbol it illustrates the necessity of a proper division of our time, devoting a portion to God; a portion to labor, whereby we may procure the necessities of life for our sustenance, and to bestow in charity on the poor; and a portion to refreshment and sleep. We are charged not to wrong any man knowingly, to be quiet, and loyal to our Government, and not to countenance disloyalty in any shape—to regard the rights of our fellow citizens, civil and religious—and, in short to be kind, loyal, benevolent, and virtuous in all the relations of life, and in all circumstances in which we may be placed.

In all the twelve obligations that I have taken, I have never taken one to injure, or help injure, wrong, or help wrong any of my fellow creatures. I never took one to assist a brother Mason in doing wrong—I have assisted in exalting a great many to the Royal Arch and have assisted in conferring the lower degrees—I have been in different Lodges in Canada, Vermont, New-York, Michigan, and Ohio, and in none of them did I ever see such Masonry as is palmed on us by the Antimasons as genuine.

Now brethren, you that are acquainted with me, know that I have been a plain open hearted man. I have endeavored to vindicate the cause of Religion agreeably to our view of the Gospel of Christ. I have also endeavored to give a faithful subject to our happy Country, its Constitution, and Laws—I have also been a zealous Mason.—Whether the true characters of Christian, patriot, and Mason can exist in the same individual I leave you to decide—I am a Mason and a Republican, whether I am a christian or not is a solemn question to be decided by the Tribunal of Heaven.

The time was when the Methodists were all Republicans—were all in favor of toleration, and equal rights—how it is now I will endeavor to show in my next letter.

EPHRAIM WOOD.

Streetsborough, Ohio, September 21, 1830.

The Antimasonic Convention has adjourned. Never before did such clouds bring so little rain. The attempt was a complete abortion. So much was the object despised by all classes of citizens, that even curiosity faded before contempt, and the empty benches were evidence that in a population like that of Philadelphia, there is no chance for hypocrisy, and no field for deceivers. We visited the Convention every day. At their first sitting in the small District Court room which the Convention half filled, and in a neighborhood where many citizens attending on court business resort, and have some time to waste, the room was pretty well filled. They adjourned to the Musical Hall, where fifteen hundred persons can be accommodated with seats, and at any hour and any day, thirteen hundred places were unoccupied. Every means was resorted to, to produce an excitement. Sketches of proceedings and speeches were published in one daily paper. Invitations were given to the ladies! It was announced that the interesting period had approached. Some members of the Convention endeavored to get puffs inserted in the respectable papers, and offered to pay for them. But all failed. No excitement was produced: only three females who looked like strangers attended! There was no crowd present: It was a beggarly account of empty benches.—The Convention brought with them a straggling mountebank, who lectured on Masonry for 25 cents a head. But even this did not help the cause, nobody would attend.

Of those who visited the Convention, few staid long enough to hear the half of a speech, and every one, whether Mason or not, went away despising the object.

The sitting of the Convention has produced one good result: it has shown that there is too much integrity in the political parties of Philadelphia to make the end justify the means.

The Convention was made up pretty generally of broken down politicians and time-serving trimmers.

Philadelphia Union.

☞ The Philadelphia National Gazette has the following remark on the Convention, recently held in that city:

'Francis Granger, Esq. of New York, the antimasonic candidate for the office of governor of that state, was chosen President of the Convention. He delivered a short address, in which he affirmed that the dearest interests of the American character had been committed to the assembly. It may be observed that there are no delegates from fourteen of the twenty-four states of the Union, nor from the territories except one. The majority of the states and territories—and, judging from the whole number of the delegates, the vast majority of the American people, have been strangely unmindful of the 'dearest interest of the American character.' The constituency—(a new word current in England)—is comparatively small. The Convention seems to be chiefly the affair of New-York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts, and represents only a political division in each of them. New-York political antimasonry is unquestionably the source and prime mover of the whole. The main object is generally believed to be the 'Presidential election.'

The antimasonic national convention at Philadelphia have adjourned without 'sitting the river on fire,' at the saying is. It was thought they were to nominate a president and vice-president of the United States but they have not done so; and we do not see what they have done, except to appoint a committee to inquire what effect Masonry has as regards the christian religion! How supremely ridiculous and ineffably contemptible are such pretendedly sanctified proceedings.—Albany Advertiser.

The great National Antimasonic Convention adjourned without nominating candidates for the presidency and vice-presidency, but they resolved to meet again for that purpose, in Baltimore, next September! The reason the real reason of this neglect is to be found we presume, in the fact, that the convention could not get any man of a suitable character and talents, to condescend to be their candidate. No man of distinguished talents, of exalted character, and of pure patriotism, would so far disgrace himself.

ANTIMASONIC FALSEHOOD EXPOSED.

The tale is told : let devils weep,
And low in dust and ashes creep,
That fiends on earth should so excel,
In deeds of darkness, fiends of hell.

As was anticipated, 'the good enough Morgan till after election' has been brought forth. A new champion in the cause of Antimasonry has taken the field. The green turf which has concealed the sins of Masonry for twenty years has been upturned by the sagacious resurrectionist De-Forrest; and the peaceful tenant of the grave, who had occupied his abode in silence until his generation had well nigh passed off the stage, is now forced into re-existence, and compelled, however reluctantly, to espouse the cause, and fight the battles of political Antimasonry.

For the exposure of this sin of Masonry, the murder of Loring Simonds in 1809, the world is indebted to Lemuel De Forrest. Such distinguished public services deserve something more, from the faithful journalist, than a mere passing notice.

It shall be our humble task to notice (if not in an ample, at least) in a faithful manner, the story of this murder and its author.

From the facts stated and sworn to, by Mrs. Muier, the widow of Mr. Simonds, and others of his friends and acquaintances in Albany, the story of De Forrest is proven to be a tissue of the vilest falsehood from beginning to end—untrue in every essential particular—so much as to leave it a matter of doubt whether De Forrest ever had any personal knowledge of Simonds, or the circumstances connected with his death; or whether his whole story has not been made up from a vague account of the matter, which he, De Forrest, might have picked up, and now spread before the public, with such embellishments as the managers of Antimasonry might deem best calculated to keep up the excitement and answer the purposes of the next election. But to be more particular—De Forrest has sworn to his history of the matter, and from the affidavits of the late wife of Simonds and Mr. Silliman, the story of the lent money is a lie—the story of the time and place of Simonds' death is a lie—the story of his funeral expenses being raised by subscription, of which he, De Forrest, paid a part, is a lie—and the story of the time and circumstances of his funeral is also a lie. This is language that De Forrest and the retailers of his story will not misunderstand, and if they feel aggrieved, they know their remedy; and until that remedy shall absolve De Forrest from the charge resting upon him, we hold him up to the public view as unworthy of belief or credit—as the father of many lies, and the fit servant and associate of the prince of darkness and father of liars.

If time and occasion is afforded hereafter we will give a brief history of Mr. Lemuel De Forrest, and for the information of our readers, we advise them now that there will be but a few shades of difference in his general character from the specimen we have presented above.

To the public, generally, we owe an apology for this article. Its language is coarse and unseemly; but to have sought soft words to expose such baseness would have been like attempting to set an eruption of Mt. Etna to music. When the public mind has become so poisoned & distempered by the falsehood of Antimasonry as to countenance the circulation of such a tale as that in question, (which was, no doubt, got up by the managers at Albany,) justice to that public demands our best efforts to furnish an effectual remedy.

In addition to the foregoing, we are informed, from a respectable source, that De Forrest was a Mason and was expelled, not for his good conduct.

If this be true, his story of the murder of Simonds, and the causes that led to it render him still more detestable than we have presented him.

YOUNG MEN'S MEETING.

IN CARROLL.

At a large and respectable meeting of Young Men, friendly to Democratic Principles, pursuant to public notice, held at Sears' Hotel, in Carroll, N. Y. on the 19th inst., Nathan L. Sears was called to the Chair, and John Coover appointed Secretary.

After a brief explanation of the objects of the meeting, the following men were chosen a committee to prepare some resolutions expressive of the sense of this meeting:—Benjamin P. Morgan, Richard R. Binney, Thomas J. Todd, James M'Cullah and Hamilton Davis.

After a short consultation, the committee returned with the following preamble and resolutions, which were read and unanimously adopted:

Whereas, the members of this meeting are of opinion, that that portion of citizens of which they make a part, have hitherto been too indifferent and submissive to the intrigue, false accusations and proscription imposed upon them by a club of office usurpers, together with their credulous dupes and disregards of truth, justice, philanthropy and republican principles,—therefore feel it a duty devolving upon them, to guard with more watchful vigilance every encroachment of power against that noble edifice reared by the heroism of a Washington, a Warren and a Lafayette, and maintained by the sons of liberty—therefore

Resolved, That the liberties of this republican government can never be endangered whilst the true votaries of it exercise the abilities which they possess, to put down those who acquire power by dishonest means—and that the present struggle between the parties, is one which is to decide whether the people of true patriotism will use all necessary exertions to maintain their liberties dearly bought by the blood of their forefathers, or whether they will submit to usurpation.

Resolved, That we place full confidence in the virtue and patriotism of our venerable fore-fathers who framed the constitution guaranteeing to every citizen liberty of conscience.

Resolved, That we view the political antimasonic faction as having a direct tendency to abridge our privileges, and ought to be discarded by every true hearted republican.

Resolved, That antimasonry ought not to be blended with politics, and that political antimasonry is destructive of republican principles.

Resolved, That we believe Masonry to be an institution wholly separate from politics and ought not to be brought in question at the ballot boxes.

Resolved, That we are not in favor of Freemasonry, but that in our opinion it ought to stand or fall by fair investigation and according to its merits.

Resolved, That we are of opinion that a subject ought not to be politically investigated relative to an institution which does not infringe upon the rights of the people.

Resolved, That we consider virtue the foundation, and liberty the top stone of every republican government, and that in order to build on this broad foundation, we give our united support to such men only as can present a character, both private and public, for virtue and patriotism.

The following men were then chosen as delegates to attend the County Convention to be held in Mayville on the 30th inst.:

Richard R. Binney,	Benjamin P. Morgan,
William Potter,	George W. Fenton, jr.
Nathan L. Sears,	Gorden Swift.

Voted, That the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the chairman and secretary and published in the Chautauque Republican, and all other republican papers in the county.

A GENUINE ANTIMASON.—A short time ago, a young man was admitted as an attorney at the York bar; about the same time he became a Freemason, and also joined the society of Methodists, in York. He was married to a worthy and respectable woman, and, for a while, so demeaned himself, as to be well respected in society. He did not, however, long conceal his cloven foot. He was expelled from the lodge for bad conduct; he was turned out of the Methodist society, and virtually excluded from all respectable society. Enraged that his hypocrisy had been detected, he commenced ridiculing religion and its institutions, and abusing Masonry. The bible, he declared, was a forgery, got up by priestcraft to impose on the credulity of the weak. To ridicule the religious society of which he had been a member, he collected together a number of his infidel associates on the Sabbath, near the banks of the Codorus, and acting himself as minister, in solemn mockery marched to the stream, and there baptized, by immersion, 'in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' a dog, and declared him thus introduced into the visible church of Christ. To be avenged on the Masons for having expelled him, he either did, or pretended to, reveal the secrets of the institution. After a series of conduct, too disgraceful to mention, he abandoned his family, left York, strayed from place to place, for some time, and at length emigrated to St. Domingo. Not being allowed to remain there, he returned to Kentucky, and joined the community of Shakers. He was formally driven from among them, and finally died a vagabond in New Orleans.

MASONIC EXPULSIONS. At a regular meeting of CLINTON LODGE No. 54, held at Bolivar, Tenn. on the evening of the 8th instant: it was ordered that the expulsions of Nathaniel Steele, John H. McKennie and Richard Baxter Phillips from the privileges of MASONRY, for gross unmasonic conduct, be forthwith published.

Formerly it was a maxim that a young woman should not get married until she spun herself a set of body and table linen. From this custom all unmarried women were termed spinsters—an application they still retain in England in all deeds and legal proceedings.

STANZAS.

'When true hearts lie withered
And fond ones have flown
Oh who would inhabit
This bleak world alone.'

Oh why do we sigh for the hours which have fled,
When blest innocence smiled grief away ;—
Why weep o'er the mem'ry of friends who are dead
When so many are living to-day :
Will tears bring back those balcyon hours ?
The dead can they recall ?
No ! no ! like noon's neglected flowers
They're useless where they fall !

And hearts warm and buoyant, in youth's sunny day,
Now lie withered and cold in the grave !
Ay ! may a loved one, once nappy and gay,
Are lost in eternity's wave :
They rest, like gems on ocean's sand,
In dark oblivion's night,
Awaiting the Redeemer's hand
To shine in heavenly light.

Thus hopes, budding soonest, the fairest in form,
When the heart never throbb'd to a sigh,
Are soonest to perish when touched by the storm
That has saddened and darkened its sky.

BERNALDO.

ALGIERS—THE CITY, AND THE LADIES.

The following very animated description is extracted from 'Sketches of Naval Life,'—a work that deserves more commendation than our reviewers have yet seen fit to bestow. Mr. Jones excels in bringing before the reader with graphic fidelity the picture he wishes to display—giving the impression, the scene, or circumstance made on his own mind and feelings with a vigor and vivacity which impress his descriptions, in an extraordinary manner, with the air of reality. We rarely ever met with the legend of a traveller, 'by land or by water,' that could be followed throughout with more unwearied interest. One reason of this is the freedom and naturalness of the narrative. There is no attempt at the marvellous or piquant. Every thing seems to occupy its right place, and all is made to yield the tribute of instruction. The moral and religious tone of sentiment pervading the work is excellent, and the lofty expression of confidence in our national resources and character, shows that enthusiasm for freedom and virtue, which we admire to see cherished by Americans. That part of the title we have given does not express the character of the book—it is rather 'notices of men, manners and scenery,' than the journal of sea-adventures. The shores of the Mediterranean, and the interesting scenes in the Morea—Athens—Constantinople—the Greeks and Turks, are all delineated, and finely too. We give the description of Algiers, however, in preference of that of Athens, as being just at this time the scene of more inquiry and public attention. It was in April, 1826, that Mr. Jones went on shore to visit Algiers.

Ladies Magazine.

'The city is, in shape, like the letter A, its base resting on the water ; and fortified below, with double, and often triple rows of cannon, brass pieces of formidable calibre. The walls are white-washed ; the sun was shining bright as we approached ; and each embrasure, with its dark inmate, was very distinct. Imagine from this chequered line, a mass of houses, so close, as almost to be solid, ascending the hill ; white-washed, and bright, so as to pain the eye by reflection ; the apex formed by a large palace, with embattled walls, from which come the reports of heavy artillery ; and you may have some idea of Algiers as we approached it. The streets were so narrow, in many places ; that two could not walk abreast ; and often so dark, that we could not see our footing. The bazar came first in our course ; it is the widest street ; but even this is not more than twelve feet across ; it is lined with shops ; and I suppose is a good exhibition of the people's taste. The goods are mostly of the nice and ornamental kind ; morocco and velvet slippers, bedizened with tinsel ; handsomely mounted pistols and swords ; variegated silks ; gilt bottles and cups ; and even bouquets of natural flowers, ornamented with gold or silver leaf. Most of the houses look mean on the outside ; more like barns or prisons than family dwellings ; but the glance we had at the interior sometimes, shewed them done off with great cost and splendor. How the city might appear on close inspection, I am unable to say ; but the first impression, certainly, is of the most unfavorable kind. You see, as you approach it, in the batteries that line its base, and in the numerous strong castles scattered over the country around, evidence of a nation, whose hand is against every man, while every man's hand is against them. In the Casuba, or palace of the Dey above, you see a despotism, fearful, and seeking security only in strong walls, and cannon and guards ; in the city, a population, silent, suspicious and seowling, each making his house a fortress, and not secure there ; with streets narrow, winding and dark ; a strong wall surrounding the city and beyond this, no suburbs, except half ruined tombs. This is Algiers.

'A handsome lady in America must be delicate in form, and corsetts are used to produce what nature may have denied : here, the beauties are all corpulent, and fold on fold of muslin is used to add gracefulness to the form. Suppose I draw the picture of an Algerine beauty ; for their ladies are not confined at home so much as I expected, and we saw a number of them in the streets.

'Over an immense bulk of muslin, rises something like a head and neck ; though what proportions they bear to each other you cannot tell.—Looking to the part where should be the head, you see something roundish, covered all over with muslins ; in front is a small projection, where is, what you conclude to be the nose. Just above this, is a small break in the folds, and in it you see two eyes, pretty enough, apparently ; then above, comes the muslin again ; and above all, rises a machine of silver, or tin, cut in fillagree work, and in shape like the one our housewives use to grate carrots on. It is covered loosely with a piece of thin muslin, or gauze, which hangs down, dangling behind. The dress is all white ; and the ladies appear like ghosts, in the dusky streets—huge, waddling ghosts, however.

'The men generally have a ferocious look, and their appearance corresponds to their fierce, bloody character.'

A Hint for Liston ; A clergyman at a chapel in the suburbs of Glasgow, comforted his congregation with the assurance that 'he saw the devil smiling out of their countenances.'

LULLY.

Lully on performing his grand 'Te Deum' on the recovery of Louis XIV. met an accident that brought him to his grave. In beating time with his foot, he struck his toes so vehemently that a swelling ensued, and his physician advised him to loose his toe, and presently after his leg. His confessor assured him, that if he did not burn the music of his new opera, he could not give him absolution. With reluctance the penitent pointed to a drawer which contained some airs of his Achilles and Polixena. 'There, father,' said he, 'take and burn them.' Lully soon after grew better, and thought himself out of danger. One of the princes of the blood, who was extremely fond of his music, paid him a visit, and reproaching him for burning them, said, 'My dear friend, how could you be such a fool as to believe an old doating priest, and destroy your new opera ?' 'My lord,' said Lully whispering the prince in the ear, 'I knew what I was about ; I have another copy of it.' Unfortunately this pleasantry was followed by a relapse ; and poor Lully died afterwards a great penitent.

SILENCE.

Lycurgus ordered no discourse to be current which did not contain in a few words a great deal of useful and weighty sense ; for in this concise way of speaking is something that flies level to the mark, and does more execution than a whole volley of words shot at random ; for silence and premeditation have such a presence and quickness of mind as to give surprising answers. Lycurgus gave this answer to one, who by all means would have a popular government in Lacedemon : 'begin friend and make a trial in thy own family.'—King Charilaus being asked why his uncle Lycurgus made so few laws, answered, to men of few words few laws are sufficient. One blamed Heraclitus the orator because that being invited to a feast he had not spoke one word all supper time : Archidamus answered in his vindication, 'he who can speak well, knows when to speak too.'

HANDSOME REWARD.

A clergyman in the West, who had unfortunately quarrelled with his parishioners, had the misfortune to have a shirt stolen from the hedge where it hung to dry, and he posted handbills offering a reward for the discovery of the offender. Next morning was written at the foot of the copy posted against the church door :—

Some thief has stolen the parson's shirt,
To skin naught could be nearer ;
The parish will give five hundred pounds
To him that steals the wearer !

We select the following from among the volunteer toasts given at the second Centennial Anniversary of the settlement of Boston, which was celebrated on the 17th of Sept.

By the Rev. Mr. Pierpont :—Our ancestors of 1630—men of tolerable sagacity, but not capable of apprehending everything—

They understood an argument, a musket and a pike,
The proper shape of powder-horns, of bullets and the like ;

They understood a church, a school, and sundry other things,

But never could they understand the right divine of Kings.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 9, 1830.

MR. OTIS' LETTER.

In reply to an illogical, false, and abusive epistle from J. D. Williams, and his 'colleagues,' the Mayor has written a long letter. Mr. Otis estimates these men differently from what his fellow citizens generally do. Had he said nothing; had he treated the insulting resolutions of the 'one hundred apparently respectable' petitioners with silent contempt, he would have acted as most men, similarly circumstanced, would act. We find no fault with his letter. If it were necessary for him to say anything, perhaps he could not with propriety have said more nor less. He gives no opinion touching the character of the excitement, but says, 'if, in the principles of the Fraternity, there be anything radically vicious, he is sure that he has neither time, nor faculty to reform it, nor inclination to interfere with the measures, or arraign the motives of those who have both!' He leaves the interference to John D. Williams and his 'colleagues,' who it is presumed, have 'time' if not 'faculties' equal to the immense 'reform!' The Mayor thinks that he was a little out of order in declaring in the manner he did, that he would not again consent that Faneuil Hall should be granted to the 'one hundred apparently' respectables for a similar purpose. He had 'nothing in view beyond the precise application on which the Hall had been granted, and the question which was then under consideration.' He says that his decision was one 'which as a member of a deliberative body, it was irregular to avow in any manner, before any other assembly.' It does not appear that the Mayor regrets the declaration, so much as the time and place in which it was made. He ought 'in the first instance' to have made his 'decision' known to the board of aldermen. But his fellow-citizens will excuse this little informality, if he will take care that Faneuil Hall be not again disgraced, and our citizens be not again insulted by the vile propositions of another 'hundred apparently' respectables.

It has been said that the Masons made all the disturbance, and the petitioners boast of their forbearance in the following language: 'Although our numbers were greatly superior to the Masonic mob, we chose rather than engage in a personal struggle, to withdraw from our ancient Cradle of Liberty and Independence, without taking the question!!! Hear what the Mayor says: 'The gentleman who was speaking when I entered the Hall, was soon interrupted by clamorous calls for the question, and by a tumultuary movement among the people on the principal floor. I endeavored for some minutes to decry the prominent agitators. But the attempt was in vain. The pushing and bawling among the entire mass, were so general as to make it quite impossible to fix upon individuals.' Now, if the antimasons were 'greatly superior to the Masonic mob,' they must have constituted the 'entire mass' of rioters; for those who made the disturbance were, according to the Mayor's statement, most numerous! Acknowledge, gentlemen, that you made the disturbance for the purpose of bringing contumely and disgrace on the Masons, or acknowledge what we all know to be true, that, (speaking after the manner of men,) you are strangely given to lying. If you were not the rioters, you say that which is not true when you declare that your numbers were 'greatly superior.' Permit us to tell you that you are mistaken, if you suppose that there was an individual present in Faneuil Hall, who would dirty his hands by engaging with you in a 'personal struggle.' No, gentlemen, you are not of so much consequence.

'Oh take me up "between two chips,"

The anti loudly cried,

And place me in your "sitting room,"

My deary by my side.'

The following remarks are to the point; and from them the reader may guess Mr. Otis' opinion of the course pursued by the meeting:—'The question proposed by you at the late meeting, is in substance, whether it is expedient for the people in their primary assemblies to enact other disqualifications for holding public office, than those which the constitution has prescribed. This you have an undoubted right to propose for public debate. But if those who are to be affected by such disqualifications are bidden or empowered to meet on the same arena, it is natural that they should resist with animation what they might regard as an attempt to exclude them from the pale of the constitution. In like manner, should the members of the association for the suppression of intemperance, with the most praiseworthy motives, call a meeting, to agitate the question, whether the importers or vendors of spirituous liquors could discharge with fidelity public trusts. Or if on request of one hundred respectable citizens, a debate should be solicited on the question of the expediency of nullifying the laws of the union, and thereupon a public feeling should be roused, that would prompt great numbers, whether a majority or not, to oppose the consideration of these topics in a mode that would endanger the peace of the city, it would I think hardly be insisted, that the Mayor and Aldermen were in duty bound, (merely because all men have a right peaceably to assemble, and because Faneuil Hall is the 'Cradle of Liberty,') to facilitate a measure, which might probably require an array of the whole power of the police to preserve peace, and which, with their utmost efforts, might be ineffectual.'

DAVID BROWNE, Esq.—We have seen in the eleventh number of the Euterpeid, a communication calling upon Mr. Browne for information respecting the termination of a suit instituted against him by a Miss Anna Cowan, a teacher of music, for slander. It appears from the records of the Superior Court of New-York, that the plaintiff made oath on the 13th of April last, that Mr. Browne, formerly teacher of music on the Logierian system in this city, had spoken falsely and much to her detriment, in saying that she was an impostor, and that she never learned the system of Mr. Logier. On this oath Mr. Browne was held to bail. The declaration sets forth that 'she, the said plaintiff, had studied and been taught and instructed by one Logier, in the science and composition of music and to play upon the piano-forte upon his system; that she was 'an instructor to others,' and was 'daily and honestly making and acquiring great gains therein; that the defendant aforesaid, well knowing the premises and envying the happy state and condition of the said plaintiff, did falsely and maliciously, speak and publish words, to wit—she is an impostor and never learned of Logier.' The indictment further sets forth, that 'divers good and worthy citizens of this state, (New-York,) have an occasion to suspect and believe the said plaintiff to be an impostor, and have on that account ceased and declined to employ, and still do refuse to employ the said plaintiff.' How far this suspicion or belief is well founded, will appear from the following deposition; as will also the truth or falsity of the declaration for which Mr. B. has been indicted.

'POLICE DISTRICT, } 'John Bernard Logier, of Dublin Metropolis, } No. 46, Sackville-street, Dubto wit: } lin, Professor of Music, and Music Seller, came before me and maketh oath, and saith, that he, the said John Bernard Logier, is sole inventor and founder of the new musical system called the Logierian System of Musical Education. Deponent further saith, that his system, both in the theory and practice of composition, as well as in the practice of playing the Piano-forte, contains peculiarities which no other system of musical education possesses. Deponent further saith that in consequence of those peculiarities deponent was invited by Baron Altenstein, Minister of Public Education at Berlin, to reside some time in the Prussian States, that his system of musical education might be established there, under his immediate superintendence; that deponent did reside there for that purpose, for upwards of four years; that deponent received from said government, for each individual whom he instructed in his system, one hundred and fifty dollars; and that his system is now generally adopted in the Prussian States and other parts of Germany. Deponent further saith, that he has received from each Professor who has from time to time, adopted his system in Great Britain, one hundred guineas; that each Professor has on these occasions been obliged to enter into a regular agreement, binding himself under a heavy penalty to teach deponent's system, pure and unmixed with any other; and that none other are acknowledged by deponent as legitimate Professors, of his system, but such as have regularly studied under himself, and signed the proper agreement. Deponent further saith that David Browne, now residing at New York, is a legitimate Professor of his system of musical education; that he has regularly attended his lectures, paid the hundred guineas aforesaid, and signed the agreement above named, and that he verily believes that the said David Browne has faithfully fulfilled all the stipulations contained in that agreement. Deponent further saith, that he has not the least knowledge of ANNA COWAN or her sister; that she or they were never either private or professional pupils of deponent's, nor that she or they are directly or indirectly authorised by deponent to teach his system of musical education, either in part or in whole.

'Deponent further saith, that the above depositions are made at the particular request of David Browne, of New-York, of North America.

'Sworn before me, at the Head Office of Police. Dublin, 24th May, 1830.

ANTIMASONIC ADMISSIONS.—'The great mass of the community (say the anties) who have never examined the subject are disposed to array themselves against the opponents of Masonry, because they erroneously consider them to be the assailants, by whose efforts the peace of society is to be disturbed.' Then these men have just ascertained that the people are disposed to array themselves against antimasonic proscription! Wonderful discovery!!! Their late reverses have nearly brought them to their senses! Another Faneuil Hall meeting might fully satisfy them that the people are not disposed to persecute and proscribe any class of community for 'opinion's sake' alone. But the 'great mass of community' erroneously consider antimasons the assailants! Who are the assailants? Who commenced the infamous work of defamation and proscription? Who has disturbed the 'peace of society?' Who but antimasonic political miscreants, have done this? And yet the people 'erroneously consider' antimasons as the assailants! The people have 'never been told of the atrocious proceedings attending the Morgan outrages'!! and are therefore disinclined 'to foster useless controversy and excitement'!!! If the people are yet to be told of these atrocious proceedings, from the bottom of our heart we pity them. The antimasonic presses have, for four years past, teemed with the terrible tale of Morgan's death, and the people have not yet heard their groanings! Poor fellows! they had better give up the attempt—the people are very stupid and will not listen to them! And then the 'controversy and excitement' are admitted to be 'useless'! Truly the existence of such 'erroneous views,' is lamentable! but there is no accounting for the erroneousness of public opinion! And then the 'public prepossession is in favor of Masonry!' What is to be done with such odds against us! It is true our fathers have often described Masonry 'as the benignant mother of science, morality, charity, and religion.' We have been told of the honored and exalted men whose names are enrolled as its patrons. But our fathers were old dotards! we are wise men! and know that it is a wicked, murderous concern! that we do, and we will put it down! The people! they are deceived—they don't know anything about the matter, and we will teach them, and they shall do as we say—let them think as they may! Thank ye, gentlemen; abuse the people; denounce the press; shackle both, and you will do well enough!

A SECEDER.—A political juggler by the name of Geo. Moore, of Erie county, Penn., has recently renounced Masonry, and claims to be immediately rewarded for the deed, by an election to the legislature. The Observer furnishes the following extracts from a speech delivered by Mr. Moore, in the Assembly of Pennsylvania, February 6, 1830.

'I know of no principle in Freemasonry inconsistent with, or repugnant to, the laws of our country, or of Divine precept. If there is any principle in Freemasonry which requires of any one, upon any occasion, any violation of our laws or our religion, I have yet to learn it. I know it is not so. On the contrary, they enjoin a strict observance of the laws and every principle inculcated in the Holy Scriptures and none other.' * * * 'I again add, that if there is any obligation in Freemasonry, which requires any infringement of our laws, or the rights of our fellow-citizens, or the denial or restraint of equal justice, or anything like adhesion to each other in politics, or any other matter to the injury of others, I never knew it; but I do know there is no such obligation or consideration. It would appear to me, sir, that every one who would but for a moment divest himself of blind prejudices, would at once see the absurdity of any other view of the subject.' * * * * 'I will here observe, sir, that the principles of Masonry are such as I have been taught to believe necessary for my SALVATION in the existence beyond this life, and such as I hope I shall fearlessly RELY upon and answer for to my God, upon the great day of retribution; And that I know that all SECEDING MASONS, [Mr. Moore is now one] who have made statements tending to show that the institution of Freemasonry (so far as I have any knowledge of it, and I have no doubt but that they are consistent throughout) inculcates or contains in it any principle inconsistent with Holy Writ, the rights of others, or the laws of our country, know themselves to be morally perjured, vile sycophants, base, calumniators, and "wanton violators of the ninth commandment, or have returned to the state of Adam's ignorance, not knowing how to distinguish between good and evil."

'What a strong vindication of Freemasonry have we here, and what a picture of the depravity of a renouncing Mason! Was Mr. Moore a hypocrite then, or is he delirious now? Does any man believe he would renounce now, did he not consider his political prospects desperate? It is not one month since we heard him declare that his opinion of Masonry had undergone no change since he made his famous speech in the Assembly, from which we have taken the above specimens! Is Mr. Moore, then, now insane, or is he playing a desperate game with the credulity of mankind? Will he succeed? Shall base apostacy for the hope of gain, receive the reward due to VIRTUE?'

GRAND MASONIC MARCH.—Mr. Zeuner, whose new Centennial March has received general commendation for its elaborate composition, and its rich and powerful harmony, has composed a new march for the approaching ceremonies of laying the Corner Stone of the Masonic Temple in Tremont-street. It is entitled the Grand Masonic March, and is said to be a production abounding with brilliant and effective passages, and not less worthy of popular favor than its predecessor. Mr. Zeuner is liberal in his exertions to enhance the interest of passing festivities, and we trust they will not go unrewarded. The march is in the hands of the Brigade Band, who will perform it on the above occasion, we have no doubt, with credit to themselves and its accomplished author.—Trav.

OBITUARY.

In Milton, on Saturday last, Mr. JOSIAH SPURR, editor of the American Commentator, aged 85 years. In the decease of Mr. Spurr, the editorial corps of this city, have lost a generous, talented and fearless contemporary. In the world of periodical literature, he was a star of no inferior magnitude. We well recollect the time when the productions of his pen were sought after; when his talents were properly appreciated; when his favors were courted by some of the very journals that now refuse a passing tribute to his memory! We are sorry to say this; but the fact cannot be controverted. Let the files of the principal papers in the city be examined: point out the leading literary articles; reviews and criticisms; and ask to whom they belong? And the name of SPURR shall stand foremost on the list. We would not be considered as cen-suring our editorial brethren; but knowing that the talents and acquirements of the deceased, when living, commanded their respect, we cannot but regret that they should have lost their influence, ere the soul had gone to Him who gave it. SPURR would not have permitted a temporary to pass off the stage in silent neglect. But he has gone to that 'undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns.' We would plant the mournful eypress by his tomb and nourish it with the tear of friendship. He was

'One who in life, where'er he moved,
Drew after him the hearts of many.'

The procession on the 14th, will move from Faneuil Hall, thro' Merchant's Row, up State-street, thro' Court and Tremont-streets, to the site selected for the Temple. Returning will pass thro' Tremont-street, down Cornhill, and through Dock-square to the Hall.

THE WREATH.

THE 'WANDERER'S' FAREWELL.

Farewell to my country! in sorrow I leave thee!
 The scenes of my childhood I'll ne'er see again:
 Farewell to my country—oh sore it doth grieve me
 To leave thy bright vallies to cross the dark main.
 The flag of blest freedom, unfurled o'er the ocean,
 Seems drooping for those who forever must roam:
 What is it that causes this sadden'd emotion
 To rise in my bosom when leaving my home.

Nay! I have no mother to linger in sorrow
 O'er the faults of her child, or to share in his grief;
 Nor have I a brother—nor sister to follow
 To bless with affection or to give me relief:—
 No, no!—the cold grave is the home of my mother!
 My father, too, sleeps in the dark, chilly earth!
 My sisters—my parents—my fond little brother,
 Rest deep in the soil of the 'Wanderer's' birth;

Then what can it be my fond heart is thus breaking!
 Oh, surely, 'twere shame to weep now for the dead—
 What is it so pains me when from my dreams waking,
 That grieves me when e'er I recline on my bed!
 It is not for Mary! oh no! the green willow
 Droops over the tomb of the fairest and best!
 Ay, deep in the damp earth, upon its cold pillow,
 The cheek of my Mary is taking its rest!

It is for my country! when last on thy mountains
 One moment I linger'd to gaze on the dell,
 A voice, as of sorrow, from out thy pure fountains,
 Seem'd to say, 'Wand'rer' we bid the farewell!
 It is for those green mounds, where all are now dwelling
 Who loved me, who cheer'd me in childhood's young day;—

It is for those dear spots I feel my heart swelling
 From which my lone footsteps forever must stray!

Then farewell Columbia! I leave thee forever!
 My friends, my companions forever farewell!
 An outcast I leave thee!—forget the I'll never—
 With thee my loved country my spirit will dwell!
 Oh, there is a feeling my soul is oppressing;
 The thoughts that afflict me words never can tell—
 Dear land of my parents receive my last blessing—
 Oh! land of my childhood! forever farewell!

W. H. C.

SORROW.

On the sands of life
 Sorrow treads heavily, and leaves a print
 Time cannot wash away; while Joy trips by
 With step so light and soft, that the next wave
 Wears his faint foot-falls out.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

MOORE & SEVEY, 46, WASHINGTON ST.

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

GRAND LODGE OF NEW-YORK.

The following is the address of the M. W. Past Grand Master, E. W. KING, at the installation of Morgan Lewis, Esq. as Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of New-York, on the 24th of June last, with the reply of the latter, which we recommend to our readers for its chasteness of style, and its able defence of the ancient institution, over which the author has been called to preside. When such a man as Morgan Lewis will boldly confront the dark spirit of antimasonry as he did the foes of his country in the trying period of the revolution, they have nothing to fear from the hideous howlings of Gideon Granger's wolves, if they do wear the fleece of the innocent lamb. Their horrid incantations may raise the ghost of Morgan to their jaundiced eyes, but it will never affright upright Masons from their duty—their wickers are unwrung.

Most Worshipful Brother,

I congratulate you on your elevation to the highest honor which Masonry can bestow. In this exalted station it will be in your power not only to guard this most ancient and honorable society from innovation, but also to extend the blessings of its influence.

That such will be the result of your administration, I confidently predict, as well from personal knowledge of your private character, as from the distinguished manner in which you have discharged the arduous duties of some of the highest offices in the gift of your country.

Freemasonry can now enroll on her list of patrons, another soldier of the revolution, and while the most important offices in this institution shall thus continue to be filled by men enjoying the affections and confidence of an intelligent community, we may reasonably hope that the apprehensions and prejudices which have been recently excited by the misguided conduct of a few obscure and wicked individuals belonging to the order, will, ere long, be dissipated, and the benign influence of Freemasonry again be exercised without interruption.

In the discharge of your important duties, I can say from experience, you may safely calculate on the co-operation of every member of this body, and hence, your station will be rendered no less pleasing than it is honorable.

It is with peculiar pleasure I now perform the remaining duty incumbent on me. Permit me to invest you with the insignia of your office, and I most humbly invoke the Supreme Architect of the Universe to render the proceedings of this day subservient to the good of Masonry, and to the best interest of mankind.

To which the M. W. Grand Master replied:

Most Worshipful Past Grand Master, and Brethren of this Grand Lodge,

The confidence with which you have honored me, manifested by placing me in this chair, inspires sentiments more easily conceived than expressed—which, while they excite the most grateful feelings, impose as a duty, to which I trust nature will ever respond, such a discharge of the trust reposed in me, as shall not disappoint your most flattering expectations.

Circumstances beyond control, having for many years obstructed a regular association with the lodge of which I was last a member, it will not surprise, should the ceremonies of the order have escaped my memory. This cannot however be the case with the principles and obligations, which are too deeply impressed on my mind ever to be removed.

The circumstances alluded to by the very respectable Brother, who has kindly officiated at this inauguration, is to be contemplated more in pity than in anger, except, perhaps as it regards those, who certainly had the power, and whose duty it was, rather to stifle than to fan the embers of discord, until they had blown them into a flame of persecution, better adapted to the darker ages, than the enlightened period of the present day. When we behold these men connecting the excitement, which, if they did not create, they have certainly cherished and increased, with political party views, the conclusion is irresistible, that they have been actuated by sinister and selfish, not by virtuous and laudable motives.

The circumstances to which this excitement, in its origin, is referable, must in candor be allowed to have been of an aggravated nature; and as far as the immediate perpetrators of the offence are concerned, merits the most exemplary punishment. But to visit the sins of a few wretched individuals on the whole body of an institution founded in benevolence, charity, and the purest philanthropy, which has subsisted for ages with unblemished reputation, enrolling within its pale, countless numbers of the best of patriots, statesmen, sages, and divines, must meet the reprobation of the virtuous and disinterested. If Masonry, a human institution, is to be anathematized for having furnished a few, a very few enthusiasts and fanatics, what shall we say of those deemed of divine origin? Has not every religion which history records, been obnoxious to similar objections? and among them none perhaps has shed more blood than that which we profess. Shall we therefore discard it? Shall we deprive suffering humanity of its best, its surest consolation, under the chastening afflictions of divine dispensation? I say, God forbid.

But we have been told (as falsely as assiduously,) that Masonry has a certain aptitude of demoralization. Might not the same be said with equal justice of the sacred writings? Has not the religious fanatic, as well under the Jewish as Christian dispensations, invariably justified his lawless shedding of blood, on those revealed, but misconceived truths, we hold divine.

But we have our mysteries: so has our holy religion. The writings of our patron saint, are full of them: we shall not therefore, I trust, discard the one or the other.

Our forms have also been made the subject of ridicule. A sufficient answer to this is, that forms are essential to the existence of all societies: as they are arbitrary, they will sometimes give scope to the carplings of the too fastidious: but they never can with justice be held to derogate from the fundamental principles of any institution. I have been a member of this useful and honorable fraternity for more than half a century, and have never till now heard the calumny uttered, that its obligations, under any circumstances, impugned the ordinances of civil and religious society. On the contrary, we hold ourselves bound to render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and unto God the things which are God's; and I can with truth affirm, that I never knew a man who became a Mason, and whose practice conformed to the precepts it inculcates, who did not become a BETTER MAN than he had been theretofore.

On the whole, believing as I do, that no favorable result can be expected from reasoning with men during the paroxysms of a feverish imagination, stimulated in many instances, by the hope of personal advantage, I exhort the Brethren to follow the example of their fathers: like them regardless of the slanders and revilings of their enemies, to pursue the steady tenor of their way; deviating neither to the right hand nor to the left, but like Sterne's monk, looking straight forward, to something beyond the world.

RENUNCIATION OF ANTIMASONRY.

The 'Vermont Statesman,' published at Castleton, Vt. on the 1st instant, contains an address of the Editor, H. H. HOUGHTON, Esq. to the people of that State, from which we copy the extracts below. Mr. Houghton was one of the first who hoisted the Antimasonic Flag among the Green Mountains, and so long as a remnant of candor or honesty was found to exist among the proceedings of the party, continued to be one of its most efficient supporters.

'We will now suppose that antimasonry has triumphed—we mean the 'high pressure' antimasonry which makes it a principle, that no man shall be eligible to office who does not choose to be known as a violent, full-blooded antimason, one of the finest wool, a real 'Saxon.' We will suppose this party has prevailed, and Messrs. Crafts, Olin, Prentiss, Hutchinson, Williams, Turner, Mallory, Hunt, Everett and Swift, Swan, &c. have been ejected from office, declared ineligible; and further, suppose a 'pure' antimasonic legislature has been chosen, who meet next October, and proceed to business. In a few days a bill is introduced to alter and amend the State Constitution, declaring that all men who are not decided antimasons, shall be considered as aliens, who have sworn allegiance to another [the Masonic] government, and, therefore, cannot safely be entrusted with the management of this; they are, therefore, denied the dearest right of a freeman, the right to hold office, if elected. According to the principles of the party this in justice and equity, may be done. If the objection is a valid one at the ballot-box, if Masons should be scourged at the polls as political heretics, why not settle the matter at once, proscribe them and their personal friends indiscriminately by the Constitution. Make short work of it. This would do the business thoroughly. But—remember, it would be a direct invasion upon the rights of a large class of our citizens; and, as sure as the sun shineth, the antimasonic party would be overthrown even though it were done at the expense of a civil war.—Our legislature would degrade itself to a level with that Parliament which acknowledges the principle, that a man may be burnt to the stake for his religious opinions; for the same spirit which debars the Catholic in Great Britain now from enjoying the privileges of the Protestant, in the days of Queen Mary, burnt Cranmer at the stake. To be sure, it has been softened down—the Fury has been robbed of most of her snakes, so that she is comparatively, harmless; but she is the same hag still.

But why were the abovenamed gentlemen rejected? What charge has been preferred against them? Of what crime have they been found guilty? They evidently possess high talents—all of them, some of them very high.—They are all men of candor, truth and honesty; their views coincide precisely on every question of National State policy with the great majority of the freemen of Vermont; they were, we will suppose, all nursed among our own hills, they are neither aliens, nor miners, nor jacobins.

politicians, nor fools. No—they are 'all honorable men.' But, are they masons?

'And what caps the climax is, all their political friends are doomed to the same indignity. This sounds like the Indian law, that, for the crime of murder by the father, inflicts death on himself and all his children.

I beg antimasons who favor the high handed principles entertained by some, to examine, and they will perceive, that the reasons that are urged in favor of disfranchising Masons are the same, the very same in character, with those which induced the British Government to oppress the Catholics. They, indeed, (thanks to humanity!) are beginning to grow ashamed of it; and, so will this party among us, three years hence, or the 'stars tell not tales of truth.' The British churchman says, 'the Catholic owns allegiance to the Pope,' and 'one servant cannot serve two masters;' (the 'devil can quote scripture' to obtain his ends—so says the parson,) and the party say, he 'owns allegiance to Masonry,' and we cannot place confidence in him. On the force of this argument and a few more similar they ground their objections. Whoever favors one, we can see no reason why he cannot, in consistency, acknowledge the justice of the other. They are both unjust; and we challenge the wisest of their advocates to produce a particle of proof, a single argument, founded on the principles of equality, of justice, or the rights of man, that will go to contradict the assertion. The man who will declare that these oaths bind him to do an evil act, should be rejected for office; he is either a very bigoted man, or a non compos mentis. Such men can with much more grace apply to the court for a guardian, than to the people for an office.

What is the nature of the allegiance of the catholic to the pope; and what that of the Mason to Masonry? It is an allegiance, which is usually strong, in exact proportion as the catholic and Freemason are ignorant and weak.

By no reasonable construction of the Royal Arch oath—and Masons of that degree are said to have been the principal and most active conspirators,—is the member bound to take life. The most, and all that can be said of them is, the member is supposed to give away his life or rather imprecates a curse upon his own head, which, if inflicted, would destroy life. This, according to the letter of the oath, is all that can be proved.

Some have charged us with inconsistency in venturing to find fault with the proceedings of those whom we have hitherto upheld. Nothing can be more ungenerous—About one year and a half ago, by the earnest request of many friends, as well as from personal inclination, the editor of this paper declared his intention of opening its columns to the investigation of Freemasonry. At that time much excitement existed in this county against masonry, but more against the press, which was accused of being held in subserviency by the fear of Masonic persecution. This assertion as applied to himself, the editor knew to be a false one. A fear from that source was never entertained. He was aware of the perfect right of every citizen to investigate the subject, and did not feel a disposition to be frightened from his just rights by any society, however strong. But there were other considerations which did make him dread this step. He knew the extreme, and extremely silly delicacy which Masons universally manifested whenever the infallibility of their institution was questioned; and he as well knew that the step which he proposed to take would have the immediate effect of not only producing a violent antipathy towards himself by Masons, but also, much needless intemperate strife among his readers would be the consequence; and in all this he has not been disappointed. He, in the outset, declared his determination not to meddle with political antimasonry. He believed the ballot box was not the proper weapon to wield against the institution. Politics should have as little to do with the subject as hoing cabbages. He had objections, even to forming a ticket on the mild plan of the Convention of the last year, which he had a right to keep to himself if he thought proper. Whatever he thought would be interesting and serve to develop the principles of the institution, he has published, as well as the general information of the progress of antimasonry. He has done this without the intention of injuring any man; and if any man harbors aught of malice against him for it; that man may know that it is entirely gratuitous. He owes them for it nothing but good will—and a precious little of that. He wishes no living creature his enemy; but he will endeavor to maintain his own rights as a free-man, though all the world are his foes. He never suffered the subject to intrude upon his social feelings and relations, and pities those who have.

A SOLILOQUY.

[Spoken in Character.]

'To be, or not to be!' How do my thoughts
Oft travel backward from the distant York
To Boston city! With bright hopes elate
To be a great man in famed Fanueil Hall;
And not indulged to make my word's speech!
To be the football of base ridicule;
And not outride that rude and angry storm!
To be a very ass—to hide my ears;
And not to make them tremble at my voice!
To be put down by a vile, boisterous mob;
And not preserve my usual impudence!
To be a laughing-stock to brats of boys;
And not to frown them into decency!
To be compelled to skulk away with shame;
And not maintain my ample dignity!
To be hissed, pointed, hooted at, in streets;
And not be pitied by the gazing crowd!
To be or not to be! 'Tis not to be.
'And now that I am safely in New-York,
'I'll growl at others from my midnight den,
And boast myself a martyr to our cause.
Nor Thacher, Merrick, Anderton nor Green,
E'er felt such deep humility as mine!
To be!—Ay, to be scorned and pointed at.
To be a very coward. Like a cur
Be whipped back to my kennel, there to howl,
And linger out my solitary hours
In bitter agony of conscience. Here,
E'en misery's self might shudder to behold
A wretch to be abandoned by the vile,
And not to be e'en pitied by the good.
'Tis not to be, that I a great man be;
The fates—and Boston Boys—have conquered me.

TO THE METHODISTS OF PORTAGE COUNTY. DEAR BRETHREN:—

The time has been when we, as a church, and a people were persecuted, and all manner of evil spoken against us. The Badge of a Methodist, was then, as much as that of a Mason is now, sufficient to attract the finger of scorn, and our names like theirs, were cast out as evil. We suffered as became the followers of Christ, and returned good for evil. Persecution served but to unite us, and, as a body we were found contending for Republican principles—toleration, and equal rights. Every effort was then made to impede the cause of our free principles, which opposition could suggest—and a powerful effort was made to rivet the fetters of intolerance, and proscription.—But like all endeavors to bind the human mind, these fetters of intolerance were burst, and we have become powerful and respected.

But a new enemy is introduced into the Methodists ranks, and under the name of Antimasonry, intolerance, proscription, party spirit, and division are introduced among us; and pretended friends are thus effecting what our open enemies long desired, but could never accomplish. They are endeavoring to win over the Methodists to that same spirit of persecution, which they so long exercised against the Methodists.

Brethren: you that are swallowed up in this kind of fiery zeal, had you not better stop, before you further go, and seriously, and candidly consider, whether you are doing by us, as you would wish others to do by you. Would you be willing that all who are opposed, in sentiment, to the Methodists, should persecute them, proscribe them, and pursue the same course toward them that you are now pursuing toward the Masons? Are Methodists about to renounce their former principles as Republicans, and become Aristocrats? Is intolerance, and Methodism to become synonymous.

Dear Brethren, I will refer you to a publication in the Ohio Star of Feb. 17, 1830, signed 'Evangelos,' which is said to be the production of a Methodist Minister. After beginning in a very polite manner to address professors of Religion, and endeavoring to excite a sympathetic feeling, thereby endeavoring to prepare their minds to receive any thing as correct, from a Minister, he goes on to abuse all those Ministers, who will not sway their principles to the policy of the times, and renounce what is in their opinion right either to please men or devils—and endeavors to make his Christian friends believe that Masonry is an impostor, that has haltered, and hoodwinked, its captive thousands. After exciting all the prejudice, and animosity against Masonry and Masons, that a perverted imagination could suggest, he advances the question whether it would not be best to rid the Church, and especially the Ministry of Masons! Yes, he suggests that the Church should be purified of all who will not renounce that society to which the venerable Dr. Clark, the honor of our Church, thought it a privilege to belong.

He says that it is not for him to dermine the means of accomplishing this object, but he will intimate that if the members were openly, and decidedly to manifest their disapprobation of Masonry, it would operate as a persuasive, and almost compulsory influence on the Ministry. He then brings his grand argument, and suggests that the means of the Ministers support are entrusted to your care, which may, possibly be employed in cases of obstinency, to wake up some of the sensibilities of his soul! He says he would not be understood to insinuate that it would be proper to withhold the means of support until every other means had proved ineffectual.

Dear Brethren—Are these the doctrines of the Cross of the mild, and benevolent Jesus? Are they in accordance with the spirit of our Constitution, and Government?—Are they in accordance with those liberal views, and tolerant sentiments that formerly distinguished the Methodists? Or are they not in the same spirit with that feeling, which dictated the cry of 'crucify him, crucify him,' because his sentiments differed from theirs, although his life was blameless? Is it not the spirit that erected the Inquisition, and lighted the flame at Smithfield, to compel heretics to renounce their faith? Is it not the same spirit that formerly persecuted us as a church, and which is now striving to dis-unite us, and effect our ruin?

Evangelos would not put the faithful minister, immediately to death, for the crime of being a Mason, but he should be judged obstinate by some Inquisitorial tribunal, and then the means of his support should be withdrawn!! No matter how faithful a servant of Christ he may be.—No matter that his locks have grown grey in the service of his master, if he is a mason the torture of starvation must be applied by this tribunal, of which Evangelos, undoubtedly, would glory in being Inquisitor. Dear Brethren do you not see that the foundation of our beloved Government is aimed at? Let such zealots as Evangelos have the reins of Government, and we should see some of our most faithful ministers, deprived of support and the Inquisition established.

Ever since Antimasonry commenced its operation in this County, I have carefully, and, as I believe, candidly, examined its principles and effects; and I have not been able to discover from its tenor any thing but misrepresentation, falsehood, calumny, and abuse respecting Masons, and Masonry. One of their zealots declared that he would sooner vote for a Mason to the penitentiary, than to an office—another told me if it were not for my age he would knock me down for defending Masonry. Dear Brethren look at the spirit of Antimasonry, and try it, and see if it is of God, Streetsborough, Sept. 25. EPHRAIM WOOD,

SELF-STYLED NATIONAL CONVENTION.

Mr. Armstrong from the committee, then again submitted the report, amended so as to embrace the following passage from the 'requisitions to make a good Mason,' in the 'Philosophical Lodge of Knights Adepts of the Eagle or Sun.' 'Behold, my dear brother 'what you must fight against, and destroy, before you can come to the knowledge of the true good and sovereign happiness! Behold this monster, which you must conquer; a serpent which we detest as an idol, that is adored by the idiot and the vulgar under the name of RELIGION.'

Mr. Bernard said that agreeable to the resolution, the seceding Masons could not certify to the truth of any obligation of Masonry of which they did not possess personal knowledge. Now, although he had received the most indubitable testimony of the accuracy of the passage or obligation reported by the chairman of the committee, none of the seceding Masons composing that committee personally knew its truth. They could not, therefore, certify it.

What on earth, alarmed the Elder's conscience? We had supposed the searing perfect, and that any lie, however monstrous, would go smoothly down. He has before asserted, repeatedly, in his book of disclosures, that the above obligation is true, that it is genuine Masonry, and that it is binding upon all Masons. Itinerant libellers, from St. Greene, who published a certificate that he did not steal a sheep, up to Major Gen. Hoyt, of Springfield Convention memory, hold the above obligation as strictly orthodox. Strange, indeed, that the Elder should decline its confirmation. Where were his worthy coadjutors, Ward, Whittlesey, Read and Hopkins? Could they not certify the truth of this most precious morsel of evidence? It could not be the first, nor greatest untruth, they have affirmed. The Hon. and Rev. Parson Thatcher, is at your hand, Elder—ask him to confirm it. He is always ready to go the 'whole hog.'—Is it possible? What do I see? Even Parson Thatcher refuses to sanction this precious truth. Send for Greene, Gentlemen, he can help you out of the scrape, if a certificate is all that is needed, or Anderton, or De Wolf at Wethersfield, their affidavit will be at your service, it is presumed, on demand, and in any shape you may desire. If these fail you, just call on Parson Pease. The Parson we understand is rather dejected at present, but still we presume he can affirm any thing that is asked of him.

Elder Bernard assures us that HE has no personal knowledge of this obligation. What knowledge then has he of it, that will enable him to certify its truth? None. Greene and Pease both asserted, that this foul obligation was Masonry, and gave their hearers to understand that they knew it personally, and did not inform them, but it was binding on all Masons of every degree.—Their hearers, proselytes we mean, so understand it to this hour. They used no manner of qualification, but asserted it boldly, and stuck to it fearlessly. There is some hope of the Grand Revelator—he may yet, confess his personal ignorance of his other revelations, published to the world with this infamous slander, as true. Hold on, Elder. 'Don't give up the ship.' We should advise you, however, to keep your tender conscience at home, at the next annual convention, lest a few more such admissions escape you, to the discomfiture of the party, and the remediless ruin of the trade, of BROTHER Pease and DISCIPLE Hoyt.

This conscientious qualm of the Elder's, was truly unfortunate. To be compelled, by his momentary respect for truth, to declare, in the presence of the assembled wisdom, and talent, and respectability of the anti host, congregated from all points of the compass, in the goodly city of brotherly love, his utter ignorance of a leading obligation, printed in glaring capitals in his book, must have been humiliating in the extreme. This favorite obligation, too, which, notwithstanding its manifest absurdities, has been cited on all occasions, from the solemn farce of county and state conventions, down to bar-room, billingsgate collections, and horse-shed audiences, and by all preachers of the prevalent heresy, from the learned and pious Elder himself, down to the mindless Fair Play of a village newspaper. From our inmost soul, we pity the Elder.—Retire most worthy champion from this new field of honor, and call on Almanack Giddins or Whisker Weed, to fan you into your wonted calmness.

This obligation, with or without the Elder's confirmation of its truth, is too glaringly absurd to require a moment's consideration. Every man, be he wise or simple, initiated or not, cannot but perceive the utter repugnance of this obligation to all others, preceding or succeeding it, in the Elder's book of revelations. If the other degrees be Masonry, this manifestly is not, for they are perfectly irreconcilable, and belong to totally different systems.—Every other degree recognizes a presiding Divinity, holding the destinies of men, and acknowledges and enjoins the paramount obligation of the moral law; this gives a deadly blow to religion herself, and preaches undisguised infidelity. It is suicidal, and defeats its object, for its posterousness is so manifest, that no man of common sense, honestly inclined, can be made to believe it. 'Magna est veritas, et prevalabit.'—Hampshire Sentinel.

'The subject of politics and religious creeds are never suffered to be mentioned in a lodge because the basis of the institution constitutionally is, to think and let think. Hence all candidates are given to understand, previous to their admittance, that the subject does not interfere with their religion or politics. In all the meetings that I have attended, this principle of the fraternity has been kept inviolate.'

The above is an extract from an essay from the pen of the celebrated LORENZO DOW, an aged and distinguished minister of the gospel. Whatever may be said of the eccentricity of Mr. Dow, his honesty, veracity, piety, and zealous devotion to the service of his 'Lord and Master,' never has, never can be questioned. His whole life, (by no means a short one,) devoted as it has been with the most untiring assiduity, unshaken perseverance and zeal, in almost every clime, and under the most trying and discouraging circumstances to the ministry, without pay or profit, save the rich and endearing reward of an approving conscience, furnishes a full and complete answer to any such allegation. Mr. Dow, too, it appears, is a Freemason—a distinguished Mason, who has taken those very degrees in which lie, according to allegations of the anties, all the abominable and damnable doctrines of the order;—the degrees that connive at treason, encourage perjury and arson, approve of abduction, and absolutely enjoin murder!!! This, then, is the conscientious and written negation of a good and pious man, of some of the charges against Masonry. We put it in opposition to the words and oaths, if you please, of Morgan, Giddings, Southwick, Old Nat, &c. So far as our knowledge extends, (and it is not so very limited,) it is strictly and unequivocally true. This we allege in the face of the world and before our Maker, without any apprehension of incurring his displeasure. We never heard of such things as politics or sectarian religion in a lodge, or as in any wise connected with Masonry, until Antyism thundered it with a lying tongue from the frontiers of New York.

Masonry interferes with no religious principle, it contravenes no religious practice, it espouses the cause of no political party. It leaves its votaries in these respects just where it finds them: free as the spirit of republicanism, to which it is kindered, to follow the dictates of their consciences—to adopt the principles of any denomination of christians, to espouse the cause of any patriotic party, but it repudiates the unbeliever, and spurns the traitor.

It must grieve our antimasonic neighbors very much to learn that LAFAYETTE, notoriously a high and zealous Mason, ay, and a member of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, is at the head of the National Guards of France! Can't they contrive some way to introduce their purifying doctrines into that rebellious country, so that the old General may be put down? Suppose our redoubtable committee of this place, take France under their fatherly care, and send hence a copy of Lawyer Kelly's famous address.—Think it would be hard to convince the French that LaFayette is an 'habitual murderer and blasphemer,' bound by 'horrid oaths!' They might count with certainty on the aid of their great patron Ferdinand VII. of Spain, whose soul takes deep delight in the agonies of Freemasons, expiring under the tortures of the inquisition.

We merely throw out a hint; the junto will of course do what is best under these alarming circumstances.—[Erie Observer.]

REACTION.—The Sackett's Harbor Gazette of the 7th inst. contains an address to the young men of Jefferson co. signed by fourteen gentlemen, who have renounced Political Antimasonry. We make the following extract from this address. The reader will bear in mind that the great 'national convention' of antimasons which recently assembled in Philadelphia, seriously talked of nominating a candidate for the Presidency!—[Gazette.]

In the first commencement of the Morgan excitement (as it was called) we were, and still are opposed to Speculative Freemasonry, and believing as we then did and now do, that a free citizen had been kidnapped and probably murdered by Masons, it cannot be a matter of surprise, that the importunities and specious arguments of the Antimasonic party, led us into their ranks. We then believed them actuated entirely by a sacred regard for the laws of God and man and the improvement of society. But a few months experience has drawn aside the veil, and exposed to view, an unrelenting Political party called Antimasonry, whose leading principle and broad rule of action, is, 'rule or ruin.' It admits of neither distinction or qualification; the innocent and guilty, the virtuous and vicious are indiscriminately consigned to one common destruction; and although many of our kindred friends, our neighbors and acquaintances, whose reputation we had ever been taught to venerate, as the Fathers and benefactors of our common country, the able defenders of our right, the promoters of peace and good order in society, and the faithful guardians of our Republican institutions, were prominent Masons, and notwithstanding they are perfectly innocent of the outrage committed upon William Morgan, and openly deprecated the act, and denounced the perpetrators, yet they too, must bow their devoted heads, silvered over with the frosts of many winters, to the Antimasonic Altar, and denounce, as UNHOLY and UNJUST, WICKED and UN-PRINCIPLED, an institution to them before sacred and good, or be consigned to political oblivion, infamy and disgrace, fit only to be numbered with those with whom 'murder is a duty and vengeance a sworn obligation. To such political doctrine we, their sons and descendants, do hereby enter our unequivocal protest.

We have also witnessed in our families, our neighborhoods, towns, counties, and states the direful and appalling consequence, of Political Antimasonry. The husband against the wife, father against the son, brother against brother, and neighbor against neighbor; and could we stop here the picture would be less frightful; but is not the venerable and faithful preacher of the gospel, who has reared up and led his pious flock in peace, from the earliest settlement of our country, driven from the sacred desk, or compelled hypocritically to denounce and renounce as unholy, an institution which he in his heart highly esteemed? The language of his church is confounded, and instead of peace, harmony and brotherly love, malice, jealousy, contention and antimasonry, reign triumphant. We are very far from attempting to sustain the institution of Masonry or advocating its doctrines, rites or ceremonies; but honestly believing that it ought not to have any connection with politics we do solemnly renounce all political allegiance to Masonry and Antimasonry, and declare ourselves to be Free and independent Republicans, and as such will give our votes for talents, integrity and ability without reference to Masonry or antimasonry.

[Signed by Moses Barrett, and thirteen others.]

It having been satisfactorily proved that King SOLOMON was a Mason, we learn, that as soon as Granger is elected Governor, our friend Solomon Southwick intends to apply to the Legislature for permission to change his name to Titus Oates Southwick.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

From the Erie, Pa. Observer.

ANTIMASONRY.

I find so many different opinions and views respecting political antimasonry, among those who call themselves antimasons, that I am led to conclude its principles and objects are not generally understood, even by those who are its professed supporters; or who lend their names to antimasonry. I believe many of them would spurn the principles when reduced to practice, which are recognized by the leaders in the party, as the backbone of their strength, and indeed the great foundation of their hopes of political success.

When antimasonry first appeared among us, it simply denounced the persons implicated in the Morgan affair and their abettors; or all who justified that transaction, or considered Masonic obligations as superior to the civil rights of our citizens. So far I then thought, and still think, antimasonry to be approved by every good citizen. It was then denied that antimasonry was political, or ever would have any thing to do with politics. One of our young lawyers was, I believe, the first man who presumed in a public meeting here, to acknowledge himself a political antimason—and to make it evident that antimasonry was not then admitted to be political, several antimasons the next day denied that Mr.— did or could have made such a declaration; 'for antimasonry had nothing to do with politics.'

As soon, however, as the public feeling was considered, by the leaders, as sufficiently excited, by the publication of some truths, misconstrued, and many falsehoods and misrepresentations, antimasonry became a political bantling; and an antimasonic candidate must be nominated for the assembly.

But there was yet another step to be taken.—Out comes the Belfast murder, (which was no murder,) with several suspected murders appended, as positive evidence to prove the murderous dispositions of Masons; or that, at least, all Masons must necessarily countenance murder. Out comes also the square and compass for two weeks, backed with the positive declaration from Mr. Riddell, 'that he had no doubt every Mason in Massachusetts voted for the obscure Brooks, and elected him over the talented Dexter'—and this, if Mr. Riddell's declaration be true, is conclusive evidence to prove Masonry political. The murderous dispositions of all Masons being antimasonically established; and political Masonry thus proved; antimasonry now fully unfurls its standard of proscription and oppression, and every Mason is declared unworthy the political confidence and support of his fellow-citizens. And the climax of injustice is finally reached, by denouncing all those who, from correct and honest feelings, would wish to remain neutral; unless they also join in the hot pursuit of Masons—and that too, without the least regard to the public services; the known patriotism; the respect and obedience to the laws; and the moral integrity of individuals whom antimasons thus proscribe and persecute.

I have not intended to exaggerate 'or set down aught in malice,' in speaking of the principles of antimasonry. Such are its present avowed objects—and may I not now ask the honest feeling citizen, who means to act from good principles, whether he is prepared to support such antimasonry?

Some arguments have been offered to show that antimasons may properly combine against all Masons, good and bad, without distinction, for the purpose of putting down the institution of Masonry. But these arguments are not founded in the principles of eternal justice. They rest on no better foundation than this—'that the end justifies the means.'

A laboured article appeared in the Gaz. to prove the justice of such combinations against all Masons; and among other things, offered in support of it, democrats uniting against federalists is considered a parallel case, and with apparent confidence the writer asks, 'who complains of this?' Why surely, no one. But he infers that it is equally just to combine against all Masons, and by excluding every one from office; from the support and confidence of his friends and neighbors; thus personally proscribe and injure the one, for whatever wickedness is laid to the charge of the whole order; and of which wickedness it must be admitted the Mason here is innocent, and as fully condemns as any other individual in community.—There are Masons among us who will no sooner countenance wrong, or the violation of the rights of citizens, by Masons, than by any other individual in society—and the voice of calumny itself dare not assert the contrary. Yet they must be persecuted—yes, and even those who cannot be brought to persecute such men, must themselves be the subject of antimasonic proscription. What good citizen, then, who will not, after reflection, deny the justice of the above inference from the union of democrats against federalists? For as well may we make the democrats of Pennsylvania accountable for the wickedness of democracy in former times and other places. Pennsylvania is proud of her democracy. What has democracy done in other places? It has slain its hundreds of innocent victims, without regard to age or sex.—Democracy has inscribed upon the public edifices, 'there is no God.' But, say the democrats of Erie, we are not such—we approve not the slaughter of our fellow citizens. Very true, you do not—and do not Masons here whose truth you will not question, tell you, we are not such Masons as the antimasons describe; we approve not such things as they charge upon Masons; we rest under no such obligations? Why then are they proscribed, I ask? But, say some antimasons, we are compelled to this course, in order to put down Masonry; although we know there are Masons here who are individually worthy of our confidence; yet we are obliged to proscribe them in order to reach those who are really guilty. My fellow citizens, is it so? Has it come to this, that it becomes necessary and just to do manifest injustice to the innocent in order to punish the guilty, as is said?—Or is not rather the argument in favor of so doing entirely deceptive? Certainly it is mere sophistry.

It may perhaps be necessary in order to promote the views of the ambitious leaders of the antimasonic party, in Erie, and secure their objects, to proscribe every man who is called a Mason.—

But it is not necessary for any just purposes; or removing the evils of Masonry, so to do. Justice is eternal, immutable. Her laws are not to be repealed at the will, or to suit the views of any. To render unto every man according to his works, will be the judgement of unerring wisdom. And shall frail man adopt a different and a better standard? I appeal to the heart of every good citizen. Punish the guilty; withhold your confidence from their acknowledged supporters; from all who would infringe the laws of our country, or the civil rights of our citizens; but withhold not your confidence, and their rights, from those who utterly disclaim such things; and whose public acts, and private virtues, attest the truth of their assertions.

I now call upon all well meaning men, who call themselves antimasons, and who are honest in their opposition to what they think is an evil, to pause and consider, whether duty and correct principles do not demand that they should, at least, withhold their names and support from antimasonry, as a political party; and no longer under the plea of expediency or necessity, render unto any one that which is not his due; or deprive him of rights which belong equally to every good citizen in our republican family. CITIZEN.

An assemblage of 'ring, streaked and speckled' politicians has lately been held in Philadelphia, called the Antimasonic National Convention. It was composed of disappointed office seekers, and expectants of public favor. Frank Granger, of this state, was chairman. One or two of the resolutions passed by said meeting, strike us as being so very novel, that we publish them:—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to make inquiry as to the influence of Freemasonry on the Public Press, and whether it be expedient to adopt any measures in relation thereto.

This is going the whole hog. These political stock jobbers, however, should have been admonished by recent events in France, that any attempt to impose the shackles of despotism on a gallant people, jealous of their rights, by establishing a censorship, or attempting a dictation in such matters, would at once prove fatal to their cause. It is no wonder the Press, which has ever been the object of terror, to tyrants and bigots, in all ages, should be regarded with a jealous eye by such men as Granger, Holley, & Co. They are well aware that so long as the Press is left free to combat their ultra republican doctrines, so long their probable chances of success are prolonged.

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to consider the nature, principles and tendency of Freemasonry, as it regards its effects on the Christian Religion.

This is sheer hypocritical cant. A set of political jugglers sitting in judgment upon the effects of Masonry on the Christian Religion!! Why did they not rather institute an inquiry as to the effects of Antimasonry in disseminating the seeds of discord and disunion in neighborhoods and families—in destroying the peace and good order of churches—in converting the house of God into a receptacle for a set of political gladiators, bent upon 'rule or misrule.' Had they instituted inquiries as to these things, their labors might have been brought to a beneficial issue. We warn the people to be watchful of their rights. Give them power, and step by step, these men will undermine the whole fabric of this republic, which is now the admiration of the whole world.

THE BOQUET.

A SINGULAR ADVENTURE.—Once upon a time a traveller stepped into a post coach. He was a young man just starting into life. He found six passengers about him, all of them gray headed and extremely aged men. The youngest appeared to have been at least eighty winters. Our young traveller was struck with the singularly mild and happy aspect which distinguished all his fellow passengers, and determined to ascertain the secret of long life, and the art of making long age comfortable. He first addressed the one who was apparently the oldest, who told him that he had always led a regular and abstemious life, eating vegetables and drinking water. The young man was rather daunted at this, inasmuch as he loved the good things of this life. He addressed the second, who astounded him by saying he had always eat roast beef, and gone to bed regularly fuddled for seventy years—adding that he depended upon regularity. The third had prolonged his days by never seeking or accepting office—the fourth by resolutely abstaining from all political or religious controversies, and the fifth by going to bed at sunset and rising at dawn—the sixth was apparently much younger than the other five; his hair was less gray, and there was more of it: a placid smile, denoting a perfectly easy conscience, mantled his face, and his voice was jocund and strong. They were all surprised to learn that he was by ten years the oldest in the coach.—‘How,’ exclaimed our young traveller, ‘how is it you have thus preserved the freshness of life?—where there is one wrinkle on your brow there are fifteen on that of each and every one of your juniors—tell me, I pray, your secret of long life!’—‘It is no great mystery,’ said the old man; ‘I have drunk water and have drunk wine—I have eat meat and vegetables—I have held public office—I have dabbled in politics and written religious pamphlets—I have sometimes gone to bed at sunset and sometimes at midnight, got up at sunrise and at noon—but I ALWAYS PAID PROMPTLY FOR MY NEWSPAPER!’—Craftsman.

WHAT IS LIFE? There is eloquence of thought as well as of language in the following paragraph from Arnot's elements of Physics.

The function, by which the animal body assumes foreign matters from around, and converts them into its own substance, is little inviting in some of its details, but taken altogether is one of the most wonderful subjects which can engage the human attention. It points directly to the curious and yet unanswered question—What is LIFE?—The student of nature may analyze with all his art those minute portions of matter called seeds and ova, which he knows to be the rudiments of future creatures and the links by which endless generations of living creatures hang to existence; but he cannot disentangle and display apart their mysterious LIFE! that something under the influence of which each little germ in due time swells out, to fill an invisible mould of maturity which determines its forms and prepositions. One such substance thus becomes a beauteous rose-bush; another a noble oak; a third an eagle, a fourth an elephant—yea, in the same way, out of the rude materials of broken seed and roots, and leaves of plants and bits of animal flesh, is built up the human frame itself, whether of the active male, combining gracefulness with strength, or of the gentler woman, with beauty around her as light. How passing strange that such should be the origin of the bright human eye, whose glance pierces as if the invisible soul were shot with it—of the lips which pour forth sweetest eloquence—of the larynx, which by vibrating, fills the surrounding air with music; and more wonderful than all, of that mass shut up within the bony fortresses of the skull, whose delicate and curious texture is the abode of the soul, with its reason which contemplates, and its sensibility which delights in these and endless other miracles of creation.

Lee Lewis, the actor lately deceased, was reduced to such a melancholy and hopeless condition in health and fortune, that his death was the most desirable thing that could happen to him.—He was once a spirited and popular comedian, with little judgment, and hardly any education. He had the highest confidence in his own talents, and before he quitted Covent Garden Theatre, near twenty years ago, considered himself as the rightful heir to all the characters and all the reputation of Harry Woodward, an actor whose memory should not be disgraced by any comparison with him. This absurd confidence in his own abilities induced Lee Lewis to behave in a cavalier style to the manager who dismissed him, and very easily supplied his place. Lee Lewis then obtained a situation at Drury Lane Theatre, but made no impression on the public. Since that period he has been occasionally employed in Provincial Theatres, and at last sunk into great distress, from which he obtained temporary relief by a benefit in London last season. His fate should be a warning to actors in general, not to place too much confidence on their own powers, and to depend too much on the duration of public favor, which is soon transferred when new competitors appear.

To his quarrel with the manager of Covent Garden Theatre, arising from his foolish vanity, and the persuasion of the continuance of popular regard, this unhappy man might impute all his misfortunes, which finally brought him in disgust and broken hearted to the grave.—Sporting Magazine for August, 1830.

SADDLER THE AERONAUT.

There was something very melancholy in the circumstances attending Mr. Saddler's death. His last ascent was made from Bolton, on the 29th of Sep. 1824. The balloon rose with great velocity, and after a considerable flight, Mr. S. attempted to ascend at Fox Hill Bank, about three miles from Blackburn. With this view he threw a grapple into a hedge; but as the rope gave way, the balloon rebounded, and pitched him with great violence against a neighboring chimney. At this moment he was seen dangling by the legs from the ropes of the car, and received so many severe contusions on the head and other parts of the body, that he died the following morning at an early hour. A servant that accompanied him had nearly shared the same fate, and, what is still more remarkable, the publican to whose house the aeronaut was carried, and who immediately took a horse to procure a surgeon, was so completely overcome by his feelings and exertions, that he was seized with apoplexy, and expired within a few yards of his own door. A fatal accident befel Mr. Graham, a few weeks previous—another proof that very few aeronauts die a natural death. The ascent from Bolton was the thirtieth made by Mr. Saddler, and a most appalling story is recorded in one of his aerial voyages. On that occasion the wind carried him into the Irish Channel, and as he saw no prospect of being picked up at sea, he parted with nearly all his ballast, husbanded his gas to the utmost extent, and determined to cross to the sister kingdom. While thus situated, his air ship, thus to speak, sprung a leak, and as he foresaw what the consequences would be, he actually left the car, ascended the silken shrouds of his balloon, and in that sublimely perilous situation—dangling as it were between heaven and earth—cloned a rent through which the gas was escaping, which in the course of a very few minutes would have precipitated him into the yawning abyss below.

CURIOUS DISCOVERY.—Cause and Remedy for Carious Teeth.—M. La Beaume, the medical electrician has made a very curious discovery, that the accumulation on the teeth termed ‘tartar,’ is occasioned by animalcula which are visible on microscopic examination.—According to this gentleman, they gradually burrow between the teeth and gums, penetrate the enamel, and enter the interior of the teeth, thereby producing the destruction termed ‘caries,’ and also tooth-ache. Mr. La Beaume, after numerous experiments, ascertained that the true malic acid (the purified acid of the crab apple) not only destroyed them, but dissolved the mucous collection which protected them. He therefore recommends the teeth to be brushed every morning, and also the tongue, which, when loaded with foul slime, is covered with similar animalcula, with a lotion composed of malic and rose water, and afterwards with the prepared areca-nut charcoal. This mode of managing teeth is extremely beneficial, as it not only removes, and when used only once a week, prevents its reaccumulation, but cleanses the tongue and produces a relish for food. Its good effects on the tongue and palate, proceed, in fact, from sympathy, or from a continuous influence transmitted to the stomach. The irritation produced by the animalcula, and the offensive effluvia from them or their surrounding slime, probably of a fecal nature, are extended to the salival glands; the consequence of which is, that their secretion is unhealthy, and no doubt, a very common cause of indigestion. Hypocrates, who, in all cases, paid particular attention to the state of the stomach, was of a similar opinion, that a perfect or good digestion depends as much on the healthy state of the teeth, as on the sound condition of the digestive organs.

THE IGNIS FATUUS.

After several days of stormy weather, one evening, about 8, P. M. during a light shower (which had been preceded by a hail squall,) a Jack-a-lantern was seen on the main-top-gallant-mast head, and an intelligent person was sent up to examine it. He found it formed by a circle of lights around the mast head, 8 or 10 in number, and one or two inches apart. Each flame was about two inches long; was, where it joined the mast head, about the size of a knitting needle, and the extremity larger than the flame of a candle, and nearly as bright, of a pale blue colour, each making a noise similar to steam out of green wood—while burning, no smell was perceptible. Upon striking it with the hand the lights were extinguished and small sparks adhered to the hand for a moment, then disappeared. In a few seconds the lights again began to burn; after several blows they entirely disappeared.

EPICURISM AND EPICURUS.

No word has more censurably been perverted from its original and proper signification, than the word EPICURISM. So far from being, in its proper sense, luxury or sensual enjoyment, as defined by Johnson, the lexicographer; it is derived from the name of a sage of transcendent genius and unrivalled intellect, EPICURUS, who lived three hundred years before Christ, and was the most philosophical and temperate, if not the most abstemious Grecian of his time. In the words of a late popular, sensible and very learned writer, John Mason Good, of England, lately deceased, and universally lamented by all lovers of literature and the sciences in both hemispheres, we would disseminate the praises of our much slandered and abused favorite, Epicurus. Let us, says Good, in the candid spirit of genuine philosophy, do the same justice to Epicurus as we attempted to Pythagoras and Plato. It has been very generally said, and very generally believed, because it has been very generally said, that the great and mighty cause of this beautiful and harmonious formation of worlds, and systems of worlds, in the opinion of Epicurus, was mere chance or fortune. There is nothing, however, in those fragments of his works which have descended to us, that can in any way countenance so opprobrious an opinion, but various passages that distinctly controvert it; passages in which he peremptorily denies the existence of chance or fortune, either as a deity or a cause of action; and unequivocally refers the whole of those complex series of percussions and repercussions, interchanges and combinations, exhibited by the elementary seeds or atoms of matter, during the creative progress, to a chain of immutable laws, which they received from the Almighty Architect at the beginning, and which they still punctually obey, and will forever obey till the Universe shall at length cease to exist. 'Whom,' says Epicurus, (in a letter to his disciple Menecæus, that has yet survived the preying tooth of Time, and will be found in Diogenes Saertius), 'do you believe to be more excellent than he, who piously reveres the Gods, who feels no dread of death, and rightly estimates the design of nature? Such a man does not, with the multitude, regard chance as a God, for he knows that God can never act at random; nor as a contingent cause of events; nor does he conceive that, from any such power flows the good or the evil, that measures the real happiness of human life.' He held however, that, the laws which govern the universe were altogether arranged and imposed upon it by the Creator at its first formation, and that the successive train of events to which they have given rise have followed as the necessary result of such an arrangement, and not as the immediate superintendence of a perpetually controlling Providence. For it was the opinion of Epicurus, as well as of Aristotle, that perfect rest and tranquillity are essential to the perfect happiness even of Him, who, to adopt his own language in another place, possesses all immortality and beatitude. 'Think not,' says he, 'that the different motions and revolutions of the heavens, the rising, setting, eclipses, and other phenomena of the planets, are produced by the immediate control, superintendence, or ministration of Him, who possesses all immortality and beatitude; it is from the immutable laws which they received at the beginning, in the creation of the universe, that they mutually fulfil their several circuits.'

The origin of this calumny upon the character of Epicurus is by no means difficult to trace, and it has been sufficiently traced, and sufficiently exposed, by Diogenes Saertius, Gassendi, Du Rondelle, and other distinguished writers, who have done ample justice to his memory; and upon the confessions of Plutarch, Cicero and Seneca, abundantly proved that it was the same rancorous spirit of envy among many of his competitors for public fame, and especially among the Stoic philosophers, which strove to fix upon him the charge of voluptuous living, though the most temperate and abstemious Athenian of his day, that thus, with yet keener malevolence, endeavored to brand him with the still fouler reproach of the grossest impiety and atheism. It is, indeed, scarcely to be believed, if the fact were not currently attested by all the writers of antiquity, that the philosopher, whose name, from the low and malignant spirit we have just adverted to, has been proverbialized for general licentiousness and excess, drew the whole of his daily diet from the plainest pottage, intermixed with the herbs and fruits of his pleasant and celebrated garden. 'I am perfectly contented,' says he in an epistle to another friend, 'with bread and water alone; but send me a piece of your Cyprian cheese, that I may indulge myself whenever I feel disposed for a luxurious treat.'—Such too was the diet of his disciples. Water, says Dioctes, was their common beverage; and of wine they never allowed themselves more than a very small cup. And hence, when the city of Athens was besieged by Demetrius, and its inhabitants reduced to the utmost extremity, the scholars of Epicurus bore up under the calamity with less inconvenience than any other class of citizens; the philosopher supporting them at his own expense, and sharing with them daily a small ration of beans. The pleasure of friendship; the pleasure of virtue, the pleasure of tranquillity, the pleasure of science, the pleasure of gardening, the pleasure of studying the works of nature, and of admiring her in all the picturesque beauty of her evolutions, formed the whole pursuit of his life. This alone, he affirmed, deserves the name of PLEASURE, and can alone raise the mind above the groundling and misnamed pleasures of self-indulgence, debauchery and excess. In fine, Epicurus dared to expose the absurd theology of his day, and in his life and doctrines gave a perpetual rebuke to vice, and immorality of every kind.' Such was Epicurus, and what rational man would not be his disciple?

MORE REVOLUTIONS!

The intelligence from Europe, by the latest arrivals, is of a highly interesting character. The following is peculiarly so.

There has been a revolutionary movement in Brussels—which has ended in the subversion of the municipal authority and in the establishment of a citizen guard—after some fighting with the regular troops. The Belgians have long been discontented with the Netherland Government. A government journal, edited by M. Libry Bagnano, had made use of some offensive expressions in relation to the people of Belgium, which exasperated the multitude and led to the disturbances, which began on the 25th of August. The house of the editor, M. Bagnano, was attacked by the crowd—the windows were broken, the doors burst in, all the furniture demolished, and the papers and books were torn and thrown out of the windows. During this effervescence the police abstained from interfering. The group went to the Place Royal, but did nothing—another stopped before the Palace of Justice, and in a moment broke all the windows of the Hall of the Court of Assize, with cries of 'Down with Van Maanen! Long live De Potter!' Shortly after, the General, who commands the town, proceeded to the Hotel de Ville, and the Horse Gendarmes commenced to patrol about in detachments. A more numerous crowd proceeded to the Rue de Berlaumont, and to the house of M. de Kuyff, the Director of the Police. It was forcibly entered, and there, as at the residence of M. Libry, everything was broken and destroyed; but there, likewise, not a single article was abstracted. One individual wanted to carry off the cloak of the Director of the Police, but he was trampled upon by the people, and the cloak itself was torn in a thousand fragments. The crowd began there, already, to assume a more serious and violent aspect. The whole town began to be apprised of it; the inhabitants left their houses, and the troops got under arms. The first musket-shots that were heard were fired towards 1 o'clock, when the commotion became directly more tumultuous and decisive. The crowd ran, with great noise, towards the hotel of M. Van Maanen, the Minister of Justice, situated in the Place du Petits Carmes. When the people were before this residence, the exasperation seemed to have reached its highest pitch.

The doors, being burst in, shortly afterwards gave free admittance to the multitude, who poured in with cries of 'Down with Van Maanen!' Furniture and effects of every description were demolished. The troops wished to restore order, but they were too feeble. They were attacked, disarmed, and obliged to retreat. After this first explosion, the multitude seemed to concert measures, and set fire to the building. The smoke appeared rapidly; the crowd rushed out, and ranged itself round the Hotel, and declared that it would not retire before the building was burnt down to the very foundation. The conflagration made great progress. The flames were perceivable already from afar—the firemen hastened to the spot, with their engines, towards four o'clock, but they were repulsed, and forced to return to the Hotel de Ville. The vast edifice being set on fire served thus as a point of assemblage—a great number of workmen ran to the spot without pillaging, but likewise without retiring.

Next morning, the 26th, a battalion of chasseurs and a battalion of grenadiers spread themselves, in companies, through the streets, when the agitation was greatest. An officer ordered a platoon to fire, and the wounded were carried through the streets; several persons were killed.

Another account from the Times, says—

'The Garde Bourgeoise amounts to 5,000 men, and every hour is adding to the number. They are under the command of a man chosen by themselves, Baron Emmanuel d'Hoogvorst. The government is virtually in his hands. The Governor of the city is no longer heard of. The Burgomaster and the Regence are mere ciphers. They sign the numerous proclamations, but no one cares for them; and a petition is gone to the King, calling for a change in the local magistracy, and the removal of M. Van Maanen. Libry Bagnano has not been heard of. Neither are there any tidings of Baron Kuyff, the Director of Police. Their houses are in ruins, with those of the Governor, Vanderfosse, Baron Vantier, General Commandant, and the Minister of Justice, Van Maanen. So thorough is the disorganization of Government, that there was no one found this morning to issue stamps for the newspapers.

I may say generally that nothing could display more temper than did the troops and their commander; but when ordered to fire, the soldiers readily obeyed. There were about a dozen of the people killed and half as many soldiers. I saw several of the straggling conflicts between the military and the mob, and the latter showed no want of courage. Had they but had a cause one might sympathize with them. Their object now is apparently satisfied. They have given vent to their feelings of hatred against the eminently unpopular men; and being gradually disarmed, by fair means and foul, the rabble is no longer dangerous.'

Brussels, Friday, Aug 27, 11 o'clock, A. M. The nobility and other classes have put themselves at the head of the movement. Yesterday they entered into a contract with the Chiefs of the military force, who have joined their cause. The latter only required that they might not be required to lay down their arms, and that the Palace might be confided to them. The Civic and Belgic Guard took possession of all other Posts by that treaty. The Palace will be given up if the answer from the Hague is not favourable to the views of the national party. They are to demand a new Constitution no octroye but conquis; they as yet, speak of no other change of dynasty. Either the King, or the Prince of Orange is excepted at Ghent. The populace have set fire to the buildings in the park. The King's Theatre is in flames.

Four o'clock P. M.—The Civic Guard are excellently organized; every man who has property to protect is called upon to enroll his name and give his services in this body.

Confidence is not yet restored to any extent. The populace demanded the surrender of the Royal Palace, and threatened to set fire to it if not given up to them; they think that by its possession, Government could more readily be brought to terms.

The tri-colour worn by the insurgents of Brussels, is not the French colors, but the old colors of Brabant.

The rumor of disturbance at Ghent was wrong, or premature. None had taken place yesterday afternoon.

The mails were allowed to leave Brussels yesterday; but no letters that came have yet been opened.

Proclamation. Inhabitants of Brussels—A rumour having been spread that troops are now marching upon Brussels, the Commandant of the City Guard hastens to inform you that orders have been given by the superior military authority to prevent them entering the town, and to order them to halt. The security of the town of Brussels remains, exclusively confided to the brave Civic Guard, who have hitherto so ably performed its duties. A deputation of the principal inhabitants of Brussels is about to repair to the Hague. In waiting its return, the troops stationed in the upper part of the town will remain inactive. The officers commanding the Civic Guard have pledged their honor to cause it to be respected.

The Commandant of the Civic Guard.

Baron Vanderlinden Hoogvoorst.

Dated at Brussels, 29th August.

Brussels Aug. 30.—The state of things remain as it was yesterday; the services of our brave citizen guard continues still with the same firmness and vigilance.

Several individuals, strongly implicated in the late events, have been arrested.

To-day the shops were opened as usual.

Most extraordinary reports are in circulation as to what is going on in Holland: It appears nearly certain that in several cities the citizen guard had been armed, and placed in military garrisons; they mention Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Breda, &c. The windows of the Burgomaster of Nijmegen have been broken.

Several letters arrived at Liege announce that a great disturbance had occurred at Cologne, at Dusseldorf, and many other of the towns of Rhenish Prussia.

A Convocation of the States General has been fixed for the 18th September.

Revolution in the Netherlands.—The latest news is not of increased interest. The rioting had ceased, and the National Guard had succeeded in restoring the peace of the city. The council met on the 29th Aug. with the concurrence of the King, and a proclamation was resolved upon, summoning the States to meet immediately, for the purpose of discussing the claims of the Netherlands, and redressing any grievances which may be considered to press heavily on them. The Prince of Orange had departed for Antwerp, where an explosion similar to that of Brussels was feared.

FRANCE. The following ordinance was issued by the King on the 22d August, and agreed to by the Chamber of Deputies on the 29th.

“Louis Philippe, &c.

“We have ordered and do order, that the following bill be submitted to the Chamber of Deputies by our Keeper of the Seals, and by M. Dupin, the elder, whom we have charged to explain the grounds of it:

Article 1. Those Frenchmen banished according to article 3 and 7 of the law of Jan. 12, 1816, are restored to all their civil and political rights, and may, consequently, return to France.

They are also restored to the property and pensions they have been deprived of by that law, without prejudice to the rights acquired by others. This last regulation is applicable to those who have already returned to France by virtue of particular decisions.

2. The pensions thus restored shall not commence until the publications of this law.

3. It is not derogatory to the conditions of the fourth article of the before mentioned law.

Given at the Palais Royal, Aug 28, 1830.”

The ex-ministers Polignac, Peyronet, Chateaufort, and De Ranville, had been committed to prison, in the dungeons or towers of Vincennes.

From the Antimasonic Christian Herald. FREEMASONRY AND THE CHURCH.

We have recently had opportunity to witness a practical demonstration of the influence of Masonic oaths, in a case of church discipline. Would give names dates and places; but, as the case is not yet entirely disposed of, we have no desire to excite prejudice in the minds of any, by which the final issue of the question may be affected. Suffice it to say, that the offender was a Freemason, of the Royal Arch Degree and clearly proved guilty of the charges alleged against him. It would however, have been truly surprising, to any one unacquainted with the nature of Masonic oaths, to see the assiduity, with which every Freemason in the church, with one honorable exception, managed to excuse and acquit their offending brother. It was observed, by spectators, and by members of the church, that the Masonic members, with the exception above alluded to, never broke their ranks in a single instance. It was just as easy to tell before hand how every Mason would vote, in relation to any question that was taken, as it was after the vote was cast. In one instance, a Masonic brother, who had not heard a syllable of the trials, came home from a distance, entered the last church meeting, when it was nearly through, and proceeded to vote with the ‘craft,’ with as much promptness and regularity, as an old soldier enters the ranks, and marches to the step and order of his commanding officer. There is no mistake in this; it is what our eyes have seen, and we pledge ourselves for its correctness. It is however, no more than what has taken place in other churches; but only affords additional demonstration, that Freemasons feel themselves bound by oaths and penalties, ‘not to speak evil of a brother Master Mason, either behind his back or before his face, but warn him of all approaching danger; and so ‘aid and assist a Companion Royal Arch Mason, when engaged in any difficulty, so far as to extricate him from the same, if in their power, whether he be right or wrong.’

It becomes our duty to correct the foregoing statement, especially because we believe it refers to a case of Church discipline. If, indeed, it does refer to a case of discipline in the Church in the North Parish in Wrentham, of which Rev. Moses Thatcher is Pastor, we unhesitatingly say it is an absolute falsehood; calculated not only to throw contempt on the Masonic Institution, but on the Church itself. We are happy, however, to have it in our power to lay the facts before the public, and in some measure, to counteract the base purposes of its author, in attempting to influence the decision of the Council, before the defendant should have opportunity to be heard in his defence. Our purpose is merely to correct the second paragraph of the piece, where it asserts unequivocally that, ‘In one instance a Masonic brother, who had not heard a syllable of the trial, came home from a distance, entered the last Church meeting, when it was nearly through,’ &c. Now the time when this brother entered the meeting, was before the first motion, (which was for an adjournment of the meeting,) was disposed of; and as it respects his not knowing a syllable of the trial, it is so far from the fact, that this same brother had heard the charge and the doings of the former meeting, relative to this case, faithfully read from attested copy of the records of the Church. Now let the author of the piece alluded to, who, we have reason to believe, is the Rev. Moses Thatcher, pastor of the Church, and a seceding Mason, wipe off, if he can, the foul stain that this gross deviation from truth has cast on his ministerial character, and upon some of the members of that flock of which Christ has made him overseer.

The article quoted, appeared in the editorial columns of the Herald, of which the Reverend Moses Thatcher is the reputed editor.

LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE.—According to previous arrangements, on Thursday, the 14th inst., at half past 11 o'clock, the procession moved from Faneuil Hall, through Merchants' Row, up State, Court and Tremont streets, to the site of the Temple, between St. Paul's Church and Washington Garden. The Stone was laid with the usual ceremonies; after which the Rev. Mr. Sabine, offered up a prayer. Mr. JOSEPH JENKINS, G. M. then delivered an eloquent and impressive address. After the address the procession formed again, and marched through Tremont and Court streets, Cornhill, Dock-Square to Faneuil Hall.

In the afternoon a dinner was provided in Quincy Hall, of which about four hundred Masons partook. The day was uncommonly fine, though ushered in by one of the most violent thunder-storms, we have been visited with for the year past; every thing the day previous seemed to forbode an uncomfortable time for the procession; but when the day arrived the clouds which had frowned upon the earth were scattered by the sun's bright beams, and all nature seem'd to smile again.—The ‘Grand Masonic March’ we think one of the most inspiring and effective, that we have ever heard: Mr. Zeuner deserves the highest praise for this specimen of his musical talent.—There were over two thousand Masons in the procession.

We copy the following paragraph from the Commercial Gazette of yesterday.

The procession, was composed of about two thousand persons, and a more respectable body of individuals we never have seen together in this city. We noticed in the procession several aged men, among them the Rev. Dr. Ripley of Concord, and Major Melvill, two patriots of the revolution. The appearance of this procession was at once rich and imposing; and among those who swelled its ranks were hundreds of our most intelligent and influential merchants and mechanics; gentlemen whose names and characters would confer an honor to any institution in this or any other country. And we will remark further, that there was apparently as much mind in the procession, as is usually found among any body of the same magnitude. We were not a little surprised to see so many of our old friends in Masonic ranks, who, until yesterday, were not known to us as members of the ‘much abused institution.’ We hope that our antimasonic neighbors obtained a ‘good place to see the review.’ It was certainly worth seeing, and worth remembering too.

Further particulars next week.

ACCIDENTS, &c.—We observed in the Centinel of Wednesday, last, that a truckman, Alexander Jaquith, aged 24, in the employ of Col Dunbar, in attempting to jump from his truck, on Monday afternoon, was struck by the shaft, and the wheel passed over his body, which caused his death in about three hours after. We cannot help noticing with regret the frequency of accidents of this kind; neither can we refrain from censuring in some degree the proprietors of the trucks in this city for their apparent inattention to their drivers and their teams; in fact, we think it is time that the city authorities should devote a little attention to this subject, especially when it is placing the lives of our citizens in jeopardy—we here allude to the careless, the before unheard of practice, of driving without reins! how frequently do we observe, in our streets, trucks, at full speed, and behold the drivers running by the side of their horses, beating them on the head with the butt-end of the whip to stop them; and the chance is ten to one against them whether they are able to accomplish their attempt until some accident has befallen either them, their animals, or some individual passing at the time.

Two instances of careless driving occurred in Congress street last week—a little after dark one of our stages, the horses at full speed, was on the point of passing over a child, apparently about four years of age, when a young gentleman, at the risk of his own life, sprang beneath the horses' feet and saved the child from an untimely end.—The other case occurred the next day, when a child was rescued from a similar situation by the screams of a female. It is surprising that we do not hear of more such accidents when we take into consideration the fact of the carelessness of our drivers and the number of children suffered to run at large, even after dark. For the last two months the Crier has been almost nightly in the street with his bell—and, if it be not criminal so to do, we could wish that the mothers of such children were brought to punishment. It is not more than two months since that we were informed that an aged man, was run over on the Dorchester turnpike, through the carelessness of one of the city milkmen, and his legs broken; and that the inhuman wretch left his victim to suffer by the road side, where he had dragged him!

Erratum.—In the piece signed Bernaldo, in our last, in the last line for ‘its sky’ read ‘their sky.’

LOST

Yesterday, between Faneuil Hall and Quincy Hall, a Templar's Sash and Apron. The finder will be rewarded on leaving it at No. 12, Washington Place, Fort Hill.

THE WREATH.

THE FATAL PROMISE.

[By Mrs. SARAH J. HALE.]

'Yes, we must part—'tis heaven's decree—
But keep my true love token,
The ring of gold I gave to thee;
My vow shall ne'er be broken:—
I pledged thee then this faithful heart,
And said, though fate should sever,
And friends deny and hope depart,
My heart was thine forever.

Nay, plead not, love,—it must be so;
My mother, should I wed thee,
She doomed me for a life of woe!
And 'tis for that I've fled thee—
My mother—O! I see her now,
Her cold cheek's clayey whiteness;
Death's dew upon her marble brow,
In her eye his glassy brightness!

And then the dying smile that wreathed
Her rigid, sunken features,
When I the fatal promise beathed!—
—O, God! why must thy creatures
Be tortured thus!—but plead not, love,
The promise hath been given,
My mother bore my faith above,
For she was ripe for heaven.

And fondly did she cherish me,
And I was reared so kindly;
Indulged in all—save love for thee—
I will not err so blindly,
And deem her cruelly inclined,
That thus apart she tore us—
Oh, no—to her prophetic mind,
A storm of grief was o'er us.

Then fare thee well—I bow me down,
And trust the grace of heaven,
Perchance beneath this angry frown,
A sunbeam may be given;
I will not bid thee constant prove,
But when life's ties are broken,
We'll meet, my love, we'll meet above!—
Farewell—but keep my token.'

A deep and narrow grave they've made,
Where droops yon pensive willow,
There she who oft had wept and prayed,
Sleeps on death's dreamless pillow;
And there, reclined that grave besides,
The youth displayed her token—
'I come, my love,'—he faintly sighed—
The ties of life are broken!

CEREMONY OF LAYING

THE CORNER STONE OF THE MASONIC TEMPLE TO BE DEDICATED IN BOSTON,

BY THE GRAND LODGE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

OCT. 14, 1830.

'Tis over—the task, the holy task is done!—and the Temple of the Mason is dedicated to the Mason's God: the last note of anxious preparation has died away—and the cheering voice of a grateful Fraternity, returning thanks to the Almighty for the benefits bestowed upon them, has ascended on the tell-tale air, to the throne of heaven. * * * We feel a pride, an honest pride, in contemplating the late proceedings of our Masonic brethren: an honest pride, we say—a generous elation of the heart, un-mixed with any other feeling save that of friendship toward all—yea! even toward our enemies,—they who would wish to bend our necks to the very ground—to trample our bodies in the dust!—We feel an honest conviction of having done our duty; and, though the tongue of slander, of malice, of hatred and revenge assail us—though malediction and imprecation fall on our devoted heads, wherever we turn—though the chains of oppression were clanging upon our limbs—still one feeling—the feeling that has sustained us throughout our many trials, would be predominant,—the feeling of compassion for our oppressors—of forgiveness for the wrongs done us, and an endeavour to obliterate them from our memory—'Tis true that we have been severe in our remarks—'tis true that we have exposed to public view—to public contempt—some of our fellow men—men who have held honorable stations in life; but who have descended from their elevation, from what cause God is the only judge, to revile those who never did nor would have done, had it been in their power, to them an injury—'tis true that we have overstepped the bounds of charity;—but must we be condemned for this?—Have we not had cause, just cause to spur us on to the unwelcome task?—Have we not borne in silence, till the heart was filled almost to bursting, the many aspersions of our characters as men, as christians?—

Have we not had to wrestle with our lot?—

Have we not suffered things to be forgiven—

And only not to desperation driven?

Will not the worm, when it is trodden under foot, turn upon its destroyer?—and must we be denied the privilege that God, in his infinite wisdom, has bestowed upon his meanest creature?—Must we be condemned, because we refute the calumnies heaped upon us, and openly accuse our calumniators—and challenge them to the proof of their assertions? Must we see our aged fathers' hoary heads profanely touched by the dastard wretch—hear them accused of blasphemy, of MURDER—and not rise in their defence? Great God! must we bear all this?—No! Nature cries aloud and bids us stand up as their champion! As Republicans we stand up to defend our rights—rights granted to the veriest menial—to ALL, save Masons!—the rights of conscience, and of private opinion!

And will not our enemies,—if such those who have come forward against us really be—will not they, if they have a spark of feeling in their breasts, say that we have been injured?—Do they not feel that they have done us wrong! Do they not know the Christian's duty?—Do they not assume to fight under the banner of Christ?—And are they hypocrites, or does their zeal carry them too far? If the latter be the case, then does a paradox arise; for we had thought, and believed, Masons as we are, that the Christian's precepts inculcated a love and compassion for mankind—a desire to reform them from their ways of deviation from strict rectitude—to go forward coolly, deliberately, and fearlessly in the path of truth, and never to leave that even-track, though rocks should threaten to crush them to atoms, or chasms, roaring with volcanic flame, should open to swallow the unwary traveller.—And does that class of men, under the banner of the Church of Christ, calling themselves Antimasons, never deviate from that path?—Are they less liable to deviate from that path than the Mason, whom they wish to drive to the very brink of perdition?—Does not the bible tell us to remove the beam from our own eyes, before attempting to pluck the mote from our brother's?—Have you done this?—Are you so pure in heart, in precept, in action, as to be capable of attempting the work of others' reformation?—Is there no secret something in your bosoms that tells you you are not perfect?—If the Christian faith is your guide; if you act up to it, then has the Mason no cause of fear!—For when you take a reputable stand and will meet him on fair and open ground—when in your Antimasonic Christian papers and Free Presses, you regard the truth,—when you meet the Mason on honourable grounds, then, and not till then, can he extend to you the right hand of fellowship.—Then will he forget and forgive!

We know not what the Anties, or the unfortunate "Jacks," think or have thought or spoken about the late Masonic Procession; but we fear the former were, and we hope agreeably, disappointed; for if our memories serve us faithfully now, we believe something was said about the Masons being ashamed to show their degraded heads.—Be this as it may, certes they were not ashamed either of themselves, their friends or their institution:—as to the latter, if we may be allowed to judge from behaviour and appearances, their feeling was none other than respectful.—From hints thrown out and handbills circulated that day by some servile, contemptible wretches to produce an excitement, we had every reason to apprehend disturbance, yea, even personal insult; but such was not the case; for though attempts were made to produce a riot, by minions stationed here and there, yet the people, (or "Jacks,") soon put them out of countenance.—For ourselves we speak, when we say that our feelings were enviable—for if ever we passed a happy moment it was when looking on the well-known countenances of those who composed the procession on the fourteenth. Could any man, however lost to feeling, look upon them and not feel in his heart that they were injured, grossly injured? Could he behold those whom he had been taught to, respect for their many virtues, passing before him and not feel there was at least some good men among them?—Could he behold the aged and decrepit with their white locks bared to the public gaze and flowing in the careless breeze, dragging their feeble limbs along, proudly displaying their insignia of fellowship, perhaps for the last time, and not feel a thrill of reverence for them?—Could he believe that so many good men, stricken by the hand of Time, were following an ignis fatuus, that still further led them into the savannas of folly, at every step they took?—Could he believe that all those ministers of God's holy word, men who are looked upon as examples worthy of being followed, who were there assembled, were fools,—were acting under the influence of oaths which were contrary to their religious tenets, and which bade them sacrifice the best interests of mankind; ay, even to commit murder, that some secret end might be obtained? Could he believe that those men who had led a life of purity—who have been and still continue to be the ornaments of the church of Christ—that such men as Ripley, Harris, Eaton, Dean, Barret, Wells, Sabine, Blake, Taylor, and other active ministers in this city, of all denominations and creeds, are to be put down merely because they are Masons, by such men as Churchill, Clough, Phelps, Porter, and a hundred such "apparently respectable gentlemen?" And have Masons, when looking upon those who compose their vast assemblages, cause to be ashamed of that institution which has enrolled on its escutcheon the names of such men as these, and thousands of patriots and the greatest of men throughout the world?—If they have cause to be ashamed of such an institution, that boasts of such men as we have enumerated—then what must be the feelings of those who secretly oppose them under the name of antimasonry? who cannot boast of one individual renowned for anything save perjury, or his political intrigues.—Masonry does not boast of having all the good, the wise and great within its precincts—nor is it exempt from the common evils attending all institutions:—still we aver that we are proud of our institution; and though it be not infallible, still we have no reason to be ashamed of it!—Tho' we might not be very proud of being numbered even with the best, the choicest flowers of antimasonry!

From the short notice given to our Masonic brethren, and from the lowering appearance of the clouds, it was thought that very few would be present on the occasion; besides, the invitation was not a general one; it was confined merely to the Lodges of Massachusetts, and many of the notifications could not have reached their destination until the very hour the ceremony was commenced.—The day previous was one of gloom, and the night following brought with it a terrific storm;—the thunder was incessant, and the lightning's vivid flashes struck terror to the stoutest hearts. Many of our Masonic friends in Worcester and the adjoining counties, who had intended to assist in the ceremonies of the day, were thus deterred, feeling assured that the weather would be unfavourable, and would bring with it disappointment; but, notwithstanding all this, there were many, and among them we saw the aged countenances of some we had been accustomed to gaze upon in boyhood, with feelings of reverence, who came from a distance of over a hundred miles—thus giving a satisfactory proof that they were not ashamed of their institution, nor “ashamed to show their degraded heads” even in the fortress of their most bitter enemies, who have asserted that the building of the Temple is a mere artifice—the last feeble struggle of the Mason to keep his Institution from mouldering into ruin.

The following remarks from the Courier of Monday, are pertinent to the present occasion:—

“Thursday last was a proud day for a class of men, who, of late, have been much abused and insulted, but who, to their credit be it recorded, have so far as we know, been passive under the lash of the oppressor, even to the last requirement of the spirit of meekness. We are not, at this time, in the mood to enter upon a discussion of the merits of the question whether Speculative Freemasonry is of any utility in the present constitution of society, or whether those who are endeavouring to expel from the pale of social affections and political rights, all that numerous body of their fellow citizens, who have united for charitable and social purposes under the banner of Freemasonry, are governed by public-spirited or merely selfish purposes—whether the spirit of antimasonry bring with it “airs from heaven or blasts from hell.” The “questionable shape” of Masonry or Anti-Masonry may be safely left, for the present, to those who have more leisure for the discussion, and who feel more ambition for the oration of a conqueror or the crown of a martyr.

“We repeat that Thursday was a proud day for the Masonic fraternity of Massachusetts and New England. It required no small degree of intellectual nerve to induce a Mason to grace the occasion with his presence, at a time when so many pens and so many presses are employed to produce an impression on the whole community, that his principles are those of a traitor and his associates a band of murderers and cut-throats. Almost every individual, who accepted the invitation of the Grand Master, must have waited on him, uncertain whether he might not have been the single individual who could screw up his courage to endure the reproach and despise the taunts of the scoffer. The result was more happy than the most ardent imagination of any one could have anticipated. We did not see it. But we have heard, from various authorities, that it was splendid. It was numerous, too. One who knows the exact number of individuals of which it was composed, says the whole number of Freemasons present was twenty-two hundred and sixty-seven. These were not men made for the occasion—dressed with a sash and an apron, to make up a show—but men who are known in this community as men of honesty, of character, of permanent patriotism and enduring virtue—men whom their very revilers are willing to trust with property to the last farthing, and life to the last throb. The citizens of Boston, those who are uninterested in the question, whether Freemasonry be a useful or a useless, an innocent or a vicious institution, though not given to extravagant fondness for ostentation and parade, looked on the procession and the proceedings of Thursday, with satisfaction, we believe with approbation. They are not willing to believe that the men whom they saw bearing emblems of their membership in the fraternity of Freemasonry, the reverend pastor with hoary head, and the enterprising merchant, the active and temperate mechanic, the prudent statesman, the conscientious judge, and the octogenarian, who had fought the battles of our independence, are fit subjects for contumelious libels, or that they are leagued together to destroy the religious, legal or moral institutions of society.”

We learn that Mr. Schaffer, formerly of the Washington Garden, honored the occasion with a display of fireworks in the evening. Several dozen of rockets were sent off from the Garden. In fine, the day seemed to be one of general rejoicing. Every body was pleased, Masons or not, excepting, of course, our bitter revilers. It was a sorry day for them, and they will long remember it.

THE PROCESSION.

Agreeably to previous arrangements, and according to ancient usages, the Grand Lodge of this Commonwealth; representatives from several of its subordinate Lodges, and invited guests; together with the Grand Chapter of Massachusetts, the Grand Encampment of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and their subordinate Chapters and Encampments, assembled at Faneuil Hall, on Thursday the 14th instant, for the purpose of laying in ample form, the Corner Stone of the Masonic Temple, to be erected in this city. At about half past 10 o'clock, A. M. the brethren were formed into procession in the following

The procession moved a few minutes after 11 o'clock, under the direction of John P. Bigelow, Grand Marshal, assisted by George G. Smith, and Lynde M. Walter as Aids, and Messrs Harrison Gray, William Hilliard, Francis C. Whiston, Enoch Hobart, John Bernard, Frederic Le Cain, Wyatt Richards, Edwin Sevey, David Kimball, Francis R. Bigelow, Simon W. Robinson, Daniel Baxter, Jr., Sumner Crosby, Samuel Eveleth, Joshua B. Flint, Peter Dunbar, and J. P. Robinson, Assistant Marshals. The procession passed from Faneuil Hall, through Merchants' Row, up State, and Court streets, to the site of the Temple, next South of St. Paul's Church in Tremont-street.

The Bible, square, and compasses were borne upon a cushion by the Rev. Dr. Harris of Dorchester; the Book of Constitutions by William Hilliard, Esq. of Cambridge; the square, level and plumb by Mr. Rogers the Architect; the Banners of the Grand Lodge by Samuel F. Coolidge, Thomas B. Wales, and Francis Welch, Esquires; the Banner of Charity, by A. H. Ward, Esq.; the Banners of the Grand Chapter, by Abiel Buttrick, John M'Kim, and Wm. Eaton; the Banner of St. Paul's Chapter, by Capt. Alexander Parris; and that of St. Andrew's Chapter by R. Baker; the golden vessels with wine and oil by B. B. Appleton, Benjamin Stevens, and Charles Henshaw.

Esquires. The globes were also borne in the procession. The banners of the Grand Encampment, Grand Chapter, and of some of the subordinate Lodges were also borne by the appropriate officers. The Master Masons were divided into sections, and the Banners of the following Lodges, viz. St. John's, St. Andrews, Massachusetts, Columbian, Mount Lebanon, St. Matthew's, Plymouth, Mount Carmel, Essex, King Solomon, and Old Colony, were placed in the intervals.

After the Fraternity had assembled upon the platform covering the area of the building, and the Grand Marshal had proclaimed silence, an introductory prayer was offered by the Rev. Mr. Barrett, of this city, one of the Grand Chaplains. The Inscriptions on the plate were then read by John J. Loring, Esq. Grand Treasurer. A box, containing the following articles, was then deposited in a cavity formed in the Stone, viz :

PLATE,

With the following Inscriptions.

The cavity was then hermetically sealed, and the stone was raised and placed on its bed, to the strains of solemn music. The working tools were then presented to the Grand Master, who applied the square, and plumb, and level, to the stone and pronounced it to be

'WELL FORMED, TRUE AND TRUSTY.'

The vases with corn, wine, and oil, were presented to the Grand Master, who poured their contents upon the stone, saying, according to ancient usage;

'May the all bounteous Author of Nature bless the inhabitants of this place with all the necessities, conveniences and comforts of life—assist in the erection and completion of this building; protect the workmen against accident, and long preserve this structure from decay.—And grant to us all, in needed supply, the CORN of nourishment, the WINE of refreshment, and the OIL of joy!

AMEN!—So mote it be.—AMEN!

The Grand Master then delivered to the Master Workman the various implements of architecture, intrusting him with the superintendence of the work. The Rev. Mr. Sabine, one of the Grand Chaplains, then approached the Stone and offered up the following prayer:

'May the Grand Architect of the Universe grant a blessing on this foundation stone, which we have now laid; and by his Providence enable us to finish this and all our works with skill and success.

Glory be to God in the highest!—
(Response by the Brethren.)

—As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be!—

AMEN!—So mote it be.—AMEN!

JOSEPH JENKINS, Esq. Grand Master, then delivered the following able and interesting ADDRESS, which was listened to with profound silence and attention:

ADDRESS.

It may not be required, but I think we owe it to ourselves and to this audience to explain the motives, which have led to this enterprise; to shew the reasonableness of the undertaking; to declare the objects, which we hope to attain; and if practicable to convince all, that the effort, before us, commends itself to the judgment, the benevolence and the entire approbation of this enlightened and liberal community.

It is seen by the inscription on the plate just now deposited in this corner stone, when, and by whom Free Masonry, which in this country began in Boston, was here established, and by whom it has since been conducted, and inculcated; and it may seem somewhat singular that the Grand Lodge, governed by such men, should have remained so many years without an appropriate building for its own accommodation. But to those who understand the peculiar character of Masonic funds, the fact is readily accounted for.

It may be still more surprising to some, that the present period should be selected for such an enterprise. This too, is capable of very easy explanation.

The Grand Lodge for the last ten years, has been eligibly accommodated in one of the City buildings, and for that space of time at least, having fitted up the building at its own expense, has had no inducement to change its quarters. Recently however, the parts of that building occupied by the Grand Lodge, have been appropriated to the use of the City Government, thus compelling us to seek other accommodations.

For several years there has been a desire expressed by many, to erect a Masonic building in Boston, but from various circumstances there has been no time so favourable as the present for such an undertaking. The price of land has considerably fallen, materials for building are reasonable, and the price of labour is lower than our benevolence would lead us to desire. If any suppose, that, at a season like this, when our institution is somewhat interrupted in its prosperity by the attacks which have been made upon it, and the mischiefs which have befallen it, this is an act of mere desperation and bravado, I am bound to assure them, that nothing is farther from the fact.

Still, as actions always speak louder than words, we are willing that this transaction should speak, and speak the truth too; and that truth is,—that Masons have the most entire confidence in the perpetuity of their institution, in the excellency of its principles and in their adaptedness to the wants and woes of the world.

With these views and sentiments, the Grand Lodge at its quarterly communication in June last, resolved to proceed forthwith to procure a suitable site and to erect thereon an edifice for its own accommodation, and that of other Masonic bodies in Boston.

From the belief that other Societies in the City want accommodations, it has been thought a wise and judicious investment of our funds, to extend the dimensions of our building beyond our own immediate wants. We have felt assured, that the location of the edifice is such, as will command a constant occupancy of such public halls as are needed at the present day. The respectability of the neighborhood, the great convenience of access—the salubrity of air, the inimitable classic beauty of the prospect, in the scenery around, all unite to confirm us, in such an expectation.

The Grand Lodge therefore, enters upon this work with the most confident assurance that its funds (which are sacred to benevolence) invested here, will receive a better income than can be expected from any public stocks now in the market.

In the construction of this building, we shall not indulge our ambition or our folly, in a profusion of useless ornament, and while we desire to erect an edifice, which shall not disgrace our metropolis, or detract from the taste, of those under whose care it is erected,—we intend to maintain a rigid regard to that economy, which the circumstances of the case so imperiously demand.

Thus much I have felt bound to say in reference to the propriety and expediency of this project.

The ceremonies which have now been witnessed, may appear to some, as unmeaning or cabalistical; and though they are all capable of satisfactory explanation, the occasion does not allow me to enter on the task. Suffice it to say, that these ceremonies, like the peculiar titles and badges of our Order, are essentially such as have been transmitted to us from ages long gone by, and if we have a right, we are not much inclined to dispense with or essentially to change them.

The work, in which we are now engaged, although in itself simple and apparently of little moment, in its relations and consequences, is full of interest. It is so to us as Masons.—This is not the ephemeral work of a day, to be forgotten to-morrow. The building we now commence, is to stand a perpetual monument of the wisdom or the folly of those through whose instrumentality it is to be erected. A monument of the utility and excellence or the perfidy and worthlessness of the institution under whose auspices it is reared.

We then, who know the character and design of that institution, must rejoice or tremble as we see those walls arise.

And are we differently constituted from other men? are we not selfish? have we not a regard to our own honor and interest? "Hath not a Mason, "eyes, hands, dimensions, organs, senses, affections, passions; are we not fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons as other men?" And are not our characters at stake, in a transaction, which thus publicly and palpably proclaims our opinions, and our attachment to the principles and objects of this institution?

The transaction is interesting to us as citizens of a free, enlightened and happy community. What language does it speak to those amongst whom we live and move, and have our being, with whom all our interests are blended and identified, from whom we expect every earthly joy and honor, to whom we look to commend our virtues, or to condemn our vices; from whom we expect our only returns in the affections and civilities, and courtesies of life?

The doings of this day, are interesting to us, as fathers, as husbands, as members of our several domestic circles. In view of this, does not every Mason make these inquiries; shall I cast a blot and a stigma upon the character of my family? shall I wound the reputation and peace of the wife of my bosom, the children of my love, the sisters and the brothers of my affection?

Are we Christians,—the event has interests deep and high; they stretch beyond the vale of time and take hold on eternity's hopes and retributions. How does this transaction tell upon the cause of Him, who died to redeem our race from death eternal? Do we here erect a temple for the worship of idols? Do we expect here to inculcate sentiments subversive of Christianity? Is any object to which this building shall be devoted, adapted to impede the progress of that Gospel, which brings peace on earth and good will to man?

These are considerations, which shew, that the event has responsibilities which must weigh upon every man with a power, that will either drive him from the work, or cheer his heart and nerve his arm for the labour before him.

My brethren of the Masonic Fraternity. What do we say, to these considerations; how do we answer these questions?

Permit me to assume your feelings and to give your answer. I trust, that, in a figurative sense at least, we have not begun to build without sitting down first and counting the cost. I trust as we examine our motives, and review our principles, we have no misgivings of conscience, when we put our hand to this work. I trust we are able to give an answer to every reasonable man, that asketh—satisfactory to him, and to ourselves, that our work is honorable and our motives pure.

I feel a pride in declaring in this public manner, that the spirit which has been manifested in the various incipient steps in the projecting of this enterprise, is alone sufficient to convince me, that the great body of the craft under this jurisdiction are firm to their principles, and rejoice in this opportunity of demonstrating to the world, their determination to protect and defend them.

It cannot be necessary, were it proper on this occasion, to go into a consideration of the principles of Free Masonry. They have been stated a thousand times, and all who are disposed, have abundant means of knowing whether they are good or bad. For the present I will assume that these principles are good, and that our institution, in all its legitimate bearings, is happily adapted to our fallen nature.

I will now ask this respected auditory to consider for a moment the peculiar nature of this institution. It is of little moment here to inquire, whether it originated with Solomon King of Israel,—or with a company of bricklayers in London. 'Tis enough for the present to know, that it exists, and that too, in every civilized country on the earth. That it embraces within its pale, men of every class, from the king to the humblest citizen, the only test of character being, that of moral rectitude and a belief in God.

There is no department of human society in all the civilized world, where Masons are not to be found. Its language is the same throughout the world—its obligations are binding on all its members, without regard to nation or language, or any of the adventitious circumstances which effect the various relations and divisions of men.

Probably in all political parties, (except one of modern and monstrous growth, which shall now be nameless,) of whatever contrariety, there are Masons. Look through the parties of our own country: Federalists, Democrats, Administration and Anti-administration, Tariff and Anti-tariff, Jackson men and Clay men, and in them all there are many Masons. Look at the religious sects—The Catholic and the Protestant—The Episcopalian and the Presbyterian—The Orthodox and Universalist—The Baptist and the Methodist—The Trinitarian and the Unitarian, and in them all there are many Masons. Look at the other innumerable associations of men in the world formed for literary, scientific, mechanical and other laudable purposes, and in them all there are many Masons.

I have taken this view—that I may, in a word, simply inquire of my fellow citizens—whether it be possible in the nature of things, that an institution whose members are thus diffused through all the ramifications of human society and human interests, and whose own appropriate associations are ordinarily of every variety of temporal condition, and political and religious sentiment, can ever be made an engine for the subversion of government or the dereliction of the happiness of man?

It would be awarding to us an influence vastly beyond our claims and pretensions—to charge our institution with such results. We are brought then, to the conclusion, that if our principles are pernicious—it is an evil, spread through all the fibres of organized society, an evil which must be borne, until a power stronger than man, shall sweep it from the earth; a curse, which from its very nature, man has not the power to remove or avert. Nor let him undertake the work.

But turn the tables; suppose, as we aver, and are able to demonstrate, that our principles are good, suppose they inculcate charity and philanthropy, suppose they are at war with bigotry and superstition and give no truce, to persecution and proscription, and then estimate if you can, their salutary influence in all these conflicting sects and parties. Compute if you can, the evils averted, or the good actually effected, in all these various relations. In such a society there can be no monopoly, no combination,—

To bless itself, it blessed all mankind;

To curse the world, itself must feel the curse.

In all other associations, not strictly religious, you find men of the same class or profession uniting in their respective societies, the farmer, the mechanic, the physician, the lawyer, the merchant, the manufacturer. We find the community also divided, by common consent, into various classes. All indeed uniting as has recently been most beautifully illustrated*—like the various hues of the rainbow. Not so Freemasonry. It is no sect, it is no party, it is no class,—it forms no distinct stratum, in the iris of human society,—but mingles its light or its darkness, its beauties or its deformities with each and all of them.

But I have said enough.—It remains only that I acknowledge, and I do it with profound respect and most grateful emotions—the marked decorum, and apparent interest manifested by this interesting group of friends and citizens around us. We stand before you as Masons; you know us as men, as friends, and as neighbors. According to our character and deportment, in these relations we expect to be estimated. Judge us by our works; love us for our virtues, condemn us for our vices.

My Brethren, I congratulate you, on the event which has brought us together. It is indeed auspicious in its character, but let me remind you, that it brings with it new obligations and responsibilities,—we have again, before the world, borne testimony to the usefulness of our ancient institution. In this act, we have proffered new vows on the public altar, that our lives shall conform to our principles. We have given new pledges to day, which I trust we are prepared to redeem. I thank you for your obedience to our call, to assist in the ceremonies of the day. May you return to your respective homes in peace, and “may the God of love and peace delight to dwell with you and bless you,” and yours for ever.

*Buckingham's Address before the Mechanic Association.

After the Address the following was sung in ancient style by the assembled brethren, to the tune of ‘Old Hundred.’

Be thou, O God, exalted high,
And as thy glory fills the sky,
So let it be on earth display’d
Till thou art here as there obey’d.

Prayer Book Version.

The Benediction was then pronounced by the venerable and Rev. Dr. Ripley, of Concord, Mass. The procession was again formed, and returned through Tremont street and Cornhill, to the Hall, where the brethren separated.

The Building Committee consists of the following gentlemen, viz. Jos. Jenkins, Esq.; Elijah Morse, Esq.; Hon. Charles Wells; Rev. Dr. Asa Eaton and Capt. Benjamin Smith.

It is estimated that there were from two thousand to twenty-five hundred brethren present. Some gentlemen who took especial pains to count them, state the number at 2267. In the language of a contemporary, ‘there were a great variety of banners and other emblems of Masonry, and the individuals composing the assembly were constituted of our most active, industrious, and respectable citizens both of this and from neighboring towns. On no occasion have we seen a procession uniting a larger portion of citizens distinguished for probity and civic worth.’ There were gentlemen of all ages and all professions. There were twenty-two clergymen, some of whom were upwards of eighty years of age. Seven officers of the Revolution honored the occasion by their presence, besides many civil & naval officers, who are now in active service. Among the most elderly gentlemen, we were pleased to see the Rev. Dr. Ripley, of Concord; Rev. Dr. Harris of Dorchester; Maj. Melville and T. K. Jones, Esq. of this city.

To heighten the charms of the procession and ceremonies, Br. ZEUNER, a distinguished favorite among the professors and amateurs of his delightful art, had prepared a fine March, which, although somewhat long and elaborate, the Brigade Band had committed at short notice, and brought out with admirable effect. On all occasions of this kind, appealing strongly to the emotions and finer sensibilities of our constitution, music is a most important part of the arrangements; and if the character of it be kept in strict harmony with the sentiments awakened by the successive steps in the ceremonies, it enhances indescribably, the intensity and voluptuousness of our sensations. This delightful appropriateness was eminently illustrated in the musical performances of this happy, glorious day. The inspiring martial strain with which we went forth amid the welcome and approving throng of our fellow citizens, to perform, in their presence, a duty to which we were moved by high and honorable considerations—the solemn, gentle melody which accompanied the laying of the corner stone, and the affecting rites by which it was consecrated—and the bold, pealing chords, which saluted the rising Banner of the Grand Lodge, as it was elevated, in token of the consummation of the work—all were finely adapted to the time and circumstances in which they were respectively introduced,—each performance harmonized with and heightened the prevailing emotions of the moment, and conspired with the kindred influences of the occasion to render it a treat to refined taste, as well as cheering to the heart of every worthy Mason.

The Commentator of Saturday has the following just and appropriate remarks. The Knight Templars; though but simple citizens, exhibit in appearance, and we trust in feeling, the spirit of those of old. No matter for names; seek through by-gone ages, and more patriotic and devoted hearts will not be found. When the lance was in its rest, and the proud steed neighed, when the charge was sounded; when the shield protected valiant hearts, in other days, they covered no braver souls or better men, than in the simple garb walked among the procession of Thursday. It was a gladsome sight to view the best of our citizens, notwithstanding the obsequy attempted to be cast on the institution of Freemasonry, coming boldly out, exhibiting on a public occasion their professions and persons.—No procession which ever graced our streets contained more talent, integrity and respectability.—If Antimasonry and Secedism is superior, let them give a public procession, and let us look at them—review them one by one, and enrol their honored names on the pages of our country’s glory. If they shew a better rank, more honest, generous hearts, purer minds, and better principles in their array of strength, let us bow to their superior worth.—Michigan, New-York, Norfolk, and Milton, may bring on their heroes, and Boston produce its pride in its Antimasonic mouth pieces, and the public in all charity shall judge—ay judge with a wish to give the preference to the patriots who wish to break up a band of murderers!! Among the procession we witnessed many whom no one of late had ever conceived to be Masons. The ‘last of the cocked hats’ was there; whose grave is nigh to him, and when he was tottering upon its brink, after a life of honesty, gave the pledge that he was no murderer, and that the principles which he had so long avowed, were pure and honest. The blessing of God was called by one whose life was ripened by old age, and he dared to present his furrows of time to high heaven, and sanction the course he himself had pursued and that professed by the comparatively young flock around him. Is it to be believed that so many and so spotless characters could assemble together and insult deliberately and solemnly their God by the mockery of false, pretended devotion, if they are what political designing men have said of them? That Clergymen, forgetting their duty to their Saviour and themselves, would carry on this impious masquerade?—Is it for a moment to be believed that as a body all of the Masonic Institution ought to be disfranchised from the privileges of citizens? If so let us begin—down with such scoundrels, if they are what men have called them—disfranchise, spit upon, hunt, kill them, like wild beasts of the forest. Else let them retain their situations in the affections of society; let them quietly enjoy the peace of their firesides and the comforts of domestic quietude, and let their slanderers put ‘their hands upon their mouths and their mouths in the dust,’ and keep their peace rather than break the enjoyment of public quiet.

The Transcript holds the following language. We remember no occurrence that has ever elicited so much agreeable disappointment as the very great and respectable number of citizens, of all classes and professions that formed the procession and united in the ceremony. It was a happy omen of the indissoluble ties of social and charitable brotherhood. The croaking raven of political discord was hushed into silence. Almost impenetrable crowds of delighted citizens hovered round the Fraternity in silence and stillness, as if determined to cheer and uphold them. We stated yesterday that the whole number of Masons present was 2,267; this is a matter of fact, and not an idle creation of fancy. It proves one thing worth knowing, if it proves no more, that Massachusetts is a field from which Antimasonry will never reap a harvest."

The different papers in this city have noticed the procession, in a similar manner to the above—in terms of commendation and praise.

MASONIC COLLABORATION AT QUINCY HALL

ON THE FOURTEENTH OCT.

The Procession, formed for laying the Corner-Stone, having returned to Faneuil Hall, and the Grand Lodge having been closed according to ancient usage, it was announced that a Procession of the subscribers to the dinner would be then formed.

At the request of the Committee of Arrangements, consisting of Messrs. Edward A. Raymond, John Hewes, Wm. Parker, Gardner Greenleaf, and Peter Dunbar, the Grand Master, Joseph Jenkins, Esq. consented to preside; and the following gentlemen assisted as Vice Presidents, viz: Elijah Morse, Esq., Hon. Benjamin Russell, Hon. Benjamin Whitman, William Hilliard, Esq., Hon. Charles Wells, Charles Henshaw, Esq., and Henry Purkitt, Esq.

A Procession, consisting of about four hundred members of the Masonic Fraternity, was formed, and proceeded to the spacious and elegant Hall over the centre of the New-Market, where the tables were laid for their accommodation. Rev. Dr. Ripley asked a blessing before sitting down; and to that voice every heart responded its amen, in thanksgiving for the happy termination of the business of the day, and the favorable circumstance that brought so many together, to partake of the bounties of that Great Being to whose providential care they owed that happy hour. It was indeed a happy hour—when the congratulations of friends renewed the remembrances of duty—when all sectional and party feelings were forgotten, and friendship shed its brightest halo around that happy assembly. There, was the elasticity and buoyancy of youth—there, the firmness of manhood—there, the wisdom and experience of age. The grey head of the veteran soldier of the revolution, the hoary locks of Fathers in Masonry, were proud memorials to the younger members of the Fraternity, that the bond of their union has not been weakened by time, nor the harmony of social feelings interrupted by force of circumstances.

The intellectual pleasures of the day received the tributary accession of the cheerfulness of the festive board. For the ample provision and good taste with which the tables were spread, great credit is due to Mr. AMHERST EATON, of Concert Hall, who provided so well at so short a notice. For the promptitude and regularity of the arrangements, the most unqualified praise is due to the Committee.

The tables having been dismissed by Rev. Mr. Maffitt, the company sat down to reciprocate their sentiments in 'thoughts that breathe and words that burn,'—to call up the greatness of their fathers for their example—the memories of the illustrious dead for emulation—the virtues of the illustrious living for their encouragement.

The following regular and volunteer toasts were given on the occasion, viz:

REGULAR SENTIMENTS.

1st. The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts.

2d. The Masonic Institution.—The rains may descend, and the floods come, and the winds blow and beat upon it, and it will not fall; for it is founded upon the Rock of TRUTH.

3d. Washington and his Masonic brethren of the Revolution.—The proudest relationship of American freemen.

4th. The contemplated Temple.—In the language of Washington, may it prove "through all ages, a sanctuary for brothers, and a Lodge for the Virtues."

5th. The President of the United States.

6th. Freemasonry.—The handmaid of civil Liberty—the dread of Tyrants.

7th. The Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

8th. Our visiting Brethren from other States.—Masonry recognises no geographical lines in its predilections—no boundaries to truth and integrity.

9th. Ben Franklin the Printer—Ben Franklin the Patriot—Ben Franklin the Western Philosopher—honest old Ben Franklin the Mason. Let a tear be mingled with the wine that flows for him; 'tis a meet emblem of a Mason's love. Franklin, the tear is thine!

10th. The Mayor of the city of Boston.

11th. Lafayette.—The Hero of three revolutions—the friend of the rights of Man—a firm defender of Masonry.

12th. Masons throughout the world.—May they all worship in the universal Temple dedicated to fidelity.

By Joseph Jenkins, Esq. President of the day.—The Lodges of Massachusetts—a constellation in the Masonic hemisphere—moving in order and harmony—true to its common centre—emitting in triple radiance, light, truth and beneficence.

Mr. RUSSELL (a Past Grand Master and one of the Vice Presidents,) being called upon by the Chair for a toast, rose, and after alluding to the recollections which pressed upon the mind in seeing the Relict of Washington, which was borne in the Procession of the Day, in a gold urn; and the admonition given to the Fraternity by LAFAYETTE, who, in his last visit to Boston, exhorted them to preserve unimpaired the great principles of their order, for that 'where Masonry was, there was Liberty and Benevolence,' proposed the following toast, which was received by reiterated cheers:—

'The immortal memory of our departed brother WASHINGTON, and the immortal fame of our living brother LAFAYETTE. An Institution cherished, sustained and illuminated by such Suns, need feel but little concern should some fleeting clouds occasionally pass over it.

JUDGE WHITMAN, one of the Vice Presidents, having been called on for a sentiment, rose and observed:—Most Worshipful Grand Master. It is now almost forty years since I was invested with the insignia of the office of Master of a Lodge in the country, by our late worthy Grand Master CUTLER, (then the first Grand Master, after the union of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts,) and I now have the pleasure to see on my right, a worthy and respected brother Mason, [alluding to the Hon. Benjamin Russell] who was present and assisted in that ceremony. I was then young, I am now old, yet I am, by this incident, reminded of the declaration of the Wise Man, 'I have never seen the righteous forsaken, or his seed begging bread.' Believing as I do, that the principles of Freemasonry, are founded on our duties, revealed to us, in our holy religion; and never having known any ill effects, the legitimate consequences of the principles and obligations of Freemasons; but on the contrary, much good to society, from the practice of their virtues, and knowing also it is commanded of us 'to do good to them that hate us'—with your leave, I will say,

Our Antimasonic Brethren—How then shall they call on him, in whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in him, of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher?

By Hon. Charles Wells, one of the Vice Presidents.—Our old familiar Masonic lesson—Let not interest, favor nor prejudice, bias our integrity, or influence us, to be guilty of a dishonorable action.

By Deac. Hilliard, one of the Vice Presidents.—Charles the Tenth, the late King of France, and the Dey of Algiers.—Two practical pirates, the former upon the liberty of the press, the latter upon the highway of nations—may they both learn from long and wholesome experience, that man is born to be free.

By Charles Henshaw, one of the Vice Presidents. The leaders of a party that shall here be nameless—Like Whitehall boatmen, who look one way, and row another.

By Henry Purkitt, Esq. one of the Vice Presidents. The enemies of our Order—May they be as zealous to reform themselves as they are to destroy the second Institution on earth.

By Edward A. Raymond, one of the Committee of arrangements.—The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts. The elder sister of a noble parentage. She stands unmoved and unscathed amid the storms and fires of faction.

By John Hewes, one of the Committee of arrangements. The Temple.—May the strength and beauty of the contemplated Temple, be a symbol of the durability and loveliness of the principles of Freemasonry:—Dedicated to Friendship and Charity, long may it rear its turrets over the heads of its votaries.

By William Parker, one of the committee of arrangements.—Masonry. Its object, to improve the social virtues; cultivate and mature the principles of friendship; promote the felicity of the family of man, and lessen the mass of human woe.

By Gardner Greenleaf, one of the Committee of arrangements.—Andrew Jackson. A bright star in the Galaxy of Masonry—may the setting be as serene as the rising was glorious.

By Col. P. Dunbar, one of the Committee of arrangements. Gen. Lafayette and Gen. Jackson. Brother Soldiers, Brother Patriots, and Brother Masons. Heroes in a holy cause—the amelioration of mankind!—Bright stars in the galaxy of Masonry. Long may such Luminaries shed their pure rays upon our Art.

By Joseph Jenkins, Esq.—on leaving the Chair.—The bright hopes of this day.—Our characters shall never eclipse them.

The Grand Master having retired, Elijah Morse, Esq. Dep. G. Master, rose and gave the following sentiment.

The M. W. Grand Master.—A firm, undeviating and successful advocate of the principles of the Masonic Institution, and a bright example of strict virtue and pure patriotism.

By A. A. Dame, Esq. S. Grand Warden.—The memory of Franklin and Warren.—Their actions in life, form the best commentary upon their principles as Masons.

By Wm. J. Whipple, Esq. J. G. Warden.—The Temple, whose corner stone has this day been laid.—Future ages shall see it standing a proud and enduring monument of the excellence of our Institution, when the names of its present opposers shall have been forgotten, or remembered but to be pitied.

By John J. Loring, Esq. Grand Treasurer.—The Corner Stone.—May it sustain a building whose cement shall be brotherly love—whose beauty shall be charity.

Thomas Power, Esq.—being called on, rose and stated that in the course of his official duties, as Grand Secretary, he had received a letter from a venerable and highly respected brother, which with the permission of the Chair, he would read as introductory to a sentiment.

Worcester, Mass. Oct. 12, 1890.

Brother Power,

I have received your Circular, inviting me to attend the Grand Lodge on the 14th inst. 'to unite in the ceremonies of Laying the Corner Stone of a Masonic Temple.' It would afford me much pleasure to comply with the invitation, but my infirmities have been, for the last four months, such as not to permit me to leave home. I am much gratified that my Masonic Brethren have determined to build an Edifice which has long been wanted for their convenience. May the blessing of Heaven be, and abide on, the Masonic Family, and prosper all their laudable endeavors for the promotion of Benevolence, Morality and Religion, which compose the true basis of Freemasonry; of this Truth, may all reasonable members of the human family, who are now opposed to the institution, be speedily convinced.

I am with due respect for the Grand Master, and the Grand Lodge, theirs, and your, aged Masonic Brother,

I. THOMAS.

Aged nearly 82 years

T. Power, Esq. G. Sec'y. of G. Lodge."

Isaiah Thomas, Esq.—The oldest living Past Grand Master of Masons in Massachusetts.—Although the frosts of eighty two winters have gathered on his head, they have not chilled the early affections that clustered round his heart.

By Robert Lash, Commanding officer pro tem. of the Grand Encampment. The prospect before us. Under the smiles of a benign Providence, a clouded canopy will be succeeded by a beautiful sky.

By the Rev. Asa Eaton, D. D. The Members of the Masonic Fraternity. 'By well doing they will put to silence the ignorance of foolish men.'

By the Rev Paul Dean. Those brethren, who, in the days of trial, have proved themselves faithful to each other and to the cause of virtue; adversity has only cemented their friendship and strengthened their fidelity; and, when the tempest and the darkness are past, on them may the brightest sun of prosperity arise and the gentlest dews of heaven descend to refresh and bless them forever.

By Rev. Luther Hamilton—one of the D. D. G. Masters. Clergymen who have renounced Masonry.—May they yet learn from the rebuke of an intelligent community, that the religion that is without virtue, without honour, without charity, is worthless.

Mr. Samuel Ellis, being called on for a sentiment, rose and said:

"I will beg leave to preface the sentiment I shall offer, with a very few observations on its application to the present occasion. It is the custom of the festive board, (hallowed by example,) to mingle the memory of the past with the delightful associations of the present, and while assembled to commemorate memorable events—to conjure up in the enchantment of imagination, the mighty spirits that have gone before us—commune with them of the heroic actions of other days, and hold them up to our generation as living monuments for present example.

In humble imitation of this reverend custom, permit me to call your attention to the intimate connexion of civil liberty with Masonry. Among no people has this coincidence been so strongly illustrated as among us. With the nations of the old world, the rise or decline of Masonry has been graduated by the political condition of the people; and the ratio of despotism always measured by the persecutions of the order. But with us, the revolutionary record of those who periled all in the great cause of liberty, bears ample testimony of the influence of Masonry. There yet live those, (about to be gathered to the tombs of their fathers,) who can tell with glistening eye and heroic exultation, of the days when the Warrens, and the Hancocks of '76, met under the veil and sanction of Masonry, to digest and mature those mighty movements of opinion, pregnant with the liberties of unborn millions.

That consecrated height, where public virtue is slowly raising its chaste monument to patriotism, even there the blood of a brother was offered up, as the first living sacrifice on that primeval altar of liberty, and now cries from the ground, "My sons scorn to be slaves." Not a battle of that perilous period of our history, but the blood of our brethren was poured out like water in the cause; not a battle was fought; not a trophy was gained; no deeds of fame blazoned on the face of our national escutcheon; but the name of a Mason was mingled with its remembrance, and the memory of its effects embalmed in the evergreen gratitude of the fraternity.

At the darkest period of that eventful time, when the dispirited remnant of our patriot army was encamped at Valley Forge—when famine and the elements held undisputed dominion over the iron nerves of men—when misery and want, with its haggard train, had conquered hearts that never cowered before a foe,—in that dark hour did the leaders of that diseased and disheartened army, assemble in their Travelling Lodge, and nightly, in christian charity, provide means to cover and feed a naked and famished soldiery; in that moment of peril to join in one union of supplication to him who holds the destiny of nations in his hands, that he would not forsake an oppressed people, struggling for their liberty. 'Twas to men like these that, in that dark hour, the destinies of this great people were confided! How well they performed the mighty work—how deeply their spirits were imbued with the love of republicanism, the record of our country's glory fully testifies.

Indeed, sir, did the time and the occasion call for it, an array of facts might be brought to prove the intimate connexion of Masonry with civil liberty; honourable alike to the institution and its principles. The late revolution in France, effected almost individually by our own, our favoured La Fayette, acting in the maturity of age, upon those principles first inculcated by the Masons of America, is one of the strongest exemplifications of the influences of our order.

It is not in the spirit of exultation, that I would call up this array of our departed brethren, nor would I claim the exclusive monopoly of the honour of these illustrious actions to Masons. Others have performed well their parts in this great drama of events. I would rather recur to them, as pointing out to us an illustrious example for imitation, as what posterity would demand of us in an hour of like peril and danger.

Fortunately, the enviable situation in which we stand as a people, demands only of us, that we shall bequeath, unimpaired, the rich inheritance of freedom to posterity; that we should practice rather on the mild virtues of society, than mingle in the wild contentions of civil or political warfare. But should the day arrive in which the liberties of our native land should be invaded by foreign power, or domestic tyranny, I feel that the Masonic body would form an impenetrable barrier against the assaults of despotism—would stand like Spartans in the Thermopylae of freedom, offering their life-blood to secure the rich inheritance, and should one recreant be found, to shun the peril of that hour, his brethren of less favoured lands, would write his epitaph in letters of adamant,—

He lived a Coward and he died a Slave!

Allow me to give as a toast,

The memory of our illustrious brethren, who have devoted their lives to the cause of civil and religious Liberty.

By Lemuel Shattuck, D. D. G. M. 5th District.—The Citizens of Boston.—They understand their constitutional rights too well, to be instructed by foreign teachers.

The Hon. John Abbot, Past Grand Master, being prevented by ill health from participating in the festivities at the table, sent in the following sentiment.

Friendship among Freemasons.—A chain, the increasing use of which is constantly giving increasing strength and brightness.

By D. Baxter, jr. Esq. one of the Marshals of the day. —Our Brother La Fayette.—"Acting under the influence of Masonic oaths," he discharges the "duties of an important office in the gift of the people."

By H. Gray, one of the Marshals.—Centennial, Triennial, Masonic, and all other celebrations, which promote love of country, and strengthen the cords which bind us to our fellow men.

On the announcement of the 8th regular toast, B. H. Norton rose, and stated that, as a member of the Grand Chapter of Connecticut, he considered himself called on to reciprocate the sentiment just pronounced. He gave,

The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts. A brilliant star in the East—from it, emanates light and truth—to it, our dispersed Brethren look for guidance and direction.

By John R. Bradford, one of the Marshals.—Our Institution.—When Charity ceases to be a Virtue, and Virtue is no longer estimable, we may then think of abandoning it.

By J. Eveleth, Esq. Toast Master.—Washington, Franklin and Warren. All good Masons venerate their virtues, and cherish, with the liveliest emotions of gratitude, the remembrance of their services and their sacrifices.

By Edwin Sevey, one of the Marshals.—Don Miguel of Portugal. The Usurper and Tyrant in politics—the Bigot and Hypocrite in religion; and, of course, the enemy and persecutor of Masons.

By Simon W. Robinson, one of the Marshals.—Freemasonry. Sustained by the immutable laws of Justice and Truth; it has nothing to fear from the machinations of disappointed office-seekers and political jugglers.

By E. Hobart, one of the Marshals.—Masonic Ties. Our whole duty to God and to man; while such sacred obligations rest on the Fraternity, the depraved must accede.

By the Rev. John L. Blake.—Let Masons duly respect themselves—let them duly respect their institution; and it will command the respect of all those whose respect is worth possessing!

By T. W. Phillips, Esq.—The memory of Dewitt Clinton—the glory of New-York; a benefactor to his Country, and one of the brightest lights in the firmament of Masonry.

By Henry J. Finn, Esq. after having favored the company with a song.—Antimasonic intelligence. Important, if true!

By Wm. Knapp, Esq.—The tutelary divinity of our Craft; whose eye is the lustre of the evening star; whose voice is the sweetness of the seraph's harp; who should be invoked by the good and wise to sit on our altars, hallow our mysteries, temper the warrior's sword, pass between the proud man and his revenge: and finally to make a permanent temple of every Mason's heart. The mild spirit of charitable forgiveness.

By John K. Simpson, Esq.—The Masonic Republic. In which personal worth, and individual merit, alone constitute the claims to preferment.

By Maj. Jackson, of Newton, (a Revolutionary Officer.)—May the Masonic Temple be completed in these troublesome times, as the last Temple at Jerusalem was. May we not mourn as the Jews did, if it is not so beautiful as the first; and may it be honoured, as that was, in a spiritual sense, by our Saviour, until the members shall be admitted into that Temple not made with hands.

By J. V. Browne. Independence. That construction of our nature which prompts us to maintain our principles, adopted upon 'mature deliberation.'

By John Nichols.—The Duke of Sussex, G. Master of Masons in Great Britain.

By A. H. Ward, Esq.—Seceding Masons. May they have God for their friend.

By A. Buttrick.—THE MASONS OF MASSACHUSETTS. Distinguished for their firmness, their patriotism and their intelligence.

By Robert Keith.—A good Mason—He who best sustains the ordinary relations of life: A faithful friend—a kind neighbor—a patriotic citizen—an honest man.

By Nabum Capen.—Influence of Freemasonry.—In the language of the 16th century—Not so much calculated 'to make bad menne gude as gude menne gudder.'

By E. M. Cunningham.—The three great Lights of Masonry.—Lights in this world and guides to Heaven.

By J. P. Robinson.—Masonry.—Its lights have ever shone bright; they will continue brighter and brighter until the perfect day.

By C. W. Moore.—The Solomon of our Temple.—May he ever find a Hiram ready to assist him, whether it be in raising a Temple from the dust, or the unfortunate from adversity.

Our Fair opponents!—Wandering angels in search of paradise, who have been led from their starry track to follow an ignis fatuus through the labyrinths of error. May they soon return to their first love.

Lafayette.—The friend and patron of Freemasonry.—'In war, a tiger chafed by the hunter's spear; in peace, more gentle than the unweaned lamb.'

The Institution.—A Blessing to Society, the dispenser of Charity to its unfortunate worthy members, their widows and orphans.

Our aged and Venerable Brethren, who honored this day with their presence—A peaceful exit from this world of trouble, when it shall please Providence to call them hence, and an eternal rest in bliss in the world of spirits.

La Fayette.—He has controlled the destinies of a great nation. He is an undeviating supporter of our free institution.

The President of the United States.—Although we may not all approve his politics, we do all approve his Masonic firmness.

Washington.—The benefactor of man—the father of his country—a Master of Masonry.

The only political creed known in Freemasonry.—"Patiently to submit to legal authority, and to conform with cheerfulness to the laws and constitution of the government under which we live."

Our Brethren who bled in the war of Independence. A few of them are with us this day, the bones of many of them are mouldering in the battle grounds of our country wherever duty calls, there ever has been, is now and ever will be found members of our fraternity.

Our friends not of the Masonic Order.—May they never have cause to withdraw their confidence.

The Great Masonic Hive.—May there be fewer drones; less buzzing, and more honey.

Br. Monroe, of Cambridge, favored the company with an original song: the two first verses of which, only, we recollect.

While seated round the festive board,
Attun'd to social glee,
'Twere shame to want one generous chant
To Old Freemasonry:
To Old Freemasonry, my dears,
To Old Freemasonry:
'Twere shame to want one generous chant
To old Freemasonry.

The joys that cluster in the bowl,
Or beam from beauty's eye,
Let others praise; our voice we raise,
To Old Freemasonry.
To Old &c.

It was truly gratifying to see in our ranks on this occasion, such venerable men as Majors Melville, Purkitt and Russell of Boston; Hon. Mr. Hart, of Reading; Major Jackson, of Newton, and Rev. Dr. Ripley, of Concord;—all of whom were engaged in our revolutionary struggle. The time would fail us to enumerate the active men of business who acknowledged their connexion with the craft on this joyous day. It seems but justice to name especially, the Rev. Dr. Harris, of Dorchester, who for forty years has been devoted to the best interests of the institution, and has given much of his valuable time in compiling our Book of Constitutions. His appearance at this time, adds another claim to his many others, upon the friendship and esteem of the younger members of the Masonic family. The letter, from that patriarch and father of American Printers, Isaiah Thomas, of Worcester, which was read at the Dinner in Quincy Hall, a copy of which is in our columns of this day, was truly refreshing. Our readers have an opportunity of reading his deliberate opinion of the character of the institution.

That the Fourteenth of October was a proud day for Masonry, we all feel and acknowledge. Our predominant feeling is that of deep felt and sincere gratitude, that so many aged and respectable citizens were spared so long, and disposed to stand to, and abide by, this persecuted, but not forsaken association. Let us all renew our resolutions to sustain its respectability by a manly and upright course of conduct on all occasions; abstaining from all vindictive and acrimonious attack upon our enemies and slanderers—acting merely upon the defensive, and never carrying the war into the enemy's country, unless compelled in justifiable self-defence.

To Masons in other parts of our state and country we would say: Boston is safe; the tempest has past over us; its fury is spent.—Antimasonry, after vainly attempting to carry its banner to the polls, has been signally defeated.

After witnessing the attempt of this combination to control the nominations of the National Republican party in this city; after seeing them postpone the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President of the U. S. until September 1831, who can doubt that Antimasonry is the cloak of some ambitious spirits, who are striving to "raise the whirlwind" and intend to ride upon the storm. Most of those who are drawing in its traces, are tools in the hands of designing men, behind the scenes, who pull the wires and make the puppets dance.—Time will unravel their doings and shew this political party in its naked deformity. The path of duty to us is plain;—a steady, persevering; but silent attention to the just claims of the institution upon our time and our influence;—a readiness to adapt the institution, in non essentials, (but never upon compulsion,) after deliberation and concert, to the present state of society in this republican community.—As to the edifice about to be erected, permit us to hope that a chaste and substantial style of building may be adopted, and a rigid but judicious economy strictly adhered to.

Finally, Brethren, associated with men like Washington, Franklin, Warren, Clinton, Brooks, and Bigelow, among the departed, and with men like La Fayette, John Marshall, Charles Jackson and Samuel S. Wilde, among the living, what have we to fear from the clamorous of factious demagogues! Let the watch words be, steady and firm; and the course of the Institution will be, must be, ONWARD!

THE PROCESSION.

The crowd presses onward! as ocean's broad wave

Rushing forward to gain its deep shore:

But it was not the fame of the warrior brave,

Nor the sad, parting honors that rest on the grave

For the loved one that bears us no more.

They come! Firm and silent the column moves on;

Not a bugle-note swells on the ear:

Each face spoke of bitter reproach they had borne,

But each heart felt the joy of a victory won;

Each felt that his triumph was near.

Still silent, and grateful, and tearful they move;

Their confident trust is on high:

Youth, manhood and age there unitedly prove

How deep and sincere is a Mason's first love!

How he feels for the friends that are nigh!

Hark! The drum's measured accent now floats on the ear.

And the trumpet's shrill note breaks the spell;

See, the banner of beauty salutes the gay fair

And strength is abroad, and grave wisdom is there,

Of their faith and their hope there to tell.

Soft charity too, with her mild, glistening eye,

Was there, when the pageant passed on:

She prayed for her enemies to the Most High;

She asked for all blessing's beneath that mild sky,

When she thought of the days that were gone.

'Tis passed! 'Twas a lovely, bright vision that fled

From the gaze of a brother, a friend!

How blest, there to mingle the thoughts of the dead

With the fame of the living, whose virtues there shad

Their mild light on life's object and end!

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

From the Union Village N. Y. Courant.

We have heretofore had occasion to advert to the impudence, the unblushing effrontery of antimasonry, which in the face of constant and unvarying refutation, continues to insult the public understanding with the most improbable tales of Masonic murder, outrage, abduction, etc. We had hopes, slight it is true, that experience would have taught the conductors of the antimasonic press policy, if not decency, and a proper respect for the understandings of their fellow citizens; but we have been miserably deceived: we had not argued rightly from the premises presented to us by this proscriptive body, who, we are sorry to say it, appeared to be 'led by the nose more than by the understanding;' and who, knowing that mad intolerance and utter recklessness with regard to means, are the predominant features of their party, yet combined to act as the degraded panders to a foul and vitiated appetite, which is not satisfied even when gorged to bursting with the nauseous food of slander, vituperation and mendacity. Our charity, our good opinion of human nature, has deceived us; and we are now compelled to listen to another tale, 'of masonic vengeance,' of 'daring outrage,' and unexampled villany, got up as a political bug-bear to frighten the people out of the free exercise of their right of suffrage,—another 'good enough Morgan till after election.'

The Champion, which has the merit of being, to the best of its ability, a most faithful slave to antimasonry, has given us a most doleful account, with a promise of further particulars, of an unsuccessful attempt to take the life of Elder Witherell, of Hartford, a seceding Mason, on the night of the 27th, ult. The outrage is charged directly upon the Masonic Fraternity, upon what evidence, Satan and Erastus D. Clover and the two officious committees of Hartford and Fort-Ann can tell. Our information corresponds with that of the Champion, so far as it respects the fact that, in Elder Witherell's absence, two persons entered the house, in the night, his wife being alone in bed—that they uttered as she said some threats against him on account of his perjury—and having heroically inflicted one or more wounds upon the headboard of his bed, retreated in good order, before the superior prowess of 'young Witherell.' For the truth of the above statement we have no better warrant than common fame and the antimasonic Champion, two sources the information drawn from which, is generally considered apocryphal. But admitting the facts, as stated to be true, have we any evidence of the agency of Masonry in the transaction? Or have we not reason rather to view it as a mock attempt at assassination by the Anties themselves, made on the eve of an election, for the purpose of cheating republicans out of their votes? Elder Witherell renounced Masonry, because he was forced to it by the antimasonic part of his church.—The moderation of his published sentiments was any thing but satisfactory to the Anties, and created for him not a single enemy among the Masons. What Mason then could wish to take his life, more especially at this particular juncture? No man of common sense could for a moment believe that one could be found so lost to political prudence, even though his humanity had become a nonentity.

It was a very easy matter for a pair of antimasons, knowing Elder Witherell to be absent, to enter his sleeping apartment in disguise using, such language as Masons might be supposed to use on such an occasion, make a feigned attempt to assassination, and charge it upon the Masonic Fraternity, for the purpose of turning in upon them the current of popular indignation. This we sincerely believe to be the fact—no unprejudiced man, acquainted with the antimasonic party, believes otherwise. 'At the dead hour of night,' two Anties perform the farce and depart—neither Mrs. Witherell, nor 'young Witherell,' give any alarm till about the regular hour of rising next morning. An alarm was raised and circulated—an antimasonic meeting held—S. D. Brown and S. S. Cowen, Esqs. are sent to assist in developing the 'dark affair'—the deputation is heard to say, 'we hope they will refuse to come; it will be all the better for us;' which being told those gentlemen, they do refuse, to the great gratification of the Anties, as affording them a matter of accusation against two as respectable men, and magistrates as any in the State. The mighty mountain, after all its travail, brings forth nothing but a contemptible mouse. Fort Ann, that sink of antimasonic corruption and iniquity, not thinking the Anties of Hartford capable of managing their own affairs, next takes up the matter—sends a committee on a pilgrimage to Hartford, who to give the transaction some color of importance abroad, offer 'a reward of $250 for the detection of the offenders;' and sent off the determined-to-be-notorious Erastus D. Calver, who arrives in this village at 'a dead hour of the night,' with despatches for the Champion; and here the matter rests, save that the aforesaid despatches are to be published, and an excitement got up; which is to be maintained, by all means, till after election.

Are not such an act and such proceedings in full and perfect keeping with the spirit Antimasonry, and the practice of his adherents? Is it not well known that they depend on votes for success, and on excitement for votes; thus insulting the people with the imputation that they are not of sufficient judgment to know how to vote on principle, and are only to be frightened to the polls by tales of horror, as children are seated into obedience to the will of the nursery maid, by stories of 'raw head and bloody bones?' Has it not been their constant practice, on the eve of elections, and so near the day of trial as to preclude the possibility of refutation, before the intended effect was produced, to fabricate and promulgate some thrilling tale of 'Masonic murder'—some hair erecting account of 'Masonic vengeance,' outrage, or violence? And though exposure the most full and ample has followed the footsteps of their imposition, yet do they not pertinaciously adhere to their course, laugh in their sleeve at the dupes of their knavery, and offer the incense of adulation to the ingenuity which supplied them with a 'good enough Morgan till after election?' They do all this and much more; and yet to the disgrace of American dignity, their designing leaders have found meanness enough in the country to compose a suitable retinue, to follow the car of their ambition. We are sorry to be obliged to bring such a charge against our country; but our duty requires it of us. We would gladly hold up to other nations, the whole population of our country, as possessing that high and noble spirit, which animated the authors of our independence; but, alas! we cannot do it. We are obliged, in humility to confess that a faction exists in this free country, that can stoop to mean and contemptible devices, for political purposes, which would spread a scarlet hue on the face of a negro slave! and that we have amongst us, men to whom the possession of wealth and talents cannot be denied, who are so entirely lost to principle, as to 'crook the pliant hinges of the knee' to this scurrilous mob; flatter it with a disgusting humility; kiss the 'great toe' of its insane power; and extend the suppliant hand of beggary to receive the alms of its suffrages, in the hope of regaining power justly forfeited, or withheld on account of their corrupt principles. Heavens! that we should have such a tale to tell! and that tale, too, a shameful reality!

'Then what is man! and what man seeing this,
And having human feelings, doth not blush,
And hang his head, to call himself a man!'

And have we no remedy for the disease in the body social? We have. A sovereign antidote exists in the democratic republican party of the country; one, which, when properly applied, has never failed to effect a cure in the disorders of the state. It is now needed—the time is at hand for its application:—apply it then; and let it circulate through every vein of all the state, that where its power is felt, the people may also feel its mercy, in the extinction of antimasonry.

[From the Western Courier, Ohio.]

TO THE METHODISTS OF PORTAGE COUNTY

Dear Brethren:—

I have been a Mason many years, and expect, while I live, to remain one. I know of no reason why I should not. The assertion that Masonry and religion cannot exist together, exhibits a zeal without knowledge. It shows the weakness, or wickedness of the one who makes it.

Dear Brethren, is it reasonable that I should renounce Masonry? If I do I must renounce principles dearer than life, and sentiments that I would not renounce for the wealth of India. Evangelos tells us of a great number of professed ministers of the gospel, that have renounced, abandoned, and denounced Masonry, as, at best, a worthless Institution. Would you, dear brethren, be willing that our holy religion should be judged, and condemned by the same rule? Would you be willing that our church should be tried by the declarations of seceding members? I have known Methodist ministers, and members who have seceded, and disclaimed against our church, with as much bitterness as seceding Masons do against Masonry—but no candid person would judge us by their testimony. I know there are many of us, Masons, who do not live as we ought—but the honest in heart will not charge their failings, short-comings, and imprudences to the fault of the Institution. So with religion. No one charges religion with the faults of its professors—but rather charge them with a want of it.

There is one thing which is evident—which it requires neither philosophy, nor inspiration to understand—that a man, whether minister or not, who has been a Mason year after year, while popularity attended it, and who, when persecution arises abandons it, and speaks all manner of evil against it, was, either first, or last, destitute of principle—and would renounce his religion in times of similar persecution on account of his religious faith.

Dear brethren, my desire is that you examine these things prayerfully, that you may discover from whence arose the present divisions in the Methodist church. Has it been made by those of us who are Masons? Have those of us who are Masons, excited, or stirred up strife?

Or have we not rather been the advocates of peace! If the antimethodists insist on a division in the church, the question is who shall leave it—those who have lived peaceable members, and avoided giving offence, or those who have kindled the flames of persecution?

I feel that Evangelos has flung a stigma on the Methodists—that will not be easily wiped away. We shall be— we ought to be, closely watched by genuine republicans, while such aristocracy remains in the church, and the flames of discord are blown by Methodist ministers.

For the honor of the church, and that the stigma may be attached to the proper person, I hope if Evangelos continues his unhallowed, uncharitable, antichristian, and antirepublican course, that he will come out under his own name, and not like a savage hurl his poisoned missiles from behind an ambush.

EPHRAIM WOOD.

Streetsborough, Oct. 1, 1830.

ANTIMASONIC CONSISTENCY.

It is well known to our readers and the public generally, that Elijah Gray and James Gray, were some time since convicted and sentenced to be hung, for the murder of Samuel Davis, of Le Roy, in January last. It is equally well known in this vicinity, that after their conviction and before their sentence, a petition was drawn up and circulated by a son of Elijah Gray, the old man, for his unconditional pardon, not for a commutation of his punishment. This petition was widely circulated, and contained, as we are informed, for we never saw the petition, a great number of names. This petition was sent to the governor. The governor has exercised the clemency vested in him, as executive, by the laws of the state, so far as to commute his punishment from that of death, to confinement in the state prison for life.

Now what has been the effect of this exercise of the executive clemency? No sooner is it known, than it is attempted to be turned to political account. And by whom is this attempted? It is sought by a set of men, who, of all others, should have been silent on this occasion. The Warsaw Sentinel, a whole hog antimasonic paper printed in this county, in speaking of the commutation of Gray's punishment, puts forth the following low and contemptible assertion—'it may have been thought that a knowledge of executive clemency, would be favorable to the prospects of a certain candidate for the office of governor.' Such language is contemptible and mean. Cannot a man exercise the functions of his office, and particularly in a case of this kind, without an attempt to use it to his political disadvantage? Supposing governor Throop had refused, either to pardon or commute his punishment? What would have been the language of these same men? Why, they would have said at once that he acted from the impulse of political considerations—that Gray being a Judas, therefore he would not pardon or commute his punishment.

Who are the men that petitioned, not for a commutation of his punishment, but for a full and free pardon? That the public may judge with what justice this clamor against the executive clemency, is set forth by antimasons, we will state a few of their names. John Wilder, Esq. antimasonic sheriff of the county of Genesee—Nathan Townsend, antimasonic under-sheriff and gaoler—David C. Miller, antimasonic county clerk—Robert Earl, jr. a Judas Mason, and judge of this county.

Now, after all this, will it be said that the governor acted from political motives? What had he to expect from these men? He well knew, if, indeed, the thought entered his mind when in the discharge of his duty, that they were his rank and bitter enemies; and the act could not, therefore, benefit him in the least. 'Oh how this world is given to lying.'—Batavia Times.

During the balloting in the House of Assembly for speaker, we noticed one thing. It was passing strange. After several unsuccessful balloting, for speaker, Mr. Smith, the antimasonic candidate declined, and the consistent anties then immediately voted for Mr. Bates, a Royal Arch Mason!—Vermont paper.

ANTIMASONIC SYMPHONIES.

NO VI.

A FAVORITE SONG.

TUNE.—'The Belfast Fisherman.'

Sam Anderton, my Jo, Sam,
You've played a noble part,
And proved yourself well skilled at least,
In Anties' real art;
Tho' they do say, 'bout other things
You very little know,
That's better for our purposes.
Sam Anderton, my Jo.

Sam Anderton, my Jo, Sam,
You've taken many a fish,
But gudgeons, Sam, are not the kind
That gentlefolks do wish;
They cannot well digest them, Sam,
Tho' doctors say they'll go,
And their flavor is not just the thing,
Sam Anderton, my Jo.

Sam Anderton, my Jo, Sam,
When you went to the banks,
You was a mere tail-cutter, Sam,
For that you owed your thanks—
They wouldn't trust you, so you went
On your own hook, you know;
And a pretty mess of fish you made,
Sam Anderton, my Jo.

Sam Anderton, my Jo, Sam,
It must have made you stare,
When you got into Marblehead
And found the doctors there;
They dosed you with a carious pill
To bring you down so low!
But I hope you will be better yet,
Sam Anderton, my Jo.

Sam Anderton, my Jo, Sam,
If you'd been at the Hall,
Heard Ward and Dexter try to speak,
And heard the people bawl,
'Mong all your dreadful sights you'd sworn
It was the greatest show:
Much greater than the Irish farce,
Sam Anderton, my Jo.

Sam Anderton, my Jo, Sam,
I wonder how you dared
To tell so bold a lie, Sam,
As you on oath declared!
They sent 'way out to Belfast, Sam,
To learn if it was so;
And they've caught you napping on the truth,
Sam Anderton, my Jo,

Sam Anderton, my Jo, Sam,
If you're a prudent man
You'll never tell another lie,
Nor drain another can;
For when they find you beastly drunk
The wicked Masons crow;
But they can't degrade you as to truth,
Sam Anderton, my Jo.

Sam Anderton, my Jo, Sam,
Let's take a parting drink,
You'll toast the Suffolk Anties, Sam,
Who ponied down the clink;
As grog and lies are sure to make
Your Antiam grow,
You'll drink to those who pay you best,
Sam Anderton, my Jo.

Sam Anderton, my Jo, Sam,
If you go but once more,
Remember one upon the seth
That saw you on the shore;
For when life's voyage is ended, Sam,
He'll call you from below,
To render up your reckoning,
Sam Anderton, my Jo.

[From the Albany Argus.]

ORIGIN, PROGRESS, AND BEAUTIES OF ANTIMASONRY.

Origin of Antimasonry. One of the committee of the national antimasonic convention at Philadelphia, date the origin of antimasonry 'more than 30 years ago.'—There must be a mistake in this report. In Nile's Register, vol. 8, p. 260, is an ordinance from the 'Inquisitor General' regarding an edict of Ferdinand of Spain, proscribing the Masons; which is the legitimate foundation of Antimasonry. That part of the edict which relates to this subject is as follows.

Madrid, Jan. 17, 1815.

'Inquisitor General has published an edict of the king, that 'with the advice of his majesty's council, and of the Holy Inquisition, he will receive with open arms, and with all the tenderness suitable to his character and office, all such Freemasons, as shall within fifteen days, spontaneously and voluntarily denounce themselves; but if any of them shall persist in following the way to perdition, he shall then be obliged to resort to the rigorous measures enjoined by the civil and canon law.'

This document, which is dated one month prior to the embarkation of Bonaparte from Elba, conclusively proves the origin of Antimasonry: and also that the Bourbons were the fathers of it. It is therefore 'legitimate,' according to the royal sense of the term. But this proscriptive party will be repudiated 'Liberals' all over the world.

KOSCIUSKO.

Origin, progress, and beauties of Antimasonry.—Mr. Editor.—A few days since I gave you an extract of an edict from the King of Spain, registered by the Holy Inquisition, to show the true origin of Antimasonry. This decree was dated in Feb. 1815, and proves conclusively that political Antimasonry had its origin with the Bourbons and the Holy Inquisition, and that instead of being 30 years old, as stated by the Philadelphia convention, this child of bigotry and proscription is only 15 years old last February.

But it is not the age of this antirepublican banding, but its origin and principles, to which I would call the attention of the 'Liberals,' here and elsewhere. I now send you an extract from Nile's Register, vol. 14, p. 21, June 17, 1818; to show the progress of Antimasonry, under the decree heretofore published.

'Spain—A letter from Alicant says; 'Last week, the clergy excommunicated from their churches all Freemasons; also all persons who may have in their possession any book of Masonry, or who may know of a person and not inform against him. Poor fools! how can they point out a Mason, unless he should declare himself, which he would not, as the Inquisition would imprison him for life. There is a Col. Fernando, a worthy brave officer, now in close confinement in the castle, where he has been eighteen months. He was seized at the dead hour of the night, and carried from his bed to a prison by those wretches, for being, as they supposed, a Mason.'

The press was also proscribed, as will appear by the following extract:

'English newspapers and those of the Netherlands, are strictly forbidden in Spain; and only three of those published in France are permitted.' Nile's Register, June 12, 1819.

Those who have watched the progress of antimasonry in this state, will observe the striking likeness between the fruits of antimasonry in Spain and here. In Spain, the Holy Inquisition excommunicated Masons from the church; the same thing has been done in this state. Three persons, who would not inform against Masons were punished; here also, those who will not join in the crusade are proscribed. There the press was denounced by the Holy Inquisition; and to make the parallel complete, the recent convention at Philadelphia have appointed grand inquisitors, and have denounced the press.

The spirit of antismasonry is the same here as it is under the Inquisition of Spain, and once give them the power, and they would proscribe every Liberal, and second the Bourbons in all their acts of tyranny and oppression.

KOSCIUSKO.

Mr. Editor.—In two former numbers, I have exhibited documentary evidence, that antismasonry was originated and nurtured up by the Bourbon family, after their restoration by the 'holy alliance.' And have shown that the King of Spain, at the head of the most bigotted, besotted, and priest-ridden government on earth, was the most deeply imbued with the spirit of antismasonry.

It will be recollected that in the extracts heretofore given, it was proved that antismasonry sprang into life soon after the Bourbons had been seated, not by their own virtue or valor, but by the strong arm of the legitimates, upon the thrones of their ancestors. In looking round for the causes which had dethroned their imbecile predecessors and which had given concert of action to the friends of liberty and force and energy to free principles, these monarchs of antismasonry, fastened upon the Masonic lodges as one of the means of extending those doctrines of liberty and equality, which are terrible only to tyrants. Accordingly a decree was issued, shutting up all lodges, and punishing with imprisonment and death, those who did not renounce and join the antimasonic party, and swear allegiance to the holy inquisition.

From a persuasion that the Bourbons had discovered the secret spring that moved the republican spirit which had given so much trouble to the crowned heads of the old world, the King of Prussia, who had aided to re-install the Bourbons, resolved to follow the example of his royal ally of Spain, and issued a decree in favour of antismasonry.

The following extracts will show, that it was an antirepublican spirit which moved him to proscribe the Masons. It was just such a spirit as we have witnessed in this state.

The decree of Ferdinand 'the ordered,' establishing the holy order of antismasonry, was in Feb, 1815. The King of Prussia, it will be seen, did not come into the arrangement until several years afterwards. Extract:

Intelligence from Berlin, of the 13th July, 1819, states, that recent investigations in Prussia and other countries, have proved the existence of secret democratical societies, whose proceedings are of a treasonable nature. A complete plan of a republican constitution had been seized in Germany.—Niles' Reg. vol. 17, p. 15.

PRUSSIA.—A government order has been issued in Berlin for shutting up the lodges of Freemasons. It is thought that this measure will be adopted throughout all the states of Germany, it has excited much surprise in Prussia, where the Freemasons have hitherto been protected by the government.—Niles' Register, vol 19, p. 152. Nov. 4. 1820.

PRUSSIA.—Some journals have been suppressed by the King for having exhibited too much insolence.—Many arrests of suspected persons had been made and were making.—Niles' Reg. vol. 16, p. 123, Oct. 28, 1819.

I cannot close this communication, without calling the attention of the reader to the striking fact, that antismasonry, although cultivated in different climates, produces the same fruits on this as on the other side the Atlantic. In Spain, the inquisitor general of antismasonry prohibited foreign journals; in Prussia, the royal antismason suppressed the liberal journals; and to leave no doubt that the spirit of antismasonry is the same all over the world, the national convention of antismasons held at Philadelphia, denounced the press in unmeasured terms, and actually resolved, so far as their patronage was concerned, to proscribe all papers which did not advocate the bigotted and antirepublican doctrines of antismasonry. Those who possess this spirit, if they had the power, would visit their opponents, and particularly the editors of Liberal journals, with all the punishment of the holy inquisition.

Daring Outrage.—We learn from Hartford, that on Monday, the 27th ult. the Rev George Witherell, pastor of the baptist church in that town, having some business to transact with Mr. Samuel Haile, of the same town, left home for that purpose, in the afternoon, with intention of returning to his family before bed time; but on account of the rain which commenced and continued till late in the evening, he was induced to tarry at Mr. Haile's all night. Mrs. Witherell finding that her husband did not return, and judging that he was detained by the rain, and that he would probably stay away from home all night, suggested to her son, (a young man about seventeen,) the propriety of his taking a bed in the room adjoining, or near to the one in which she slept. At the dead hour of the night, after they had been asleep, Mrs. Witherell and her son were awoke by the sound of footsteps in the kitchen, which at first they supposed were those of a husband and a father; but they soon found their mistake. Two ruffians then immediately entered the room, where Mrs. W. was in bed, one of whom exclaimed as he entered, 'now you—perjured rascal, we will now inflict upon you the penalty of your violated obligations.' [Elder W. is a seceding Mason.] At this moment young Witherell sprang from his bed and ran towards the scene, exclaiming in a loud and quivering accent, 'father, have you got home?' 'father, are you there?' &c. One of the ruffians seized Mrs. W. by the throat, and made a pass at her head with his fist, or with a weapon, which, however barely grazed her head, and struck the head board with considerable force.—It is presumed from what followed, that the cries of the young man induced them to examine to see whether their intended victim was at home, for one of them drew from his pocket, or from under his coat, a pocket lantern, which he opened, and examined the bed. Finding the object of search was absent, they immediately decamped.—The light which shone from the lantern, enabled young Witherell to discern that one of them had a large butcher's knife in his hand; that one of them was a large man, dressed in grey clothes; and that they were both without hats, having black silk handkerchiefs on their heads (as he judged from their appearance) which came down over and veiled their faces. An alarm was immediately sounded, and some of the neighbors came in; but as yet we have not heard that any discoveries have been made of the villains. We are apprised that a legal investigation is shortly to take place, till which time we forbear to comment.

The following facts appeared in evidence at the court of examination, as related to us by a gentleman, who heard the trial. Elder Witherell, the day previous to the intended outrage, went about two miles from home, to a certain Mr. Haile's, after some mutton. While there, some apples were given to him, eating one, and looking at the seeds, he started up in amazement, and said, it was revealed to him, through the medium of that apple, that a conspiracy was formed to assassinate him, that night in his own house. Consternation turned the good man pale, and he accordingly tarried, at the house of his friend over night. Early in the morning he returned home, and affidavits of this daring outrage, were immediately procured, and widely disseminated. Unluckily for the Elder's excuse for staying from home, it rained when he left home. After these affidavits had been taken according to the desire of the electioneering Anties, and distributed throughout the state, they were wonderfully resigned, and preached peace and advised forgetfulness.—The lovers of order and truth, however, were not content; and caused a man to be arrested on suspicion, and compelled the attendance of the witnesses. After the arrest, the hopeful young Witherell, who witnessed the horrible attack on the head board, was sent off post haste into Vermont, to prevent his being produced as a witness. When time enough had elapsed, to conclude the examination, he returned privately and in the evening. It was ascertained that he had returned, and a constable was despatched to bring him into the court. On his way, he showed the officer a statement of facts, which had been given him by the anticounsel to swear by, and also read it to an innholder, where he had formerly lived. Hethen destroyed the paper. He said that the paper was given to him, so that he might tell the same story he had in his affidavit, if there should be any further investigation, and the anticounsel said he had a right to give it to him. The wife of the sage elder testified fully to the facts as above related, and her neighbors testified that she was not entitled to belief, her reputation for veracity being notoriously bad.—It was proved also, that the good lady had a stock of cider brandy on hand at that time. The son sustained his mother in her story, generally, but forgot all about his written statement of facts, which he had repeatedly exhibited. It was proved too, that these good people went by fourteen able bodied men, to get to an anti, before they gave any alarm. Nobody in the vicinity believes that any attack was made, and those who affect to believe it, are put down by circumstances that cannot lie. It is believed that if any persons entered the house, it was a concerted plan, to raise the wind before election. Our informant says every sensible man discredits the whole concern entirely, and that he has heard several candid anties reproach the actors in this shameful imposition, in the strongest terms, and denounce the whole affair as a contemptible farce.

We never had any doubts of this, from the anti story itself. Here are mother Witherell and her hopeful son, wide awake, addressing the ruffians as the good Elder.—They do not flee as detected assassins are wont to do, but, notwithstanding, the presence of young W. they seize madam by the throat, and commit a shocking battery on the headboard. What does this hopeful youth do all this time to relieve his mother from their ruthless grasp? Does he assault them with shovel and tongs? No. Does he sound an alarm? No. What is he about? deliberately examining the color and fashion of their dress, and critically inspecting their head gear, and dreadful butcher knife, by star light. The assassins, too, to cap the climax of folly, deliberately open a dark lantern and coolly examine the premises, and finding the Elder, the object of their attack, absent, quietly withdraw. Now take this in connexion with the facts of young W. passing fourteen men, before he gave any alarm, and the sage Elder's prediction over the apple, and the anxiety of the anti's to prevent a legal investigation, after they had promulgated their edition of the story, and who can doubt? A cause that requires such contemptible measures to sustain it, as this, and the Anderton murder story will readily be embraced, we think, by intelligent, and honorable men.—Belchertown Sentinel.

MASONIC.—'I wish to God,' said an antimason, coming to Boston the day before the late Masonic celebration, 'that to-morrow would bring forth rain, thunder and lightning, and that the bolts of heaven would kill the whole of the Masonic crew.' A Mason in the stage replied, 'I belong to the order, and to prevent such a disaster, I shall wear a lightning rod on my hat.'—Commentator.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

In a former paper we hinted at the probability, that we might notice Elder Sawyer, of Governor, in this state, a renouncing Mason, the honor of a notice. We are sorry we did so, as upon reading his renunciation we found it unworthy of a review—just such a document as might be expected from the depraved pen of an apostate—one who, upon his own confession, while a minister of the gospel, was ignorant of his duty as a Christian—who, while pretending to dispense the light of religion to others, was himself grovelling in gross darkness; and who acknowledges that, while professing to the world that he was a servant of Christ, he was 'Chaplain' of 'an institution stained, if not maintained by blood'—a strong advocate of what he terms 'a secret system of infidelity.' If he was then a man capable of expounding the scriptures, and unfolding to the world the sublimity and beauty of the christian religion, his understanding would have grasped the character of Freemasonry, at least very soon after his connexion with the order; if his mind was not adequate to the task, then surely we may be permitted to doubt his capability to 'train souls for immortality.' This latter imputation he doubtless would not wish to have cast upon him. But granting him common sense, and ordinary talents, he must have known the nature and character of the institution, while he was Chaplain of the order, if he ever could know it.—Did he not, as Chaplain, lend the sanction of his advocacy to the cause of Masonry? Did he not combine in himself the characters of a christian teacher and a teacher of Masonry? Yes—he acknowledges it himself. But his improved vision has since discovered it to be 'a secret system of infidelity.' Alas, poor human nature! To what degenerate days are we reserved! Philanthropy turns pale, and humanity heaves the deep sigh of regret, to hear a minister of the gospel plead ignorance in extenuation of his unfaithfulness in the discharge of his duty; for certainly it will be contended that it is the duty of the spiritual shepherd to warn his flock against 'a secret system of infidelity.' If he does it not his only plea is ignorance. In the case before us, we are unwilling to admit this plea—the state of education among the clergy forbids us to admit it. What then is the conclusion? Will the editor of the Antimasonic Republican draw it for himself? We would willingly bespared the pain of doing it, but he has challenged us; and thus we reply, that a minister of the gospel, if ignorant, deserves our pity; charity would draw a veil over his wellmeant but weak efforts: but if to wilful neglect of duty he adds a dissolution of the bonds of moral obligation, he becomes unworthy of esteem, either 'as a man, as a citizen, as a christian, or as a minister of the gospel.'

If Elder Sawyer be, as the editor of the Republican intimates, a maker of antimasons, we do not grudge him either the honors or the emoluments of his office; and if this article, though not a 'shaft of Masonic malice,' should be the means of making 'hundreds more,' we have only to say that they will have done us 'honor over-much;' for it never came, even amongst our dreams, that we possessed influence enough to make one antimason, much less, 'hundreds.' Should Mr. Sawyer feel aggrieved by what we have said on this subject, we refer him to the editor of the Republican for redress. Our promise to notice him was not positive; and we should have said nothing further about him or his renunciation, had we not been 'called out' by Mr. Barber, who seems to feel quite pugnacious about the matter. Such renunciations are not objects of much importance at this time.—Union Village N. Y. Courant.

By a Postscript in the Ohio Luminary (an antimasonic paper,) we find that the Antimasonic National Convention, which met at Philadelphia the 11th inst. and adjourned to meet again some time next year in Baltimore, had some serious difficulties in obtaining a place of meeting. They could not procure the Masonic Hall, nor the Mayor's Court Room, and then applied for the Hall of Independence, which was refused, but they were 'granted the privilege (as the Luminary has it) of assembling (qu. was it not meant for scrabbling) in the dirty District Court Room.'—This place it seems did not answer, and then the Ohio Luminary again says (all in the postscript) that 'the Saloon of the musical fund Sheity,' was procured—a pretty shy place for these harmonists truly, when we add from the same postscript the 'rent was demanded before it would be opened.' The correspondent of the Editor remarks, 'I have not time to comment on the strange proceedings.' We hope he will find time. The disquisition will be extremely interesting and edifying.

From the South Carolina Times.

'To the corrupt servility of cities, arbitrary power looks for its support—To the virtuous and hardy owners and cultivators of the soil, a Republic must turn in the hour of trial. Upon these South Carolina now throws herself; and they will sustain her, for it is in defence of their interests that she has been dragged into this collision.'

The censure which the nullification editor casts upon cities is false. In all the great contests between freedom and despotism, the first impulse has been communicated by large cities. Did not the American Revolution originate in Boston?—Did not the first Revolution in France rise in Paris? Has not Charles X. been just driven from his throne, by the heroic inhabitants of Paris?—There is as much virtue, patriotism and love of liberty in city as in country—and more energy, more rapidity of action, and less liability to be the dupes of ignorance and prejudice. The fanaticism of antimasonry in this state never can enter any of our cities. It flies at the approach of a free, inquiring and intelligent people, who reads all sorts of newspapers, and compare all opinions. Let us hear no more of this censure on cities.

Antimasonry, as we all along predicted it would, receive the death blow on the 12th instant. It may, indeed, linger out a 'miserable existence for a short time, here and there, but it has received the mortal wound 'in head and heel,' and must soon die the death of the unrighteous, and go to its grave unhonored and unsung.—Lan. Rep.

Although Antimasonry may flourish for awhile, and it will be but for a little while, in 'spots' of Pennsylvania, it never can mar any considerable portion of the fair face of the 'key stone of the federal arch.' There is too much good sense, patriotism and moral virtue, among us for that.

THE WANDERER'S RETURN.

There stood beside a lonely cot
A weary man with silver hair;
Sorrow was in his eye, and thought
Was busy there, on that lone spot,
With memory of days that were;
When boyhood's smile, and boyhood's tear
And all its joys were tasted here.

Oh! many a well remember'd scene
Of halcyon sports in childhood's day
Lay smiling there, so brightly green,
Ye might have deem'd Death ne'er had been
To mar their beauty with decay!
That Time, the spoiler, might not blot
The brightness of that cheerful spot.

Here flowed the stream whose rushing tide
Had dash'd his puny barque below;
And there the hill whose rocky side,
Oft climb'd in youthful glee and pride,
Still rear'd, as then, its lofty brow—
When younger playmates gazed with fear,
Upon his upward, bold career.

But they whose smiles were wont to bless
His youthful hours—Oh! where were they?
That mother, whose fond parting kiss,
Whose long last look of tenderness,
Years had not power to close away;
That father, where?—whose parting tear
And sad farewell were given here.

Slowly the shades of twilight fell
On hill and valley, sea and sky;
And but the herds returning bell
Low tinkling in the far-off dell,
And but the breeze that murmur'd by,
No sound disturbed the silence there;—
The grave alone could answer—where!

Alas! they never more may greet
The wanderer at his natal home;
They never more may spring to meet
With fond embrace, and welcome sweet,
Or shout for joy that he is come!
Oh! vain that call—echo alone
Flung back in mockery its tone.

He wander'd to the church-yard lone—
That wan old man with silver hair;
And traced on many a moss-clad stone,
The names of each long cherished one,
Inured and mouldering there;
Despair grew strong—one groan he gave
And died upon his kindred's grave.

NOVELS.—It has become too much the fashion with modern novelists, to select for their heroes splendid villains, and by endowing them with all the glorious attributes of intellect, to apologize or atone for their moral deformity. The province of the novelist, although not strictly that of a proponent of ethics, is nevertheless one of a highly responsible nature. Nothing tends so much to elevate the character of Scott, and to give currency to his works, as the lofty patriotism, parity of sentiment, and honourable incentive which they inculcate. The villains of his pages are dressed in the hideous colors which they deserve; it is virtue alone that is painted in brilliant hues.

INDULGENCE OF GRIEF.

It is not in the power of every one to prevent calamities of life—but it evinces true magnanimity to bear up under them with fortitude and serenity.—The indulgence of grief is made a merit of by many, who, when misfortunes occur, obstinately refuse all consolation, till the mind, oppressed with melancholy, sinks under its weight. Such conduct is not only destructive to health, but inconsistent with reason. 'There are,' says South, 'what may be called the ceremonies of sorrow; the pomp and ostentation, effeminate grief, which speak not so much the greatness of the misery as the smallness of the mind.'

To persevere

In obstinate condolence, is a course
Of impious stubbornness, unmanly grief.
It shows a will most incorrect to Heaven,
A heart unfortified, a mind impatient;
An understanding simple and unschooled.

Change of ideas is as necessary to the health as change of posture. When the mind dwells long upon one subject, especially if it be of a disagreeable and depressing nature, it injures all the functions of the body. Hence the prolonged indulgence of grief spoils the digestion, and destroys the appetite. The spirits become habitually depressed—the body emaciated, and the fluids deprived of their appropriate supply of nutriment from without, are greatly vitiated. Thus many a constitution has been seriously injured by a family misfortune, or any occurrence, giving rise to excessive grief. It is, indeed, utterly impossible that any person of a dejected mind should enjoy health. Life may, it is true, be dragged on for years. But whoever would live to good old age, and vigorous withal, must be good humored and cheerful. This, however, is not at all times in our power—yet our temper of mind, as well as our actions, depends greatly upon ourselves. We can either associate with cheerful or melancholy companions—mingle in the offices and amusements of life—or sit still and brood over our calamities, as we choose. These and many similar things are certainly within our power—and from these the mind very commonly takes its complexion.

The variety of scenes which present themselves to our senses, were certainly designed to prevent our attention from being too constantly fixed upon one single object. Nature abounds with variety, and the mind, unless chained down by habit, delights in the contemplation of new objects.—Examine them for some time—when the mind begins to recoil, shift the scene. By these means a constant succession of new ideas may be kept up, till what are disagreeable disappear. Thus travelling—occasional excursions in the country—the study of any art or science—reading or writing on such subjects as deeply engage the attention, will expel grief sooner than the most sprightly amusements. We have already repeatedly said, that the body cannot enjoy health unless it be exercised—neither can the mind; indolence nourishes grief. When the mind has nothing else to think of but calamities, it is no wonder that it dwells upon them. Few persons are hurt by grief, if they pursue their business or their active duties with attention. When, therefore, misfortune happens—instead of abstracting ourselves from the world, or from business, we ought to engage in it with more than ordinary attention—to discharge with double diligence the duties of our station, and to mingle with friends of a social and cheerful disposition. Innocent amusements are by no means to be neglected; these, by leading the mind to the minute contemplation of agreeable objects, help to dispel the gloom which misfortune shed over it. They cause time to seem less tedious, and have many other beneficial effects. But it is to be lamented that too many persons, when overwhelmed with grief, betake themselves to the intoxicating bowl. This is making the cure worse than the disease, and seldom fails to end in the ruin of fortune, character, happiness and constitution.

PIONEERS.

At the siege of Algiers, the Arabs used a singular species of pioneers. They collected several bodies of camels, and formed them into long lines. They then tied them together by the nether lip, so as to keep them in ranks. These companies were advanced to the front of the French battalions, and, when at a proper distance, fire was applied to their tails. The whole then rushed forward with such impetuosity, that they entirely overturned the lines opposed to them, while the columns of Arabs advancing in their rear, rushed on close after them, and took advantage of the confusion.

This manœuvre is not without example in ancient and modern times. On one occasion Hannibal extricated himself from a difficult position, by adopting a plan somewhat similar. He collected all the cattle in his camp, and applied fire, not to their tails, but to their heads; then tied burning torches to their horns, and in this way sent the whole body furiously on the Roman army, which soon gave ground.

But in the year 1798 it was practised in Ireland with decided success, particularly at the battle of New Ross. A quantity of cattle was collected from the neighboring fields in a mass, and brought in a body to the entrance of the town, then occupied by the king's forces. When arrived at the head of a steep street called Three Bullet Gate, they were goaded on and ran furiously down; filling up and sweeping everything before them with irresistible force; so that Gen. Johnson, and about 1500 men, were completely pushed from their position, and carried across the bridge into the county of Kilkenny, by the fixed horns of these pioneers, as efficacious as if they were fixed bayonets and insurgents, following in their rear, took for a time almost undisturbed possession of the vacated town.

WHAT IS LIFE.

There is eloquence of thought as well as of language in the following paragraph from Arnott's Elements of Physics.

The functions by which the animal body assumes foreign matter around, and converts them into its own substance is little inviting in some of its details, but taken altogether is one of the most wonderful subjects which can engage the human attention. It points directly to the curious and yet unanswered question—What is life? The student of nature may analyze with all his art those minute portions of matter called seeds and ova, which he knows to be the rudiments of future creatures, and the links by which endless generations of living creatures hang to existence; but he cannot disentangle and display apart their mysterious life! that something under the influence of which each little germ in due time swells out to fill an invisible mould of maturity which determines its forms and proportions. One such substance thus becomes a beautiful rose bush; another a noble oak; a third an eagle; a fourth an elephant—yea in the same way, out of the rude materials of broken seeds and roots, and leaves of plants and bits of animal flesh, is built up the human frame itself, whether of the active male, combining gracefulness with strength, or the gentler woman with beauty around her as light. How passing strange that such should be the origin of the bright human eye, whose glances pierce as if the invisible soul was shot with it; of the lips which pour forth sweet eloquence; of the larynx, which by vibrating, fills the surrounding air with music; and more wonderful than all, of that mass shut up within the bony fortress of the skull, whose delicate and curious texture is the abode of the soul, with reason which contemplates, and its sensibility which delights in these and endless other miracles of creation.

THE PARSON AND THE DEVIL.—In New-Jersey, not a century ago, a young clergyman went to pay a visit to a senior brother parson, who resided on the sea coast. During his stay he was invited by his friend to go a fishing; to this he readily acceded, and as they were proceeding on their excursion, asked what kind of fish they would be likely to take? His friend replied, that they might get some devil fish. After trying some time they hooked a large devil, who immediately ran off, and dragged the boat with considerable velocity. The senior parson burst out into a hearty laugh, while his friend, apparently much alarmed, inquired the cause of his laughter. The older gentleman replied, he was laughing at the devil's running away with two parsons.

Bowing is a science by itself; and must be closely attended by those who would, by turning and twisting themselves, keep in the sunshine of fashion. Bow very reverently low to a million of dollars, most respectfully to a hundred thousand, courteously to fifty thousand, civilly to ten thousand, coldly to five thousand, and never know poverty by sight.

A butcher about to kill a cow, employed an Irishman to hold her. The butcher squinted, and when looking at the cow, appeared to look at the Irishman. Pat fearing he should get the knock down instead of the cow, said in much of a hurry; 'Arrah, man do you strike where you look?' 'To be sure I do; where do you think I strike?' 'Then you may howl the cow yourself till I get out of the way, just.'

A notorious toper used to mourn about not having a regular pair of eyes; one being black and the other hazel: 'It is very lucky for you,' replied his friend, 'for if your eyes had been matches your nose would have set them on fire long ago.'

'Once,' said a Quaker, in a dispute concerning the propriety of titles. 'I had the honor to be in company with an Excellency and a Highness.—His Excellency was the most ignorant and brutal man I ever saw; and his Highness measured just four feet eight inches.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 30, 1880.

YOUNG MEN'S CONVENTION. Pursuant to previous arrangements, a convention of the young men of the county of Chatauque, New-York, opposed to political antimasonry, was held at the Court House in Mayville, on the 28th ult. After the organization, several resolutions were proposed and adopted, setting forth that it is the duty of every individual in the community, however humble his sphere of action may be, to use his best exertions to steady and support the main pillars of government; that the present state of political party in that section of our country seems to endanger everything that is amiable in friendship, valuable in civilized life, and sacred in religion; and that a remissness and inactivity in times like these evince a moral and political apathy which no good man can possess; that the antimasonic party in their unholy zeal for political power, have sundered the ties of consanguinity and friendship—scattered jealousies through all the departments of society—profaned the sacred grave, and torn the Christian worshipper from the altar of his God; that the introduction of antimasonry into the church, and the test as to the religious qualification, consequent thereupon, is a perversion, not only of our political institutions, but a dangerous approximation to the inquisition itself; that a free press, governed by pure principles and guided by truth, is one of the greatest agents in the formation of correct public sentiment, but that a licentious press is the greatest moral and political curse that can befall a free people; that they have no evidence in the history of legislation, or in the organization of our government, of the dangerous influence of Freemasonry; that however much they may discountenance the spread of Masonry by refusing to attach themselves to the lodges; yet they cannot join in that political crusade against, and proscription of, all such as shall be members of that fraternity; but with them the test shall be, is he honest? is he faithful? is he capable? that they have full faith in the potency of truth and in the patriotism of the people, and believe that the time has already or will soon arrive when they will perform their important political duties calmly and disinterestedly, and proceed to the choice of the public officers without any reference to Masonry or antimasonry, but solely with a view to their country's welfare; that while they lament the furious career of political antimasonry, they rejoice that it has not drawn into its vortex those men to whom they have habitually looked up for correct moral and political example, nor prostituted to its service much of the talent of the community.

We subjoin the address. It is a temperate and manly production.

To the Young Men of the County of Chatauque.

In the exercise and enjoyment of the government under which we live, it is the boasted right of all, freely to express their opinions, upon all questions of political or governmental policy. This right being recognised, and the propriety of it being indisputable, it becomes an imperative duty, binding upon every good citizen, to examine, with care, and with the best lights with which nature and education have furnished him, all questions that may arise calculated to affect our civil or religious institutions. When novel doctrines are advanced, and new parties advocating them, arise and attempt a revolution in the community, it becomes good citizens to scan, and weigh well the principles advanced, and to ascertain the objects to be obtained by the inculcation and support of them. Every individual feels, or ought to feel a deep interest in the welfare of his country, in the permanency and durability of those principles, which are the best calculated to ensure the rights of every member of the civil compact. If there be evils in the community, they ought to be eradicated. If there be a class of men, whose political practices and tenets, are hostile and dangerous to the liberties of the country, every patriot should oppose them.

But ere we determine to exclude any class of men, from the free enjoyment, from a full participation in the management of the affairs of government, to deprive them of all the benefits of the elective franchise, to place them under the ban of public proscription, we ought to be thoroughly convinced of their enmity to the free enjoyment of the liberty we so highly prize.

The government, of which we are members, is one emanating from the people, and is based upon those principles of moral justice and the inherent right which every man possesses, of participating in its administration.

When any combination act against a denomination or class of men in the community, because they belong to a particular society, what is it but reducing them to the ranks of the plebians? But antimasonry says that this class, this fraternity, is dangerous, that our liberties, in their hands, or under their guardianship, would be destroyed.

It is not necessary to defend or advocate the principle of the institution, if we shall say that we cannot see the evidence of this danger. It does not follow that he, who will not join in the hue and cry raised against Masons, is therefore a friend to Masonry. Where is the evidence that Masonry is hostile to a free government? In the examination of this important question, our minds cannot fail to revert to that history of those times when a great nation was brought into existence; when the framers of our constitution came forward, and with toil, with study, with an eye single to the good and the happiness and the prosperity of a great people, by their united wisdom, and a modest yielding spirit of concession to the requirements of their co-laborers, agreed upon, and gave to their posterity, the admirable system of government which we still enjoy. Who is dissatisfied with it? Are not its great features strictly in accordance with our wishes and feelings? Could we better it? Does the antimasonic party contemplate any change in our constitution. In looking over the names of those patriots, we find that many of them were Masons; no one then doubted the honesty of opinion with which each supported the doctrines he proposed. Masons have continued to hold offices in our State and general governments, and the laws which have been passed, have been almost universally popular. If these men were dangerous and hostile to our government, why have they never shown it in their acts as legislators? Can we believe that the heart of man is so deceitful, that he can raise his voice in our senate against oppression and tyranny, in favor of the dearest rights of the whole human family, and at the same time nourish in his bosom a viper, to sting and poison all for which he contends? It cannot be. We look then in vain for evidence, in their acts of legislation, upon which to convict them of a conspiracy against our liberties. And shall we, admitting their institution and its ceremonies to be useless and foolish,—shall we for this, chastise with a heavy hand of total proscription? What does antimasonry seek? They do not pretend that they want any changes made in the laws. If any changes are desired, has not any member of our legislative halls a perfect and indefeasible right to propose those changes, and if the wisdom of the whole body assembled, shall concur, after enlightened discussion, will they not pass them?

If antimasons were to gain the ascendancy, would they pursue the same general system of government? This is an important question, and should be weighed by every reflecting man. If they intend to introduce any great fundamental changes, are the citizens of this republic prepared to assent to them? If no changes in the fundamental principles of our institutions, are to be effected, what is their object but political power, and a domineering ascendancy. The votaries of antimasonry say that they do not proscribe any, that they exercise the right which a majority always has. If to say that all who are attached to a society who entertain upon the subjects of theology, or any moral subject, opinions different from ourselves, shall not be supported for any office, is not proscription, in what place can the word be used with propriety? Suppose you raise the hue-and-cry against any religious society, and exclude them from office, is not this proscription? We do not compare Masonry with our religious institutions; but unless it can be shown that Masonry is opposed to the liberties of our country, how can we indiscriminately exclude them from our confidence? There may come a time in this country when illiberality and fanaticism may rage against the professors of some religious creed, and will you advance the doctrine that their religious heresies shall be destroyed at the ballot boxes? Shall the sacred palladium of our liberties become the engine of the spirit of the inquisition? The young men who have not joined in the crusade against Masons, are accused of being the supporters of Masonry. We do not come forward to advocate the principles of the institution, and be our opinion of its utility or uselessness, as it may, we cannot consent to proscribe, en masse, a body of free citizens, till we are satisfied of their inimical designs against the institutions which we enjoy and admire. Deeply impressed with the baneful and unhappy effects of the spirit of antimasonry, in all the ranks and grades of society, we deem it a duty to oppose, with calm, but decided perseverance, its progress.

SHERIFF SUMNER.

We copy the following from the Transcript of Tuesday evening. We have only room this week to remark, that the 'doggerel stanza' objected to by Mr. Sumner, is from a scurrilous handbill written by some one of his own antimasonic friends, [and insultingly sent through the Post Office, to most of the prominent Masons in the city,] for the purposes of slandering and libelling that Institution from which the worthy 'Sheriff of the County of Suffolk' has apostatized. The Sheriff ought not to complain, because his new friends wish to render him 'immortal in song.'—Achilles was thus immortalized, and so was

Grimes, 'that good old soul!'

Why then should the Sheriff object?

Mr. Sumner seems to feel aggrieved that such use should be made of his name; but it must be some consolation to him, while smarting under the friendly lash, that the liberty is not unwarrantable. He has voluntarily thrown his name and his character into the scale of antimasonry, and if they be occasionally held up to the gaze of the rabble and the laughter of the boys, we do not know that he can reasonably object, particularly when this be done by his own friends.

Boston, 26th Oct. 1830.

Sir,—I am sorry to see that you have copied in the Transcript, of Thursday evening, Oct. 21, a doggerel stanza, in which a reflection upon the City Police is attributed to me. The words are these:

Now our Police is quite too weak,
With Otis at their head, sir,
To still a secret, lawless mob,
As Sheriff Sumner said sir,

The appearance of that stanza in your paper, gives it a claim to my attention, which it would not otherwise possess; but I should not object to it, if it had been printed without its second and fourth lines. In these, the writer has yielded himself more to the guidance of his rhyme, than of his reason. I am not addicted to the use of disparaging language of any Chief Magistrate; and my heart is a stranger to the sentiment towards Mr. Otis, which is thus unkindly put in my mouth.

I am, sir, your respectful servant,

C. P. SUMNER.

Editor of the Daily Evening Transcript.

It will not escape the notice of our readers, that whilst Sheriff Sumner regrets that we have inserted a reflection upon the City Police attributed to him, he does not object to the first and third lines of the "doggerel stanza," which makes him say

Now our Police is quite too weak,
To still a secret, lawless mob."

He would have had no objection to the stanza, if it had been printed without the second and fourth lines. We have printed them without the second and fourth lines, and now ask him whether the first and third do not cast a reflection upon the City Police, to the printing of which he has no objection.

THE THEATRE.—We are as much opposed to the licentiousness of theatres as the most rigid moralist can be; we would go farther than most of those who set themselves up for theatrical censors; we would not only strip the theatre of its unwholesome attractions, but we would prune every piece brought forward for representation, of its indelicate and exceptionable points. And if we mistake not, there is, generally, more need of reform in this particular than in any other. In our visits to the theatre, we have never been able to discover such great improprieties, such monstrous wickedness and profligacy, as it is alleged do exist.—But if such enormities really have a being, is a clergyman, who it is presumed never honors the theatre by his presence, the proper person to prescribe the remedy? It would be thought ridiculous and censurable in a physician to prescribe for his patient without any other knowledge of his disease, than that derived from a third person. We believe that there is virtue enough in the play-going part of the community to correct the abuses of the theatre, without clerical interference; and that clergyman who does so interfere, hazards the dignity of his sacred calling and lessens his own influence in society.—‘Theatrical amusements may be made the cover of much impropriety, but it is questionable whether the pulpit is the proper weapon of reform. The broad impudent vices of large cities and places of, so called, elegant amusements, are better reformed by the pepper and pugnancy of the press. The pulpit is a sacred place—it is holy ground—it should be devoted to all the gentler feelings of religion, virtue, and humanity. The introduction of politics or the attacks is equally out of place in the unspotted sanctuary.’

That abuses upon decorum have been practised before the present season, does not admit of dispute, but why and wherefore should reverend gentlemen and their coadjutors, cavil in the day of reformation? If buildings are to be condemned to everlasting infamy for the misconduct of former residents or visitors, many meeting and dwelling houses would not escape. Although the splendid mansions of the most pious and respectable citizens may be defiled by a few polluted inmates, would it be thought charitable to call them brothels? It were to be wished that the exertions made to put down the theatre may not deprive the manager and his company of ‘the means whereby they live.’

In regard to the Tremont Theatre, we presume it will not be said that it is not, at least, as well managed as it has heretofore been. The police is more efficient, and there has been less disturbance the present than in any former season within our recollection. The communication between the second and third tier of boxes, opened the last season, has been closed by the present manager. Mr. Russell publicly invites investigation—he asks the friends of the establishment to point out the abuses, if any exist, and he promises to apply the remedy. What manager has ever done so much? Can more be expected of him? Certainly not. The crusade then which has been commenced against him, is disingenuous, to say the least of it. If any man feel aggrieved on account of real or supposed abuses, connected with the theatre, let him go forward like a man and point them out. When the manager refuses to hear complaints, it is then time enough for him to be assailed from the press and not from the pulpit.

Mr. Forrest closed his engagement on Wednesday evening, and evinced much improvement since the last season. The alteration in the third act of William Tell does not accord with nature or history, and ‘would be more honored in the breach than in the observance.’

☞ We make the following spirited extract from a letter addressed to the editor of the Vermont Advocate, dated Montpelier, Oct. 12, 1830:—

The Grand Lodge commenced its session yesterday and terminated this day. Its members are composed of the first men in the State. I wish you could have seen them. You could have had a fine opportunity of judging whether the institution merited the deep and bitter denunciations which its enemies have bestowed upon it—whether the members were deserving of that unyielding and uncon-promising spirit of persecution which has so madly and so holily pursued them since the disappearance of William Morgan. A majority of the members are far advanced in life—were the founders of our sovereignty—their wisdom framed and their strength raised the glorious fabric of our constitution. And are these men, around whose brows are encircled the snows of three quarters of a century, to become victims to a spirit, as fierce and as cruel as that which marked the era of the first French Revolution!—shall they be immolated to appease the vindictive passions of the modern Robespierres, Marats and Dantons, which have sprung up around us within a few years? Heaven forbid that such a calamity should overtake us! May God in his infinite mercy long preserve the brotherhood, and may we both live to see them triumph over the arts of their enemies—to resist the waves of malevolence—turn back the tide of anarchy, and become as pure as when they originated. I do not think the institution in any danger from the attacks of its enemies. The characters of those who assail it, are known throughout the state—their motives are beginning to be understood. In the onset of the excitement, masonry was denounced as a political society—with using secret and corrupt means to influence public meetings. Now, their adversaries avow as their leading sentiments, that they will support none but avowed anti-masons for office—that they will not acknowledge any neutrals. This doctrine they proclaim here. Is it not anti-republican? and does it not bebove the people to examine into its dangerous tendency?

PENNSYLVANIA.—The elections in Pennsylvania, which State has been considered the strong-hold of anti-masonry, have resulted in the most complete discomfiture of that ridiculous faction. The Philadelphia Sentinel says, “the miserable faction on Tuesday polled seventy votes all told, out of between 6 or 7000. A party got up on the proscriptive principles of anti-masonry deserves no better fate, and will receive none other from the intelligent and liberal citizens of Philadelphia.” The Pennsylvania Reporter has the following:—

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

Lycoming county, which at the election last fall gave about two hundred majority for Ritner (anti) now gives a large democratic majority!!!

Armstrong last year sent an antimason to the legislature, this year the whole democratic ticket has succeeded by a large majority!!!

In Franklin, last year the candidates for Governor had an equal number of votes; at the late election, the democratic majority was upwards of 500!!!

Dauphin and Lebanon gave the antimasonic ticket nearly 900 majority last year; now, the democratic is 427!!!!!!

Allegheny, which at the special election last winter for Congress, gave Denny a large majority, now sends three democratic members to the legislature!

In Erie county, last year the antimasonic majority was 1655, it is now only about 250!

In Union county, the Antimasonic majority is reduced from 1460 to about 500; in Somerset from 936 to less than 500; and in Lancaster from about 1600 to less than 900!

The Lancaster, (Penn.) Journal says, the result of the election throughout Pennsylvania is, we think, strongly indicative of the downfall of anti-masonry, and we are satisfied, that as soon as the national Republican or Clay party is organized throughout the State, which we suppose will be effected before the next election, the antimasonic party will not command a majority of votes in a single county in this State.

LAFAYETTE.—The whole of the Masonic Lodges, in Paris, have decided on giving a banquet to their venerable brother General Lafayette, and expressing to him their gratitude for his noble conduct during the events of July. “Where MASONRY is” said Lafayette, when last in Boston, “there is LIBERTY and BENEVOLENCE.”

OUTRAGE.—The annexed paragraph is copied from the Erie Observer, a paper that is published in the town of Erie, Pennsylvania. It displays the true spirit of anti-masonry.

ANTIMASONRY.—The fearless and independent editor of the Huntington Advocate was waylaid on the 22d ult. on passing from his office to his dwelling, knocked down and most inhumanly beaten by an anti-mason, with the butt end of a waggoner’s whip—all of which was inflicted because he had independence enough to refuse to lend his paper to that party for the purpose of villifying his neighbors indiscriminately, who happen to be long to the society of Freemasons. The reign of terror has truly commenced. The editor says ‘if club law is to be the rule for those who consider fines of court as mere trifles, however great has been his outrage, we will not be deterred from combatting aristocracy and tyranny, and advocating liberty and equality, though assassination and death await me.’ Lay on friend Wallace—Lash the rascals naked through the world.’

Extract of a letter to the editor dated Framingham, Oct. 14. ‘I expected to be in Boston at the laying of the Corner stone, which takes place this day; but the storm last evening, has deprived me of the pleasure which I had anticipated in meeting with a large collection of the brethren of our persecuted Institution: an Institution which I have ever esteemed, next to the holy religion taught by divine inspiration, the best calculated to advance the happiness and best interests of man in this world, and lead him to that which the righteous only have the promise of finding!’ It is probable that the unfavorable state of the weather, the day previous, prevented at least 500 brethren from uniting in the ceremonies.

NEW CITY.—A New York correspondent informs us that application has been made by gentlemen of that city, to the Lt. Governor of Upper Canada for a grant of 50,000 acres of land, located between Montreal and Prescott, on the river St Lawrence, for the purpose of building a new city, to be called the City of Adelaide. It is expected that the British government, independent of the land, will grant to all engaged in the undertaking, two years rations. Some gentlemen of wealth and influence are engaged in the project; and it is said the settlers are all to be drawn from the city of New York.

☞ The Gazette states that the antics of this city—noble souls!—in secret conclave assembled, on the evening prior to the laying of the Corner Stone, voted not to interrupt the procession!!! There never was any thing more laughable ridiculous than this, except it be that the Honorable and Reverend Moses Thatcher has been nominated by the anti-masons of Norfolk county, as a candidate for Congress!!!

Governor Levi Lincoln has appointed, with the advice and consent of the Executive Council, ‘Thursday the second day of December next, to be observed as a Religious Festival, by the people of the Commonwealth; that uniting, on that day, in public offices of devotion, they may, with one heart, and one voice, render to Almighty God, the tribute of adoration, thanksgiving, and praise.’

The true spirit of Antimasonry.—“Yes, we will put down Masonry by the sword, if we cannot put it down without,” said Mr. Jacob Hall, the other day, to a gentleman in conversation with him. “And,” continued the honorable ex-senator, “if we could prove a little more against you, we would put it down by the sword!” This is the mild spirit of anti-masonry!—the charitable spirit of a combination of men, who, out of purely patriotic motives, would create a Civil War!—would assassinate their neighbors and friends, to prove their great love of country! ☞ We record this fact for future use.

VERMONT.—His Excellency Samuel C. Crafts, has been elected Governor of the State of Vermont. His opponents were Palmer, (anti-masonic,) and Meech, (Jackson.)

THE WRATH.

AN EVENING HYMN.

Swiftly o'er the shining ocean
 Silent wends yon distant sail,
 Like a passing spirit's motion,
 Gently wafted by the gale!
 Lovely still, the lonely rover
 Fades where rests the sun-tipp'd wave,
 O'er the billow doomed to loiter,
 There to seek an unknown grave.
 Farewell to thee, then, forever!
 Fare thee well! farewell forever!

Thus must fade the best, the brightest—
 E'en the lovely and the gay!
 Not a breath we deem the slightest
 But doth waft some soul away!
 Thus on earth what most we cherish
 Seems to droop before the blast—
 Thus, oh thus too soon must perish
 Ev'ry tie we deem'd would last!
 Farewell to thee, then, forever!
 Fare thee well! farewell forever!

Thus I've watch'd, with fond devotion,
 Forms, that I have thought my own,
 Fading on life's troubled ocean,
 Till from thence the spirit's flown!
 Oh, if spirits, hence departed,
 E'er to earth again should stray,
 Here to seek the stricken-hearted,
 Then, fond spirits, haste this way!
 Hasten to me, then, fond spirits!
 Spirits bless'd, oh haste this way!

EXPRESSION.

There are hearts that love the unchangeable dye,
 And passionless depth of a calm blue eye;
 And worship a brow that is ever serene,
 Like the lifeless sky of a painted scene,
 Where the sunshine sleeps and the clouds are still,
 And motionless gushes the mountain rill;
 Such eyes are too steady, too patient, too true—
 I love not their sleepy inanimate hue;
 But give me the glance with the soul in its rays,
 The brow that can frown, and the eye that can blaze;
 The smile of that brow is forever the lightest,
 As a flash from a dark cloud is ever the brightest;
 For one, my dear girl, is the still bright lake,
 That winds cannot ruffle, and storms cannot shake,
 The other the foam of the cataract dash—
 The darker the water, the brighter the flash.

MOORE & SEVEY, 46, WASHINGTON ST.

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

U. S. ANTIMASONIC ADDRESS.

'What a fool art thou,

A ramping fool; to brag, to stamp, and swear,
Upon my party.'

Myron Holley, well known to the readers of the Craftsman, as a speculator upon the treasury of the state of New-York, as the secretary of the Washington Benevolent Society of Ontario county, and as a degraded politician, has the distinguished honor of writing and reporting the address to the people of the United States, which was adopted by the political jugglers and perjured priesthood recently assembled in the city of Philadelphia. It is not our purpose now to dwell with any minuteness upon the character of the writer, but to review such sections of the document which is before us as we deem to be important to the general interest, and to strip off the gaudy apparel ingeniously woven around a hideous and deformed subject and expose it in its naked wickedness, to the eye of a people who are sought to be made the dupes of the depraved and abandoned crew who live upon defamation and the misfortunes of the good and the virtuous.

In introducing the address, the writer artfully alludes to the momentous duties assigned to the convention, and professes to proceed 'in the ingenuous and free spirit of men, who earnestly seek the good of all.' Let the reader, go into the examination with us, of these momentous duties, as performed, and see how they honor their fair professions. We quote the second paragraph:

'Facts numerous and authentic, demonstrate the existence, in this community, of crimes and dangers, which, upon their first distinct disclosure to honest inquiry, excite equal surprise and solicitude; and which cannot be reflected upon, by any mind imbued with genuine self-respect, and a just regard for human rights, without the deepest abhorrence and alarm.

Freemasonry is the source of these crimes and dangers.'

Is this statement entitled to credit? It is easy to make assertions and place them before the public, without proof to substantiate them; but is it just for a body of men gravely assembled to adjudicate upon grave and momentous matters, to solemnly tell the world a deliberate, unblushing falsehood! Where, we ask, are the 'facts, numerous and authentic,' demonstrating the existence of crimes and dangers of which Freemasonry is the source? The oft repeated and stale tale of the abduction of William Morgan, dressed up anew and blazoned forth in all the horrors of blood and carnage, is the only fact introduced to sustain this preposterous hypothesis: and is Freemasonry with her hundred thousand deeds of benevolence and rich posthumous works, pencilled in gold throughout the earth, to fall a victim to the errors of a few infatuated men? The ignorant may be misled by such statements, but the intelligent will reflect much before they will give credence to the sweeping denunciation, and view, with the 'deepest abhorrence and alarm,' a class of men who convoke together to impose upon the innocent and unsuspecting cunning deceptions and specious falsehoods. But, the charge alluded to is no more impotent than another immediately succeeding it. The writer proceeds with a narrative of Morgan's abduction and briefly concludes a pointed sentence with the assertion that he was privately murdered! Now there never has been any proof that Morgan is dead, and by what authority is this declaration made? The convention must have thought the 'march of intellect' retrograding, and gullibility on the increase. Then, says the address:

'Previously to his seizure, numerous meeting of Freemasons, in lodges and otherwise, were held for the purposes of contriving and adopting the most certain means of carrying into effect, their unlawful objects upon them. These meetings were attended, and the designs of them approved, by several hundred of the most respectable and intelligent of the Masonic brethren.'

There has been no proof of any meetings in lodges for the purpose specified, nor that the project of abducting him was 'approved by several hundred of the most respectable and intelligent of the Masonic brethren.' It is a wanton and aggravating libel not only upon the fraternity but upon this community; nothing but the most fiendish malice could have invented it. But we will not dwell here, for we next encounter some sage speculations as to the motives of men, and some new principles of morality:

'William Morgan was a royal arch Mason. And the cause of all this unlawful violence against his liberty and his life, was his determination to publish the secrets of the order. These secrets are now published, partly from manuscripts, prepared by him, but more extensively from the deliberate testimony of many worthy men, who had been initiated further into the dark mysteries of the brotherhood, than he had. The precise motive, which impelled Morgan to the determination of publishing, we do not know as the act was one of conformity to his highest obligations, and therefore, of distinguishing honor, we believe the motive to have been good.'

We were disappointed when we read this paragraph.—We did not previously believe that the seceding Masons, men who have called their Maker to witness that they have limed their souls with perjury, were to be eulogised by a convention over which FRANCIS GRANGER presided, as worthy men! Oh, genius of virtue and patriotism, and angels of innocence! Degraded America, with what propriety may Europeans now embrace the dogmas of Feron, Nash, Hall and others, as to the character of your citizens! They know Morgan to be murdered! but do not know the motive which impelled him to the determination of publishing! What miserable subterfuge—they do know that it was to get money; no man of common sense ever had a doubt upon the subject, and they have heard it sworn to, again and again and seen the acknowledgments of Morgan himself. They say that they believe 'the motive to have been good,' and assert that it was in conformity to one of his 'highest obligations.' Both falsehoods; they believe no such thing, and how vilely do they traduce their God by the assumption that it was in conformity to one of his 'highest obligations' evidently meaning obligations to Heaven. It is the worst of blasphemy and most demoralizing of all sins, to tell a man who has solemnly invoked the Almighty to register a pledge for his honour and faith with his fellow men, that it is one of his highest obligations to break that faith and prostrate that honour, and that for doing so he shall be considered a worthy man. Why did not Washington, Lafayette, Greene, Clinton and others encourage such a doctrine

The address states that Miller's office was fired in the night by a Masonic incendiary. Another assertion without proof to sustain it.—Miller's story is all they had to warrant them in the declaration, and his character is notoriously bad. Say they 'the incendiary is known, and was subsequently a principal in the murder of Morgan.' Who is it, and where is he? If they know that Morgan has been murdered and know his murderer, and know a man guilty of arson, why do they not bring him to justice? At least they should exhibit proof enough to keep their scandal in good odour with their readers. The address complains much of the conduct of a constable and a few assistants, towards Miller, and closes a paragraph by informing the world that for their offence they were "indicted and convicted." If they were, they paid the penalty of their errors, and that is all that is required in a land of laws. We quote another paragraph:

'Every unperverted feeling, and every upright voice, anxiously claimed the impartial and prompt application to them, of the appointed powers of our criminal jurisprudence. Then began to draw on, that dark eclipse, upon the vaunted lights of Freemasonry, which, to the public eye, is rapidly becoming total, and through the eternal shadows of which, nothing will be discernible hereafter but blood.'

It is notorious that the 'most respectable and intelligent of the Masonic brethren,' who are charged in this same address with having concurred in the abduction, were among the first to exert themselves to bring the guilty to punishment. 'Then began to draw on, that dark eclipse, upon the intellect and honour of this fair portion of America—then the dark cloud of credulity and prejudice and passion began to gather over the people of Western New-York,' which to the public eye, is rapidly becoming a total, and through the eternal shadows of which 'it is feared nothing will be discernible hereafter,' but knavery, superstition and ignorance.

What right have they to draw the conclusion that nothing but blood will be discernible hereafter of Freemasonry? Especially what right has one standing in the light of a robber of the public treasury, to place his opinions in opposition to the honour, integrity and worth of every great and good man of the nation?

'In this alarming emergency, the agents of government seemed paralyzed. Our public institutions and provisions for the preservation of tranquility, and the repression of crime, seemed nugatory. And without the use of other means than the law, and its official ministers, the most daring and brutal inroads upon our dearest rights, would have passed off, without effort to understand their origin, punish their instruments, or provide against their recurrence. No arts were left untried by Freemasons to baffle the pursuit of truth, and defeat the administration of justice. The lion's grip of the order was upon our courts, and loyalty to that, displaced fealty to the state.'

Here we have more assertions without proof. The agents of the government are libelled—our institutions are libelled, and all for what? because a man has been abducted. Freemasons en masse are anathematized, and for what? because a few men belonging to that order abducted a man. Why not proscribe and follow up by persecution on persecution every son of Ireland, because an Irishman has some day committed murder, or every Scotchman, or Frenchman, or Dutchman, for like reasons? Or why not denounce every religious sect, because some one of their body has been guilty of crime? Must Freemaspry, alone, stand the shock of his wrath! It was natural for all those engaged in the abduction of Morgan to do what they could to make their escape from punishment, and they have probably done so; but does this furnish grounds of complaint against a large body of our most respectable citizens? A man who loves truth and justice, and does by his neighbor as he would wish that neighbor to do by him, would sooner sever his right arm from his body, than be guilty of writing and publishing such foul and false charges as are contained in the above paragraph.

A large proportion of the constables, justices of the peace, lawyers, judges, sheriffs and jurymen, of the counties where these acts were performed, were members of the society, and had taken oaths binding them in terms, to conceal each other's crimes. The high sheriffs were all Masons, and at that time, summoned as grand jurors, at their discretion, any such men as had the common qualifications. In the counties of Genesee and Niagara, where the fraternity were most afraid of criminal prosecutions, majorities of Freemasons are known to have been corruptly returned as grand-jurors. And these sheriffs of the counties were both indicted, subsequently, as parties to the conspiracy for the abduction of Morgan. One of them was tried and convicted, and the trial of the other has not yet taken place.

The first period of this paragraph has no foundation upon which its author or authors can uphold and sustain it; there are no oaths administered to Masons, 'binding them, in terms, to conceal each other's crimes,' and the statement is a ridiculous falsehood—an assertion that will not be believed by the most artificial and childish of the followers of Antimasonry. The second period is likewise false—the high-sheriffs were not all Masons. The third period is in common with the others—there is no evidence of grand-jurors having been corruptly returned. The fourth and fifth periods contain truths; one of the sheriffs was indicted, tried, and convicted, and 'the trial of the other has not yet taken place,' because he was corruptly indicted, eight out of sixteen only voting for a bill of indictment. The reader will refer to one of our numbers addressed to John C. Spencer, where we speak of the Genesee indictments.

The next effort made in this charitable address, composed in such an ingenuous spirit, is to impress upon the minds of the people that the public functionaries were 'totally inactive' through 'cowardice or corruption.' As a malignant and black-hearted falsehood as ever disgraced a public assemblage—but it is almost needless to comment on the works of such an unprincipled libeller, for we might write till time is no more and we could not add to the scorn and infamy into which he has plunged himself in the estimation of every virtuous man of the community. He eulogises the notorious Lewiston committee, who have kept Western New-York in a state of confusion and uproar for the last three years, and says they suspended their private concerns, and gave themselves up to all the labors of a complicated investigation, without any emolument, at great expense of time and money; but not a word does he say of the character of these men—not a word about Heman Norton who was sent to the Assembly—Thurlow Weed, who was sent to the Legislature last year—not a word about the renowned Bates Cooke, another, who is now a candidate for Congress—not a word about Frederick Whittlesey, another, and who is likewise a candidate for Congress—nor a word about that talented and honourable little man, Judge Rawson, another, who as a candidate for the Assembly, on the same ticket with that pattern of virtue and protector of innocence John C. Spencer—not a word, except that they were slandered and lied and their lives endangered! Reader,—you who know Theodore F. Tilton! would you kill the poor innocent creature? or you who know Rates Cooke, a 'HERO IN THE LAST WAR, who was the last man on the retreat when Lewiston was burnt, and while bearing his wounded brother from the field, contended with his single arm against five British savages, whom he killed, and rode off covered with gore and carnage, with a splendid Indian horse, which he made his prize?' would you, we say, have the hardihood to attack such a giant? No, no, reader, the framer of that address knows you better—he never thought the lives of such gallant and intrepid heroes in danger—he is only quizzing you. But, let us quote a serious paragraph, relative to these pure and disinterested patriots:

'Whatever could be done by good and wise men, without special lawful authority, was performed by those committees. They ascertained the principal facts respecting the kidnapping and murder, both as to the persons directly concerned in them, and their motives and principles of action.'

What murder? Where are the proofs? They have judges, and jurors and special counsel of their own making, now, and if they have the facts of a murder, it is high time that they have laid them before the public:

'Bills of indictment have been found for several of the minor offences: and convictions have followed in a few cases—upon the confession of the culprits in some, and after protracted trials in others. But most of those who have been indicted have been acquitted. In the conduct of these trials, the influence of Freemasonry has been constantly apparent; and the whole force of it has been exerted to exile truth and justice from their most consecrated altars.'

In previous paragraphs it is charged that all public functionaries were 'totally inactive through cowardice or corruption,' and that every effort was made to screen the guilty from punishment. Here it is acknowledged that some confessed their guilt, and we may as well add, that so far from truth in their assertion concerning the public functionaries, that BOWEN WHITING, Esq. a Mason, acted as prosecuting attorney in Ontario county, where indictments and convictions were had, by both confession and trial, before a special officer was appointed, and JUDGE THROOP, now acting Governor of this state, who held his office before and after the abduction, sentenced the convicted, using the following language, which neither manifests a disposition to screen the guilty nor to remain totally inactive:

'Your conduct has created, in the people of this section of the country, a strong feeling of virtuous indignation.—The court rejoices to witness it—to be made sure that a citizen's person cannot be invaded by lawless violence, without its being felt by every individual in the community. It is a blessed spirit, and we do hope that it will not subside; that it will be accompanied by a ceaseless vigilance and untiring activity, until every actor in this profligate conspiracy is hunted from his hiding place and brought before the tribunals of his country to receive the punishment merited by his crime. We think that we see in this public sensation the spirit which brought us into existence as a nation, and a pledge that our rights and liberties are destined to endure. But this is not all; your offence was not the result of passion suddenly excited, nor the deed of one individual. It was preconcerted, deliberated upon, and carried into effect, by the dictates of the secret councils and conclaves of many actors. It takes its deepest hues of guilt from a conspiracy—a crime most dreaded, from the depravity of heart it evinces, the power for unlawful purposes which it combines, and, from its ability to defy the power of the law, and ultimate danger to the public peace.'

As to acquittals, men have been convicted without testimony to warrant their conviction, but it is notorious that no man has been acquitted where there was the least proof to justify conviction. It is a painful truth that many have been indicted on mere suspicion, and suffered deeply from the same species of prejudice which this U. S. Antimasonic address seeks to inculcate among the people throughout the Union; that members of the Masonic fraternity; and other honorable citizens, have used their influence to preserve the innocent from incarceration we admit, but that the 'whole force of the influence of Freemasonry has been exerted to exile truth and justice from their consecrated altars,' or to screen guilt, is another black and demoniacal falsehood; another declaration without proof —an assertion which any one might make, but every one might not be able to clothe in the same ingenious garb.—Has this community become so callous as to tolerate such vile defamation? Will virtuous men—men who shrink from falsehood, prevarication, and meanness in any shape, hereafter, when they meet MYRON HOLLEY, and his coadjutors, extend to them the hand of fellowship, or will they spurn the canting hypocrites and base assassins of reputation from their presence?

MEDITATIONS.

A name! 'A rose by any other name
Would smell as sweet.' Ecotia's rustic plains
Though called 'fair Athens' would be rustic still.
The hard, rude hands of a base, vulgar mob
Change not their rudeness to the gentle touch
Of lady's glove; nor does their boorish speech
Take praise of merit, even when roared out
Where wise men meet. The fame of worthy sires
Marks with more prominence th' unworthy deeds
Of base, degenerate sons; as some dark spot
Is marked on surface of the mid-day sun,
And throws its shade upon the blaze of light.
The proud man's ancestry in honored line,
Gives higher color of respect to him
Where worth and virtue centre. 'Tis so fixed.
Dexter out sinister! A name, perchance!
If ambidexter that were base indeed!
Who joins our band, whatever his design,
Be it revenge, or disappointed hope,
Or dream of greatness, or a love of gain,
Or other selfish, sinistrous intent
The world calls guilty—him we dexter call.
With art most dexterous to touch each string
Of popular commotion; ring each change
Of dire events that catch a rattle's ear;
Direct suspicion's dark, malignant scowl;
Or draw from simple hearts injurious thoughts
And angry passions, that engender strife,
Discord and hate—the bane of social life.

The following candid remarks are from the Bedford, Penn. Gazette. Such antimasons are entitled to a hearing.

Again, our brother 'presumes that we have always professed ourselves to be truly antimasonic.' It is true that we have professed ourselves to be antimasonic, and we always shall be found consistent in our professions and practice. We shall oppose, as we ever have done, the establishment of any Lodge in the United States. We do not wish force, violence, falsehood or proscription resorted to, in order to effect this suppression; but wish it effected by the voluntary acquiescence of the members of the fraternity, and a decent respect for the opinions of the citizens inimical to the institution. There are many worthy men, and respectable members of society, who are conscientiously opposed to Freemasonry, and they should be convinced of their error or their prejudices should be respected. Yet probably, we ask too much. We are not Masons, and we know not what obligations may be imposed on Masons to abstain from a defence of their order. Certain it is, they have, as an association, exercised great dignity and forbearance in this universal excitement against them. We have not heard a single attempt by the order to defend themselves, though we have seen convention upon convention assembled to destroy them and render them odious to the people.

We do not justify the indiscriminate proscription of Masons as individuals. We cannot bring ourselves to imagine that the Masonic order exercises a dangerous influence upon the administration of our political institutions; nor can we believe, if we judge from what we know of individuals composing it, that such a result is likely to ensue. We cannot denounce as traitors to their country, as wretches covered with crime and infamy, men with whom we are in the habit of daily intercourse,—men whose morals we know to be pure, and whose political principles attach them enthusiastically to the institutions of the country.

'I was born of woman, and drew milk
As sweet as charity, from human breasts.
I think, articulate—I laugh and weep,
And exercise all functions of a man.
How then should I, or any man that lives,
Be strangers to each other? Pierce my vein:
'Take of the crimson stream meandering there,
And catechise it well; apply thy glass—
Search it, and prove now, if it be not blood
Congenial with thy own; and if it be
What edge of subtlety canst thou suppose
Keen enough, wise and skilful as thou art
To cut the link of brotherhood by which
One common Maker bound me to be kind?'

We will not interdict fire and water to one hundred thousand men and families, or whatever number the Masons may count in their order, because a few, say two or three, out of that number have been guilty of a crime for which they should be hung, and for which they are now suffering exile from their families, their homes and country.—We would think it quite as expedient and just to proscribe every antimason because two of those who signed the address of the Le Roy convention, denouncing Masons, have committed murder, since that act as to proscribe every Mason, because a few infatuated and guilty members of that fraternity murdered Morgan. Would it be just or reasonable to enter a crusade against the Presbyterians, the Catholics, or the Lutherans, because a few members of their society committed murder? It is as impossible to exclude bad men from a Lodge, as to exclude them from the sacred Altar. And yet we see in the Inquirer of the 24th ult. an attempt to excite a religious persecution against the Masons. A wretch who is so weak, and so profligate, as to justify such proceedings, merits and receives our execration.

We feel for Masons as we feel for other men. We apply to them the language of a reverend instrument: in peace they are our friends: if they declare war against us or our principles, they are our enemies. If he is fit and capable—if sound policy requires the election of a Mason we shall support him—if otherwise, we shall oppose him.

We think, however, that in the possibility of things, evil may at some future time arise to these states, from a body of men who feel as little disposed to suffer proscription as we ourselves. As they possess human passions, human frailties, and human energies, in common with us, we cannot calculate the consequence of a unity of action among an association so extensive in numbers and powerful in intellect; in case oppression or fancied oppression was to drive them to resistance. This is a mere possible case, and we are not certain that we are acting in the spirit of christian charity, which ought to be extended to all men, in supposing it a possibility. We see that some of the most conspicuous and valuable men of the late war, and of the revolutionary war, were Masons.—We instance LaFayette, Franklin, Washington, Jefferson, Generals Jackson, Pike and Covington, Mr. Clay, Commodores Decatur, Perry, M'Donough, &c. &c.

It would be a perversion of terms, it would be suggesting an absurdity, it would be insulting the patriotism of our readers to suppose such men capable of crime.

ANTIMASONIC RENUNCIATIONS.—A renunciation of Antimasonry by several young gentlemen of this county, will be found in another column, to which we invite the attention of all candid Antimasons. Those gentlemen espoused the cause of Antimasonry from an honest conviction that in so doing they were performing a solemn duty which they owed to their country and themselves. They pursued it, so long as the original object was kept in view. But when they found that it had become the mere hobby of broken down politicians, upon which every knave might ride, they, like honest men, abandoned it'.—[Freeman.]

From the Sacket's Harbor Gazette.
TO THE YOUNG MEN OF JEFFERSON.

The undersigned, young men, beg leave to address you upon a subject in which our mutual welfare, our future prospects and political characters are involved. We have no desire or intention to dictate, nor have we experience or ability to instruct, but with that friendly feeling and interchange of sentiment peculiar to juvenile days, we present our views, with the confident hope, that they may meet your approbation and receive your cordial support.

In the first commencement of the Morgan excitement (as it was called,) we were and still are opposed to Speculative Freemasonry, and believing as we then did, and now do, that a free citizen had been kidnapped and probably murdered by Masons, it cannot be a matter of surprise, that the importunities and specious arguments of the Antimasonic party led us into their ranks. We then believed them actuated entirely by a sacred regard for the laws of God and man, and the improvement of society.—But a few months experience has drawn aside the veil, and exposed to view, an unrelenting POLITICAL PARTY, CALLED ANTIMASONRY, whose leading principle and broad rule of action, is, 'rule or ruin.' It admits of neither distinction or qualification; the innocent and guilty, and virtuous are indiscriminately consigned to one common destruction; and although, many of our kindred friends, our neighbors and acquaintances whose reputations we had ever been taught to venerate as the Fathers and benefactors of our common country, the able defenders of our rights, the promoters of peace and good order in society, and the faithful guardians of our Republican institutions, were prominent Masons, and notwithstanding they are perfectly innocent of the outrage committed upon William Morgan, and openly deprecated the act, and denounced the perpetrators, yet they too, must bow their devoted heads, silvered over with the frosts of many winters, to the ANTIMASONIC ALTAR, and denounce, as UNHOLY and UNJUST, WICKED and UNPRINCIPLED, an institution they think sacred and good, or be consigned to political oblivion, infamy and disgrace, fit only to be numbered with those with whom 'murder is a duty and vengeance a sworn obligation.' To such political doctrines we, their sons and descendants, do hereby enter our unequivocal PROTEST. We have also witnessed in our families, our neighborhoods, towns, counties, and states the direful and all appalling consequences of Political Antimasonry. The husband against the wife, father against the son, brother against brother, and neighbor against neighbor; and could we stop here the picture would be less frightful; but is not the venerable and faithful preacher of the gospel, who has reared up and led his pious flock in peace from the earliest settlement of our country, driven from the sacred desk, or compelled hypocritically to denounce and renounce as unholy, an institution which he in his heart highly esteemed? The language of his church is confounded, and instead of peace, harmony and brotherly love, malice, jealousy, contention and Antimasonry reign triumphant. We are very far from attempting to sustain the institution of Masonry or advocating its doctrines, rites or ceremonies; but honestly believing that it ought not to have any connexion with politics we do solemnly renounce all political allegiance to Masonry and Antimasonry, and declare ourselves to be FREE and INDEPENDENT REPUBLICANS, and as such will give our votes for talents, integrity and ability, without reference to Masonry or Antimasonry.

[Signed—Moses Barnett, Hiram Barney, D. N. Barney, J. S. Leach, S. Euel, L. Gore, N. Burrell, Abel Bassett, J. Baker, S. Wilson, S. W. Clark, A. Johnson, C. Merriam, Wm. Briggs.]—Jefferson Co. Oct. 1830.

ANTIMASONRY.—We extract the following from the Albany Daily Advertiser: 'In the remarks which we have before made, respecting antimasonry, we particularly alluded to its baneful and deleterious character, as connected with its effects in politics; where it operated to the exclusion of men of worth, talent and ability, from all public office and to their degradation from all public confidence, for the reason that they happen to be Freemasons. We have now to remark on its destructive and blasting influence in a holier and more retired condition of man—namely, in RELIGION.

The following article from the Delaware Co. Gazette, exhibits an act which is, and cannot but be, the consequence of principles which upturn all the established modes and customs of society; it pourtrays the feelings which govern those who are influenced by that baneful spirit of bigotry, which, not confined to political affairs extends itself to the church of Christ; which, not content with excluding from civil office, men attached to certain associations, also deprives them of the consolation of sitting at the table of their crucified Lord, and partaking of the consecrated symbols of his body and blood.

Christians, as well as others, can now judge of the fiend-like effects of antimasonry; and they can suppose what the consequence will be of the elevation of the antimasonic party to power. 'If these things are done in the green what will be done in the dry?'

From the Delhi (Delaware co.) Gazette.

If additional proofs are necessary to satisfy the public of the deplorable effects that antimasonry has wrought in our country, we think that they may be found in the following statement:

On Sunday, the 3d inst. the sacrament was administered to the members of the church in Stamford, under the charge of the Rev. Mr. Forrest. According to custom, the Thursday preceding had been observed by the members as a fast, and on Saturday a preparatory sermon had been preached to the congregation, at which time tokens had been given out to those who were considered by their pastor as worthy of a seat at the table, and who were to be permitted to partake of the holy sacrament. When the members are seated at the table, these tokens are returned to the deacons of the church. On the occasion referred to, the members had taken their seats, and the persons designated for that purpose were about to administer, when the ceremonies were stopped, and Mr. Forrest remarked, that he had entirely forgotten one subject in addressing them; and then proceeded to announce, that all Freemasons were forbidden the communion table!

Mr. William M'Mullen, a member of the church, in good standing, but a Freemason, returned his token, withdrew from the table, and immediately left the house.

It is difficult to believe that a minister of the gospel could so far forget the dignity of his station, as to descend from the pulpit to engage in a political controversy, or lend himself to favor the views of an electioneering party. I would rather ascribe this extraordinary occurrence to the fact, that the reverend gentleman had been overpersuaded by the antimasonic members of his congregation, and perhaps compelled to join them in the crusade they were carrying on against a respectable portion of society, without due reflection, and against his better judgment.

Is antimasonry so presumptuous as to assume the sacred garb of religion, to conceal its unholy purposes? Or, have its fortunes become so desperate, that it needs the exclusive protection of the church to revive it and prolong an unnatural existence? When designing men attempt to convert religion into an engine to further their ambitious views, and to exclude, from an enjoyment of religious privileges, those who differ from them in their political sentiments, it is time that the people look around them, that they may be able to appreciate the objects of a faction, whose policy has been to distract and divide the community, and which invades even the sanctuary of the church with its polluting influence.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

'Their feet make haste to shed blood.'

ANTIMASONIC DOINGS.

A few weeks since, on Sunday, Dieffenderfer, (a Freemason) of New Holland, went to a camp-meeting, then holding below that place, to pass the Sabbath and hear the sermons that might be delivered on the occasion. After Mr. Dieffenderfer had been there some time, and walking in company with very respectable Antimasons, towards a group of persons, whom he considered his neighbors and friends, he was accosted by one of the gang, who said in substance, 'there comes another damned Mason'—when a response was sounded, signifying that 'Masons should all be killed. Mr. D. felt alarmed, knowing himself to be among none but Antimasons, and said, to allay the infernal fire that he saw kindling in the faces of his avowed enemies, 'men! not so hard—you certainly would not say so!' to which the answer and watchword, in consummation of the principles of their sworn creed, was given by these infuriated advocates of political Antimasonry—'kill him—kill the damned Mason; they should all be killed'—which expressions were followed up by strokes and blows of violence, inflicted on Mr. Dieffenderfer to such a degree that had not those gentlemen who went with him interfered, he would in all probability have shared the fate they had predetermined, by their wicked, abominable cut-throat oaths, for all who will not kneel to the Moloch of political Antimasonry.

We have been concise in this statement, but are determined to search out every fact connected with the murderous outrage. What we have said we can and will prove, by undoubted testimony. We have omitted names on account of the respectable families to which the men belong who stained their hands in the blood of a quiet citizen.

We ask a serious perusal of the above, and if such a party, possessed of such principles, and guilty of such acts, are suffered to pass unnoticed by a moral community, we are at a loss to account for the cause. Why have not the reformers of mankind, the Antimasonic newspapers of this county, taken this bloody outrage into question before this? It has not been kept quiet to their ears. If this is not satisfactorily answered by these 'right or wrong' gentlemen, we shall endeavor to do it ourself hereafter.—Lan. Pil. of Dem.

HEAR YE, HEAR YE, O, ANTIES!!

Be it remembered, That on Thursday the fourteenth instant, there assembled in our good city of Boston, to assist, in the ceremony of laying the Corner Stone for a Masonic Temple, Two Thousand, Two hundred and Sixty Seven Masons, 'good and true,' and formed themselves into a procession with banners and music, wearing those dreadful antirepublican badges: and joining in those awfully profane and antichristian rites.—How sad the spectacle! The pious Greene, we presume, wept tears of blood, and the Hon. and Rev. Thacher, with his truly benevolent co-workers in the cause of morals and apostacy, of benevolence and moral treason, 'groaned in spirit,' and almost despaired of their salvation. Compare this assemblage of honest men, with the famous State Convention in Faneuil Hall, or with the still more formidable self-styled National Convention at Philadelphia. In the one case we find 2267 brethren, distinguished among their friends and neighbors, for purity of life, and manners, voluntarily assembled on, short notice, to do honor to an institution they revere; and in the other, a company of delegates, commissioned by the disaffected, and riotous, illustrious only for their industrious attacks on the public peace—for their versatility of character—shameless violation of promises, and wanton aspersions of the virtuous and orderly. The Philadelphia Union, says, this great and numerous, and respectable National Convention assembled in a certain 'Music Saloon, having fifteen hundred seats, and there was no day or hour of their session, when thirteen hundred of them were not occupied.' This great convention, then, got up by dint of the most powerful exertions, and the bright prospect of a rich reward, numbered, delegates and spectators, the immense sum of of two hundred, Verily Masonry is 'going down.' O dear! O dear! friend Anti, 'what can the matter be.' Dr. Arcanum won't be governor this year, perhaps he may next, if he can make the good people believe his account of the death of Kennedy and Hunter.—Belchertown Sent.

It was positively predicted by some of the antimasonic papers, and no doubt confidently calculated upon, that the late elections would show a majority in favor of that cause in the Legislature—indeed a neighboring print claimed a majority of 26! in the House of Representatives alone.—The fallacy of their hopes, and erroneousness of their calculations, have been completely exposed. Out of the 26 members of Congress elected, they have but 6; out of the 93 members of the State Senate they have but 4; and out of the 100 members of the House of Representatives, they have elected but 26!—and three of the four members set down as antimasonic in Bucks county, are said not to be so—which reduces their number to 23.

THE BOQUET.

FEMALE INFLUENCE.

The following striking and eloquent remarks are from 'Suggestions on Education,' by Miss Catherine E. Beecher.

'Woman has been but little aware of the high incitements that should stimulate to the cultivation of her noblest powers. The world is no longer to be governed by physical force but by the influence which mind exerts over mind. How are the great springs of action in the political world put in motion? Often by the secret workings of a single mind, that in retirement plans its schemes and comes forth to execute them only by presenting motives of prejudice, passions, self-interest or pride, to operate on other minds. Now the world is chiefly governed by motives that men are ashamed to own. When do we find mankind acknowledge that their efforts in political life are the offspring of pride, and the desire of aggrandizement; and yet who hesitates to believe this is true?

But there is a class of motives that men are not only willing but proud to own. Man does not willingly yield to force; he is ashamed to own that he can yield to fear; he will not acknowledge his motives of pride, prejudice, or passion. But none are unwilling to own that they can be governed by reason; even the worst will boast of being regulated by conscience; and where is the person who is ashamed to own the influence of the kind and generous emotions of the heart? Here then is the only lawful field for the ambition of our sex. Woman in all her relations, is bound 'to honor and obey' those on whom she depends for protection and support, nor does the truly feminine mind desire to exceed this limitation of Heaven. But where the dictates of authority may never control, the voice of reason and affection may ever convince and persuade; and while others govern by motives that mankind are ashamed to own, the dominion of woman may be based on influences that the heart is proud to acknowledge.

And if it is indeed the truth that reason and conscience guide to the only path of happiness, and if affection will gain a hold on these powerful principles which can be attained no other way, what high and holy motives are presented to woman for cultivating her noblest powers. The development of the reasoning faculties, the fascinations of a purified imagination, the charms of a cultivated taste, the quick perceptions of an active mind, the power of exhibiting truth and reason by perspicuous and animated conversation and writing—all these can be employed by woman as much as by man. And with these attainable facilities for gaining influence, woman has already received from the hand of her Maker those warm affections and quick susceptibilities, which can most surely gain the empire of the heart.

Woman has never waked to her highest destinies and holiest hopes. She has yet to learn the purifying and blessed influence she may gain and maintain over the intellects and affections of the human mind. Though she may not teach from the portico, nor thunder from the forum, in her secret retirements she may form and send forth the sages that shall govern and renovate the world. Though she may not gird herself for bloody conflict, nor sound the trumpet of war, she may envelop herself in the panoply of Heaven, and send the thrill of benevolence through a thousand youthful hearts. Though she may not enter the lists in legal collision, nor sharpen her intellect amid the passions and conflicts of men, she may teach the law of kindness, and hush up the discords and conflicts of life. Though she may not be clothed as the ambassador of Heaven, nor minister at the altar of God, as a secret angel of mercy, she may teach its will, and cause to ascend the humble but most accepted sacrifice.'

GHOST STORY.

About four years ago, a colored female presented herself in the Police Office, and related under oath, without the least appearance of any aberration of intellect, the following story. She had been a servant in the employ of several highly respectable gentleman of this city, was married, and afterwards removed to Poughkeepsie. During the absence of her husband, a tall, slim man, with dark brown hair, and yellowish complexion, about 25, appeared to her one night, and stated that he had been killed by two females, who infused poison in some liquor he drank, and then robbed him of seventy dollars, and his gold watch worth about five hundred dollars. He then suddenly disappeared. In a few minutes she distinctly heard the patting of feet along the chamber floor, though she could not at first distinguish any object. At length the form became visible, as it moved towards her bed,—and when it began to address her, she observed that it was of a different person from the other, wrapped in a winding sheet, with light hair and pale blue eyes. It proceeded to inform her that he also had been murdered by the

GERTRUDE.

'Do you know, Gertrude, the opinion prevalent in the neighborhood, in regard to your friend Wilton?'

'Mother,' said Gertrude, with a forced composure, 'I know of nothing to his disadvantage. I know he has enemies here—bitter, implacable enemies, who would sacrifice him. I know too, that their tongues have not been idle—that defamation in its foulest nature has been plentifully bestowed upon a virtuous and high minded gentleman.'

'Gertrude,' said her mother, 'I know that the world sometimes condemns unjustly. I know that defamation has sometimes hunted down the pure and virtuous, and blackened the fair fame of the upright and praiseworthy. But, when so much is averred respecting Wilton, when friends and foes alike acknowledge his aberrations, the one by open attacks upon his reputation, the other by doubtful whispers, and expressions of regret, and an evident withdrawal of their former warm and confident friendship, we may justly fear that there is indeed some reason for such a change, that our young and ingenuous friend is yielding to the fascinations of vice; gliding gradually and imperceptibly down that fearful path, which leads from the perfect light of virtue and holiness.'

'I will not believe it—never,' replied Gertrude, her clear blue eye lightened up with unwonted energy. 'Mother, you are deceived, alike by the avowed enemies, and the false and envious friends of Charles Wilton who is virtuous and honorable. And who, let me ask, are those who traduce his character?' Her beautiful lip curled into an expression of ineffable scorn, as she replied to her own interrogatory—'False hearted wretches—creatures of envy and malice, who would as soon dare the falling thunderbolt, as confront the indignant glance of the man they have so foully injured.'

Gertrude spoke from the impulse of her heart. She could not believe that such a man as Charles Wilton could debase himself to the sin of drunkenness—that he whose nature was so noble—so elevated—a passionate lover of the beauty of the natural universe, and of the godlike manifestations of human virtue, the outbreking of the immortal spirit from the darkness of its prison-house, could by any possible temptations, yield to the baleful enticements of the destroyer, and humble the godlike image of manhood, lower than that of the 'brutes that perish.'

And was it, that when all her friends saw and warned her of her danger, she clung yet closer to the object of their fears? Why was it, when the bosom friends of Charles Wilton avoided him as if there were contamination in his very presence, that the beautiful and intellectual Gertrude welcomed his approach with a smile of deeper fondness? She loved him; and the love of a heart like hers changes not with the changes of the beloved; it burns brighter and warmer as the shadows of evil close around its object.

And Gertrude became the wife of Charles Wilton—and his victim also. She died early, but not before every beautiful blossom of her affection had perished; not before a deathlike withering had gone over her heart, till it became as dust, and all its warm and holy feeling gave place to bitterness and loathing and abhorrence. Oh, there is nothing in human suffering like wrong and scorn from those whom we love, and would die for; nothing which so changes and chills the confiding bosom.

And all this Gertrude felt, and her high spirit sank under the trial. She perished; but the last moments of her existence were unsoothed by the voice of affection. At times, indeed, a bloated and loathsome form bent over the pillow; the wreck of all which gives beauty and dignity to manhood—and a voice, hideous from drunkenness, murmured in her ear the disgusting words of an idiot's fondness—to be succeeded by the rude oath—the unfeeling jest—the same indifference to mortal suffering, which characterizes the lost, shameless drunkard.

Let woman beware of the Intemperate. Let her shun their presence as the accursed of Heaven—the smitten with that moral leprosy which is alike immedicable and unescapable. Let her remember that in uniting her destiny with that of the Drunkard, she is drawing down upon her head the heaviest of curses. It were better to embrace the sepulchre, whose cold halls are haunted only by the Spectre of Decay. It is the wedlock of beauty and pollution—of purity and pestilence—the binding of a breathing form of life to the loathsomeness of death.

THE DANDY.—If there is any object on earth deserving of especial contempt—of unqualified detestation, it is the modern fashionable exquisite ycleped in common parlance, a dandy. He is a thing made up of starch and linen—of whalebone and corset—the dressed puppet of the tailor and barber—a locomotive automaton whose ideas never rise higher than the arrangement of a dickey, or the display of a watch chain. Man he is not; woman he is not; human he can hardly be called. He is a weathercock turning in the variable atmosphere of fashion; soulless, heartless, and effeminate—a direct libel upon the human species. He can stand erect, and so can the Ourang Outang. He can grin and bow and chatter, and so can the monkey.

Yet, how often does a creature of this description—brainless and penniless—with no recommendation save his affected gentility and his fashionable exterior—become the lion of the day—the favorite of a village! Merit and talents give place to the miserable apology for manhood. Old friends are forgotten—intellect and honesty and sincerity of heart are overlooked in the presence of the mere shadow of a man—the handy work, not of nature, but, of the tailor. For him every voice is tuned to melody—every eye glances brighter—and every smile becomes sweeter. As if indeed, a dandy could appreciate aright delicate attention and refined sentiment! They might as well be bestowed upon the tenant of a Hottentot Kraal.—Your genuine dandy can no more raise his ideas to the standard of intellectual conversation, than a man of sense can tolerate his company. He is familiar with but one subject—his own dear self—to all others he is an entire stranger. In the discussion of ordinary topics his countenance has all the wonder and vacancy of an idiot's.

It is strange that such beings are tolerated in respectable society. Without a single trait of character worthy of admiration—with no positive evidence of possessing a single quality of mind above those of the brute creation—they certainly deserve little from the hands of a civilized community.

same females, and robbed of $180:—that he was levelled by them with a huge pounder, and after being beaten to death, was enclosed in a large Russia sheet and thrown by two men into the dock near New Slip, on the East River. The phantasm, as it finished the relation, underwent a horrible change, and disappeared, leaving her spell bound and terrified at what she had heard and seen. A third time a similar tread was heard upon the floor, and a figure of marble look and deathlike cheeks, apparently about 45, stood beside her. It told her that he was the third victim of the unhallowed crimes of the two females and their associates:—that they rushed on him with drawn knives, uttering horrid imprecations, and buried them in his blood; he staggered and fell; and though he lifted up his hands for mercy as he was in the agonies of death, they only plunged their knives the deeper, until he fell back and expired.

The deponent gave names, dates and places, and accompanied her story with appropriate expressions of horror at the crimes, and invoked the eternal judgment of Heaven upon the heads of the perpetrators. She had come down from Dutchess county, she said, for the sole purpose of giving this information:—she had no peace day or night, and the same image often appeared to her.

The Magistrate had her statement recorded, and as there was nothing in her manner or deportment to believe her insane, he regarded it as an idle illusion of the imagination.

About the middle of last week, an elderly man of very respectable appearance, about sixty years of age, in the garb of a Quaker, entered the Police office, accompanied by a good-looking colored woman, and called one of the magistrates aside, telling him they had a revelation of horrible import to communicate. They were interrogated by Mr. Stephens, the chief clerk, who soon recognized the resemblance of their story to the features of the one he had heard about four years ago. The female related the same details, agreeing in manner, dates, &c. with surprising accuracy. The Quaker declared that he had known the woman who came with him, about five years; and had often been told by her that a number of persons had been murdered in this city, whose ghosts had, at various times, appeared to her, haunting and distressing her. That he was fully satisfied of the truth of her story, believing that beings of another world may have communion with this, and possess a power to mingle in the transactions of men, to an extent of which we are necessarily ignorant:—That he himself was once accosted in Broadway, and asked for a few pence, by what he at first supposed to be a man, dressed like an old revolutionary soldier, who suddenly disappeared, leaving no doubt in his mind it was a ghost; and that he was apprehensive if the murderers spoken of had a chance, they would kill both him and the woman; That he had conversed with one of the men described as a participator in the murder, who had admitted to him that he saw a man murdered in Thomas st., and that the drops of blood had never been washed from the floor where it was perpetrated.

Such is the substance of the story, which we give in its true colors, without gloss or exaggeration.—It affords a remarkable instance of the power of imagination over a mind in other respects rational.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 6, 1880.

SHERIFF SUMNER.

We did think that the celebrity given to the letter addressed by Mr. Sumner to the Suffolk Antimasonic Committee a year ago, was sufficient to satisfy the reasonable ambition of a younger aspirant for public notoriety, than is the worthy 'Sheriff of the County of Suffolk.' But it appears that we were in error; and are now called on to acknowledge our temerity in presuming to prescribe bounds to the ambition even of an old man. For aught that we can perceive, the fire of ambition burns as freely in the breast of Mr. Sumner at this time, as it did a 'quarter of a century ago.' His desire to figure in the columns of a newspaper, appears to be as unconquerable now, as we may readily imagine it to have been then. This may not be generally regarded in the light of a laudible ambition; yet, as no very serious consequences are likely to result from its indulgence, we are disposed to favor Mr. Sumner, to a reasonable extent, in this particular. If we can render the evening of his days more calm and happy than was the dawn of thereof, by transmitting his name to posterity through the columns of the Mirror, to refuse him so small a boon, were a breach of kindness in us, to which our 'heart is a stranger.' We do not hold the pen of a Homer, and shall not therefore attempt to immortalize his name, as the name of Achilles was immortalized. Nor shall we, like the eulogist of the immortal Grimes, portray his personal peculiarities nor sing his sheriffic exploits in 'doggerel stanzas.' For, though this course were honored by the ancients and, (as doth appear from the case of the venerable Grimes,) has been approbated and followed by modern writers, Mr. Sumner, somewhat singularly regarding it as a custom 'more honored in the breach than in the observance,' has once rejected the proffered services of an eminent friendly poet! It were temerity then to presume that he would take it kindly in us, were we to attempt to tell his virtues in song. We must, therefore, yield to the better judgment of him whom we would place among the gods; though, inasmuch as he is himself a poet of no inferior pretensions, we cannot but acknowledge our surprise at his determination. What we can do, however, in the way of honest prose, to gratify his ambition, we shall hold ourselves in readiness to attempt. In accordance with this sentiment, we republish his letter to the editor of the Daily Evening Transcript:—

"BOSTON, 25th Oct. 1880.

SIR:—I am sorry to see that you have copied in the Transcript, of Thursday Evening, Oct. 21, a doggerel stanza, in which a reflection upon the City Police is attributed to me. The words are these:

Now our Police is quite too weak,
With Otis at their head, sir,
To still a secret, lawless mob.
As Sheriff Sumner said, sir.

The appearance of that stanza in your paper, gives it a claim to my attention, which it would not otherwise possess; but I should not object to it, if it had been printed without its second and fourth lines. In these, the writer has yielded himself more to the guidance of his rhyme, than of his reason. I am not addicted to the use of disparaging language of any Chief Magistrate; and my heart is a stranger to the sentiment towards Mr. Otis, which is thus unkindly put in my mouth."

I am, sir, your respectful servant,

C. P. SUMNER.

If Mr. Sumner were really sorry, as he declares himself to be, that the editor of the Transcript, had copied the 'doggerel stanza, in which a reflection upon the City Police is attributed to him,' it were sufficient for him simply to disavow his knowledge of the author, and his approbation of the calumnious reflection. This was the only proper course for him to pursue, if indeed any notice were required of him. As the case now stands, it does not appear that Mr. Sumner regrets that the reflection was made, but is sorry that it is attributed to him! Does he not, in fact, approbate the libellous reflection cast by the writer of the stanza upon the character of the City Police? It seems to us that he assumes precisely the same ground, in this, as is assumed by his antimasonic friends in regard to the Masonic Institution. Their practice is to seize upon the great body of the Masonic fraternity, and belie, calumniate and villify them in the most opprobrious manner; and when confronted or called on to give a tangible shape to their base and groundless charges, they sneak away, like cowardly poltroons as they are, and shield themselves from responsibility, and the punishment due to their villany, behind the plea that their abusive criminations are alleged against the Institution, and not against its members!—So with the Sheriff. While Mr. Otis' name is connected with the calumny intended to reflect on the Police, the charge is tangible and a degree of responsibility rests on the reputed author. But remove Mr. Otis' name, so that the reflection shall fall on the Police, as a body, and Mr. Sumner will not object to the printing of the calumny!

Mr. Sumner says he is 'not addicted to the use of disparaging language of any Chief Magistrate.' We would be very much obliged to him if he would inform us what there is disparaging in the following lines:

'With Otis at their head, sir,
As Sheriff Sumner said, sir.'

We can discover nothing in them very disparaging either to the 'Chief Magistrate' or to the Chief Sheriff. They convey no distinct idea at all: they are alike harmless and ridiculous. Whatever, then, there may be of 'disparaging language' in the whole 'doggerel stanza,' is contained in the following lines, to the printing of which Mr. Sumner has no objection:

'Now our Police is quite too weak,
To still a secret, lawless mob.'

Mr. Otis is a constituent part of 'our Police,' and when that is scandalized by 'disparaging language,' the 'reflection' falls upon him as much as upon any other member of that body, whether he be personally designated or not. It seems to us that the case stands thus: 'Our Police' has been basely and falsely assailed as weak and inefficient, by some obscure antimasonic 'doggerel stanza' writer; and to this calumny Sheriff Sumner has imprudently, and perhaps unconsciously, given his approbation. He, therefore, has tacitly assumed the responsibility of the anonymous author; by which means he has given to the infamous scandal an importance and a consequence which it does not merit, and which it would not otherwise have obtained. For the consequences Mr. Sumner is, therefore, personally responsible. And until he declares that, in sanctioning the parts of the stanza last quoted, he did not design to sanction the accusation therein contained; that, in approbating the printing of the stanza, 'without its second and fourth lines,' he 'yielded himself more to the guidance of his rhyme, than of his reason,' he must be considered as having preferred a serious charge against the Police of the City.

Mr. Sumner says that the appearance of the stanza in the Transcript, gave it a claim to his attention. We do not think so. It was not entitled to the serious attention of any gentleman, much less one of official character and standing. We do not believe that the editor of the Transcript published it, because he considered it of any consequence; but merely to show the shameful and disreputable measures resorted to by the antimasonic cabal in this city, to ridicule and calumniate the members of the Masonic Institution. Nobody believed that Mr. Sumner ever made the accusation there imputed to him, nor would any man, in his senses, have given credit to the declaration at all, had it not received the sanction of the 'Sheriff of the County of Suffolk.' The people now have a right to believe it. Mr. Sumner, who, from his official capacity, is presumed to be thoroughly conversant with the facts in the case, has given a degree of credit to the charge which it did not before possess. He has virtually arraigned the Police of the city, and pronounced it 'too weak to still a secret, lawless mob!' If this be the fact, it is time that measures were taken to render it more efficient. But we do not believe that it is so. We believe it to be fully adequate to quell even the riots that may grow out of the vile principles of antimasonry; and Mr. Sumner ought to know that it can never be called upon to encounter anything more desperate. We do not, therefore, believe that Mr. Sumner, more than Mr. Otis, was required to take any notice of the infamous slander. Did we not believe that the Sheriff was a gentleman of principles too honorable for such an act, we should be more ready to admit that, influenced by a kindred sympathy for a brother poet, he was apprehensive that the ill-favored bantling would of itself sink into obscurity, unknown and unhonored; and that, out of compassion, he had seized upon it, in its expiring moments, with the fond hope that he might be able to give to it at least a temporary existence and a temporary notoriety. It had been far better, had it been left to die, where it received its birth, in ignorance and infamy.

In conclusion, will Mr. Sumner inform us what he means by a secret mob? To us a secret mob is an anomaly in society; a thing before unknown and unheard of. We fear the gentleman has given himself up entirely to the 'guidance of his rhyme.' There certainly is poetry in his public letters.

HON. CHRISTOPHER WEBB.

A stronger case of political turpitude has never fallen under our observation, than that presented by the Honorable Christopher Webb, of Weymouth, during the recent election of Representative to Congress from Plymouth county. On the 12th ult. a convention of the republican citizens was held at Halifax, for the nomination of a candidate. The most influential and active members of the convention were Masons. The chairman and secretary were both Masons. A committee, consisting of seven, among whom were four Masons and Mr. Webb, were appointed to report resolutions expressive of the sentiments of the convention, and to draft an address to the electors. Among the resolutions reported was one recommending the Hon. John Quincy Adams as a suitable person to represent that ancient district. Another set forth that the acceptance of the trust, by Mr. Adams, would confer peculiar lustre upon his character as an American patriot and republican citizen, and afford a practical illustration of the beautiful theory of our free institutions. It is not probable that the question of Masonry or antimasonry was broached at this convention; for here we see Masons, who were in the majority, working with an honorable antimason to promote the election of Mr. Adams, who is claimed by that party; with how much truth we neither know nor care. Everything went on harmoniously and smoothly, and Mr. Adams accepted the nomination. We will now turn the canvas:

On the 19th ult. seven days subsequent to the meeting at Halifax, an antimasonic convention was held at Abington. The Honorable Christopher Webb, who had been acting with the Masons at Halifax, was appointed chairman of a committee to report resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting. These resolutions are before us: and a more abusive, and slanderous string of lies, (we use plain language for fear of being misunderstood,) never emanated from the mouth of the most polluted wretch, be he antimason or not. The only object of this committee seems to have been a determination to wilfully slander and villify the Masonic institution. Seven resolves were brought forth by this disinterested committee—with the Honorable Christopher Webb at its head—to the following effect. The first was against the advocates and adherents of a secret society, stained with crimes and infected with the dangerous principles of Speculative Freemasonry. The second was simply an alteration of Mr. Webster's celebrated Bunker-Hill address:

'Resolved, That we will sacrifice all political differences of opinion on the altar of patriotism and public weal! and hereafter give our suffrages to those candidates only, who, unfettered by secret obligations to the interest of a few, will faithfully serve the people, the whole people, and nothing but the people.'

Now, for the soul of us, we cannot understand the classical diction of the above resolve. The anties have asserted, time and again, that neither their object nor their acts were political; and yet, they now intend to sacrifice all political differences of opinion by voting politically against the Masons! who are not to be represented, because, forsooth, they are not the people, the whole people, and nothing but the people! This is disinterested patriotism with a vengeance! They should have commenced thus: 'We will sacrifice all the generous emotions of the heart on the altar of persecution, to the disturbance of the public weal!'

The third resolve is a lie: it asserts that the doings of the State and National Antimasonic Conventions were withheld, &c. owing to 'a slavish subserviency to the interests of Masonry, and a mean disregard of the general welfare.' We beg leave to refer these gentlemen to our own Masonic paper; when, on so doing, they will stand convicted of telling a downright lie; for there we have given their doings in their true colors—we have there told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Resolved, That a newspaper, unshackled by Masonic influence, [but devoted exclusively to and shackled by antimasonic disinterestedness] and which shall contain articles usually embraced in those of the day, would be deserving of, and receive the generous support of an enlightened public!

Here is another resolve; recollect it is not political.

Resolved, That committees of vigilance and safety be appointed in the several towns in this district, whose duty it shall be to protect our rights and interests at the polls.'

Nor is the following political—we would not wish any one to believe that this is political:

Resolved, That ballots shall be prepared and distributed, at every future election, by the committee of vigilance,' &c.

We now come to the last resolution, to which is prefixed a preamble, to which the Honorable Christopher Webb has the honor of having his name affixed:—it is a beautiful document, and will 'afford a practical illustration of the beautiful theory of our free institutions.' It sets forth that many citizens in the ancient district are 'desirous of exhibiting a testimonial of respect to our late President and distinguished fellow citizen, John Quincy Adams, by tendering to his acceptance the highest political honor in their gift, a testimonial of his long and arduous duties in the service of the republic, discharged with singular fidelity and zeal to his constituents and to their entire acceptance: and whereas we have reason to believe, that he has already been made to drink of the bitter cup of MASONIC PROSCRIPTION,' &c.!! We would merely ask whether the exertions of the Masons at Halifax, with whom Mr. Webb acted, to promote the election of Mr. Adams, looked like proscription?

We will quote one sentence more, merely to exhibit the honorable gentleman's regard for truth, in its proper light:—'Whereas the Masonic Fraternity, to whom this communication was addressed, [an insultingly ridiculous communication, from the still more ridiculous State Convention,] have treated the same with contemptuous neglect, [and so it ought to have been treated—so ought the ravings of the whole antimasonic rabble be treated,] and so far from showing a disposition to relieve the public mind of its anxiety and alarm at the existence of secret societies thus constituted, did, on the 14th inst. come out in the streets of the metropolis arrayed in all the gorgeous and military trappings of the order, with the avowed purpose to commence the erection of a Temple, in which to celebrate their unholy rites and to preserve and perpetuate their blood-stained institutions in this ancient commonwealth, in defiance of public opinion; thereby exhibiting a fixed determination to maintain principles and practices at war with Christianity, Morality, Equal Rights, and the Laws of the Land.'

These sentiments are subscribed to by the Honorable Christopher Webb, of Weymouth. During the whole controversy, we have never seen anything in this section of the country, more palpably wicked and base.

PENNSYLVANIA.—So complete is the overthrow of antimasonry in Pennsylvania that the papers of that State consider it very doubtful whether the Antimasons succeeded at the late election in selecting a single member, either to Congress or the State Legislature, on the strength of their own party. Last year, Ritner tied Wolf for Governor, in one county, but R. was then voted for because he was anti-Jackson and not because he was antimasonic. So this year, where they have succeeded, it was by the aid of other parties who were left no choice but to vote for the antimasonic candidates or those of their political opponents. To effect their object, the leaders of that party have been as regardless of everything like consistency, as careless and reckless in assertion and abuse. They assumed, as best suited their views, democracy, federalism, Jacksonism, or Clayism—and 'careerred over the character of the living and the fame of the dead,' without remorse, and almost without opposition.

Ritner has been beaten, fairly, fully and forever. The fabric of antimasonry is demolished! The pillar is overthrown, and the giant lies crushed beneath it!! The National Gazette says: 'It appears from the election returns, that the antimasonic party have been GENERALLY AND SIGNALLY BEATEN in this commonwealth.'

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS.—Hon. Nathan Appleton was elected on Monday to represent this District in the Congress of the United States. In Essex South District, Hon Rufus Choate has been elected over Benj. W. Crowninshield. Mr. C. was honored with the support of the antimasonic party. Might this not be the cause of the loss of his re-election? The people begin to think that the candidate who courts or is willing to receive the aid of antimasonry, is of doubtful honesty and qualifications, and had better remain in private life. In Essex North there is no choice.—In Middlesex, Hon. Edward Everett is re-elected. In Norfolk, Gen. H. A. S. Dearbon, whose nomination the anties say, 'was procured by Masonic influence and intrigue,' has been elected by a large majority over the Honorable Moses Thacher—the antimasonic political priest. Thanks to the virtue of the people, this man's race is run! In Worcester South, Messrs Davis and Kendal are re-elected. Pliny Merrick received one hundred and three votes! This man is sinking away even faster than we could wish, and heaven knows that's not slow! In Plymouth, ex-President Adams is probably elected.

Our fellow townsman, Dr. S. G. Howe, whose letters from Greece a few years since were very generally read and admired, witnessed the late revolutionary scenes in Paris, and at the last accounts was at Brussels, whence he writes to a friend in Providence in the following terms:—

'You will perceive by the public prints what is the state of things here. All Belgium in arms, with the complete possession of the country, stands in a cool and dignified, but determined attitude, and demands of her King, complete political, legislative and executive separation from Holland; professing and really feeling an attachment to the present dynasty; agreeing to be governed by the King, or his son, but to be governed separately from Holland.—They are not seeking for union with France, nor to overthrow the dynasty, but to erect Belgium into a kingdom.

The grounds of their complaints are many, and most just. The reasons for a separation are unanswerable—inequality of taxation; inequality of representation; disgraceful preference given to the Dutch in all appointments; denial of the principle of ministerial responsibility, and maintenance of the principle of the personal inviolability of the King; difference of language; difference of interests; difference of religion, and entire difference in feelings.—These are the charges brought against the government, and the reasons adduced by the Belgians for demanding a separation from Holland. Were I to dwell on them, in detail, I could, from almost any one of them, make out a cause sufficient for discontent and resistance. Belgium, with four millions, is represented by 55 deputies to the Etats Generaux: while Holland, with less than two millions, has the same number. Nineteen twentieths of the public officers are Dutch; Belgium helps pay the interest of the debts of Holland, contracted before the union; she pays her part for public works; for colonial expenses, of which Holland reaps almost the sole benefit; and government has been persisting in the absurd attempt of forcing the Belgians to speak Dutch, a language they hate as they do a Dutchman—it is made essential to almost every office of profit or trust.'

THEATRE.—The manager, in the absence of those brilliant luminaries which occasionally appear in the dramatic horizon denominated 'stars,' has been compelled to rely upon resources more immediately at command, for the supply of that variety so necessary to fix the attention of the lovers of novelty, and though he may not have succeeded in attracting 'crowds' to his entertainments, such as have been present, have one and all, borne testimony of his liberality in catering for the theatrical appetite and to the excellence of the viand spread before them. Several new pieces have been produced, in which the whole talent of the company has been concentrated. 'The Brigand,' is universally admired for its interesting plot—its pleasing, chorusses and its beautiful scenery. The 'Drunkard's Fate' and 'Maurice the Woodcutter,' are stories whose moral should leave a lasting impression on the mind. They will undoubtedly occupy the stage for a long time. Other novelty is in rapid progress. That enchanting songstress, Miss Clara Fisher, is again amongst us, and we trust that attainments like her's will not be neglected by Bostonians.

TREATMENT OF LUNATICS IN THE NETHERLANDS.—At the distance of some miles from Mechlin is the village of Heel, where the treatment of lunatics is conducted on a principle that might be attended with advantage if acted upon elsewhere. The patients instead of being confined in a separate building, are given in charge to the farmers inhabiting the village, who receive a yearly stipend for their superintendence, and who employ the poor creatures intrusted to them in such agricultural works as are suitable to their state of mind. The result has been extremely satisfactory; the apparent freedom from restraint, the salubrity of the place, the constant but general exercise, the enjoyment of the open air, the combined employment of mind and body, all together have restored many to the use of their faculties, who have been pronounced incurable according to the customary modes of treatment.—

Accounts from Bogota to the 28th August, have been received by the way of Jamaica and Havana. The papers contain a proclamation of Bolivar on his leaving his retirement to fulfil his duties as a citizen and soldier. A battle had been fought near Bogota between his troops and those of the government. The city had capitulated to the former. Persons and property were guaranteed by the conquerors.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—'Franklin' writes on a subject of which we have no personal knowledge; his remarks therefore cannot at present appear. It is a rule with us, to know our correspondents or to know the facts which they state. These are times when the responsibility attached to anonymous signatures, is of very little consequence. If Franklin will make himself known to us, his communication shall appear, otherwise its publication must be delayed, until we can satisfy ourselves of its correctness.

Our friend who 'deems it of importance to furnish us with information' touching the base transactions of our persecutors, will accept our acknowledgment of his kindness;—the matter, however, to which he refers, is not of sufficient consequence to require animadversion—it carries its own antidote about with it.

We had prepared a paragraph, and had it put in type, in answer to the inquiries put to us some weeks since, by our brother of the Vermont Advocate; but it was crowded out from week to week, until it was finally crowded into the case again. It is sufficient at this late day to assure him that he was correct in his conjectures.

THE WREATH.

THE ROSE IN AUTUMN.

Gem of the mildly closing year,
On nature's breast reclining,
Oh! who would leave thy mildness here,
For bowers in beauty shining?
Bloom then along thy native hill,
By no rude hand invaded;
Thy flowers, like hope, shall flourish still,
When all, but thine, have faded.

Go—wreath the pensive form that lies
O'er love's last mansion bending,
And sinks, like day in summer skies,
Or evening star descending:
Smile on her humble couch of rest—
And droop not thus in sorrow,
For sure the regions of the blest
Shall be her home to-morrow.

Go—and with the fading garlands bind,
The dark, stern brow of madness?
And melt the joy-deserted mind
To more than childhood's sadness:
Tell her of him whose lowly grave
Shall meet her dark eye never;
His pillow is the stormy wave,
The deep his home forever!

Then rest thee, Autumn's lingering flower,
In life's lost fragrance lying,
And droop along thy golden bower,
Still lovely, though in dying;
And thou shalt seem, while fading there,
In ruin calm reposing,
Like virtue on this scene of care
Her weary eyelids closing!

[By Mrs. S. J. Hale.]

THE TWO MAIDENS.

One came—with light and laughing air,
And cheeks like opening blossom,
Bright gems were twined amid her hair,
And gittered on her bosom
And pearls and costly bracelets deck
Her round white arm and lovely neck.

Like summer's sky with stars bedight,
The jewelled robe around her;
And dazzling as the noontide light
The radiant zone that bound her:
And pride and joy were in her eye,
And mortals bowed as she passed by.

Another came—o'er her mild face
A pensive shade was stealing,
Yet there no grief of earth we trace,
But that deep holy feeling,
Which mourns the heart should ever stray
From the pure fount of Truth away.

Around her brow, as snow-drop fair,
The glossy tresses cluster,
Nor pearls nor ornaments were there,
Save the meek spirit's lustre—
And faith and hope beamed from her eye,
And angels bowed as she passed by.

Storms kiss the clouds above,
And zephyrs kiss the flowers,
Streams kiss their banks—and love,
Love kisses hearts like ours;
Since all nature then is kissing,
Why should we alone be missing?
Come, my dear, ere life be spent,
Let us kiss and be content.

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

U. S. ANTIMASONIC ADDRESS.

[Concluded.]

'What a fool art thou,
A ramping fool; to brag, to stamp, and swear,
Upon my party.'

We continue our remarks. After complimenting the virtuous John C. Spencer, in alluding to his services, and that of others, connected with the trials growing out of the abduction of William Morgan, the address says: 'Many Masons called as witnesses, have notoriously committed perjury.' Our readers, who are familiar with these trials, who have had the advantage of learning all the facts which have been elicited in courts and elsewhere, will only be surprised at the callous indifference, manifested by this self-constituted Congress, to truth and veracity; indeed, after learning the name of the writer, we do not know that they will be surprised at anything. It is the first that we have heard any witness, who was a Mason, connected with the trials, charged with the crime of perjury, with one exception, and that of a man whom they know to be innocent, and whom they dare not bring to trial, because convinced that his innocence will be made to appear; and we assert, without the fear of contradiction from any honorable source, that if there is any well-founded suspicion of perjury, it is against the seceding Masons; in fact, it is notorious that Samuel D. Greene, a seceding Mason, did perjure himself in swearing that he saw John Sheldon, (who was convicted and sentenced in Ontario county,) at Batavia on a particular day, when Sheldon was in Canandaigua.

We quote, again:

'Morgan's blood was shed without any pretence that he had infringed the laws of the land, and with little or no private malice, on the part of those by whom he fell. The persons most deeply implicated in the guilt of his fall were industrious, intelligent, and reputable citizens, bound to life and to society by all the usual ties. They did not proceed hastily nor adopt their ultimate decision, without manifest and painful reluctance. Before they took his life, they deliberated earnestly, frequently, and long, upon their Masonic obligations. These obligations they thought binding. He had certainly and essentially violated them. The unanimous result of all their deliberations was, that he must die. And in the understanding of all Masonic exposition, as well as of common sense, if the obligations were binding, they were right in their decision.'

More additional assertions relative to Morgan's blood having been shed, supported by facts relative to the speculative opinions of the abductors and murderers, without proof of any such thing having ever taken place. A handsomely wrought paragraph, without a word of truth in it, and here we have another of the same texture:

'A brave man had determined to reveal the secrets of Freemasonry; and as he could not be prevented otherwise, his life was taken, in conformity with his Masonic laws. Having gone thus far, in transgression, the titular dignitaries of the order had less reluctance in going further. Accordingly, by banter, ridicule, and misrepresentation, they endeavored to repress all inquiry into their conduct. Finding themselves not wholly successful in this they prepared, as well as they could, for the exigencies of that judicial investigation which they were not able to avoid.'

Respecting Morgan's bravery, we are as ignorant as we are of the bravery of Myron Holley, but it was composed of the same material, a disposition to prevaricate, retail and wholesale falsehood, and swindle the public, it was of no very enviable character. Admitting, for argument's sake, that his life was taken, how directly in opposition to the testimony of seceding Masons, examined on the trials at Albion and Lockport, is the assertion, that it was taken in conformity with his Masonic laws. Their evidence was full and clear, that there was no obligation binding members of the order to shed the blood of a seceding brother—the candidate might imprecate judgments on his head, but no one agreed to execute those judgments. The balance of the paragraph is worth precisely as much as the two periods we have commented upon.

'The most prominent of the criminals fled. One of them confessing himself stained with the murder, and claiming assistance from a Masonic body, in the city of New York, received it, and was effectually aided to escape to a foreign country. Some confessed themselves guilty of subordinate offences, to prevent the examination of witnesses, whom they knew able to establish, in detail, the foulest. Able standing counsel were employed by the fraternity, to defend the criminals. Those who were convicted, were subjects of the deepest Masonic sympathy, and received frequent aids, from organised bodies of their brethren.'

A man who publishes himself to the world as a perjured villain, and obtains his bread by exhibiting himself and performing some indecent gambols, swears that he heard a Mason assert facts similar to those contained in the two first periods of the above paragraph. The remainder of the paragraph is in good keeping. The same persons who confessed themselves guilty have since been examined and testified to all they knew. No organised body of Masons have aided the convicted.

'While these various acts identified the institution at large, with the well known criminals, and exhibited the true principles of the association, high individual Masons, and high bodies of the fraternity, were guilty of the grossest arts of deception to mislead the public, and save the institution. Thompson and Ganson, who were active conspirators in the abduction of Morgan, and the outrages accompanying it, signed a notice offering a reward of one hundred dollars for the conviction of the offender who set fire to the printing office! The grand royal arch chapter of the state of New York, resolved that individually and as a body, they disclaimed all knowledge or approbation of the abduction of William Morgan.'

Will the writer, or any of the members of the convention, name a high Mason or any high body of the fraternity who were guilty of gross arts of deception to mislead the public? What evidence have they that Thompson or Ganson were active conspirators in the abduction. It was illegally indicted and has never been tried, and how very charitable to advertise a man in this way as guilty, without giving him a hearing. It is in character with antimasonry to heap censure upon every member of the fraternity who is guilty of a praiseworthy action, and to fancy they discover something criminal in their well-doing.

'And several committees of lodges, chapters, and encampments, in public addresses, pretended to surrender their charters, in pursuance of public opinion, while in secret, individuals employed on these committees, at the time, and afterwards, exerted every influence in their control to sustain the institution.'

Fellow citizens, is this true? Did the Masonic fraternity, here, pretend to surrender their charters and not do it: look around you, and answer the question, whether the highly reputable members of this community who composed these committees—many of them men whom you are proud to recognise as neighbors, and boast of as the pride and the prop of Western New York, are capable of believing their professions? In this instance, at least, the viper 'bites a file.' We select another paragraph:

'When good men join the Masonic society, and inconsiderately swear to obey its injunctions, without knowing what they are, as every Mason does, they imagine there must, of course, be a reservation in favor of all civil and social duties.' But this is a total mistake. The first oath, and many others in the series, fatally precludes it. It is a part of the language of the oaths, that the specific engagement contained in them shall all be performed, 'without any mental reservation, equivocation, or self-evasion in mind whatever.' And any brother who does not so perform them voluntarily subjects himself to the punishment of death.'

When good men join the Masonic society, they know there is a reservation in favor of all civil and social duties. Look to the evidence of seceding Masons, wherever they have been put under oath in a court of justice, and it will be found that they are informed, previous to taking the oath, that they are to construe nothing therein contained, 'to interfere with their civil, religious and political duties'—it will be found that they are to be 'good citizens, good and loyal subjects'—that they are to be 'just and virtuous, benevolent and charitable,' and that 'the Bible is given to the candidate as a rule and guide of his conduct.' 'The first oath, and many others in the series,' in conjunction with the charges, place these things beyond all doubt, even by the testimony of seceding Masons.—However strong the obligations of the Masonic society may be to encourage virtue and promote friendly intercourse among worthy men, they become powerless when applied to a vicious purpose—it neither obstructs the course of justice, nor conflicts with the established and salutary institutions of our country; to use the language of a seceding Mason, Dr. Joseph R. Brown, under oath, 'THE OBJECT OF THE MASONIC INSTITUTION IS TO ACCOMPLISH THE GOLDEN RULE.' So much for the veracity of the last paragraph, and now for an extract from the oath of a royal arch Mason as laid down in this address:

'I will promote a companion royal arch Mason's political preferment, in preference to another of equal qualifications. A companion royal arch Mason's secrets, given me in charge as such, and I knowing them to be such, shall remain as secure and inviolable in my breast as in his own, murder and treason not excepted, &c.'

There is no such clause in the royal arch oath, by the testimony of seceding Masons. The words political preferment, when, under oath, they say is not to be found in it; and instead of murder and treason NOT excepted, they say it is 'murder and treason excepted.' The address proceeds with similar misrepresentations, through a great variety of degrees, the principal part of which are taken from Elder Bernard's 'Light on Masonry,' in which he pretends to reveal the secrets of innumerable degrees, which abound with the most horrid BLASPHEMY, and the most vindictive and dissolute principles. Of the truth or falsity of his revelations, as we have before said, we know nothing: it will be remembered that he bore the character of a minister of the everlasting Gospel, when he embraced the blasphemous and irreligious rites which he details, a circumstance which will add but little to the respectability of his character. Of the history of his revelations we have heard something; it has long been known to the body of the Masonic Fraternity that there were a few men in this country, who were endeavoring to disseminate absurdities. Bernard's Illuminism, as we trust and believe this blasphemy will be known in history, is the offspring of the German Illuminati, and was introduced into this country some years since, at the south, by a citizen of France, and at New-York by a Jew; and serious attempts were made to engraft it upon the Masonic Institution; but it was soon discovered that its principles were altogether at war with the institution, and that they would no more unite than oil and water. Its progress was checked, and its ridiculous and visionary principles have been confined to a few—a very few—it never had the countenance of the Masonic fraternity as a body, and its dissemination was actively opposed by the different royal arch chapters in the country. Elder Bernard, however, adopted the whole of this new light mystery, and in the end, although he knew it had no more to do with what is generally known as ancient Freemasonry, than it had with the mysteries and rites of the priesthood of Jupiter Ammon or Juggernaut, has given this matter to the world as exemplifying the principles of Freemasonry. This man smells so rank of villany, that we doubt whether he could do a virtuous deed without counterbalancing it, with a weightier enormity upon any consideration; and yet the writings of this man—the revelation of this man's blasphemy, is solemnly adopted by a United States Convention, and placed before the people of the Union, as the principles of FREEMASONRY. Will not Francis Granger, when he reflects upon the vile slanders he has heaped upon a large class of his worthy fellow men, and the deep and damnable disgrace he would stamp upon one of the oldest and best institutions of the world, by placing his name to this document, and when convinced these revelations have nothing to do with Freemasonry, as taught, received and practised in this country, bewep his follies, and retrace his steps towards the proud and lofty goal of principle, consecrated by his father's memory?—[Craftsman.]

The following article, we recommend to the particular attention of every one who takes up this paper.—It is couched in strong language, but no stronger than the occasion called for. Every individual who possesses one spark of liberal or tolerant feeling, and every one who has ever been found the friend of De Witt Clinton, will find that in it which, upon candid reflection, will convince him that intolerant and proscriptive antimasonry is at war with one and the good name of the other. We cannot but believe that it will lead to the conviction of many who have heretofore acted with the antimasonic party.

[From the Albany Daily Advertiser.]

STATE POLITICS.

In relation to matters of the state politics which now agitate the people, and in reply to the question which has been sometimes asked, which of the candidates for governor we shall support, we have but a few words to say.—As regards Mr. Throop, and that class of the public officers known as his supporters, commonly called the Albany Regency, it is unnecessary to say much. It is known that we have always strenuously opposed them, and that it has been our wish to displace them and put better men in their stead. This object it would be our wish and shall be our aim to pursue whenever we can find an opportunity of effecting it. But until we can see a likelihood of supplying their places with men of a purer character, the public good does not require our exertions—if men of a worse character seek to gain their situations, the common weal demands that we should oppose such men.

In regard to Mr. Granger, the other candidate for the gubernatorial chair, we have often expressed our opinion of his qualities. But it is now altogether immaterial what were or are our views of his talents or capability. It is not the man to whom we look, or of whom we speak; it is the party with which he is associated and the principles which that party proclaim, and whose principles he will be expected to enforce, should he obtain power. We will only say that he wrongs himself to act in such a cause, and while we esteem him for his talents we cannot endure the bloody spurr and galling whip of indiscriminate proscription of a particular society of men, with sufficient composure to support one identified as their head.

With him we have long acted, and he has received our cordial support for official honors, and most gladly would we, under other circumstances, have sustained him for the highest situation in the state. But he has consented to be the chief of those who wage bitter and relentless persecution, both in the church and in the state: and among those who are thus persecuted, are many of the very persons who formerly and effectually sustained him. Could it have been expected that he would thus act? 'Was this done like Cassius?'

Antimasonry is proscriptive in its character and baneful in its effects. It destroys the harmony of every thing that is held sacred. Its pestilential breath is felt in every relation of life, and among its myrmidons are some of the most heartless and depraved of the human species.

Some of the leaders of the party who have nominated Messrs. Granger and Stevens, have insinuated, and others have openly declared, that DE WITT CLINTON committed suicide in consequence of the workings of a guilty conscience produced by his being concerned in the MURDER of Morgan! Can the friends of that great man assist to build up a party who will utter such wicked, foul and hell-born slanders? Or rather, will not his friends spurn from them those who dare to ask their suffrages while this insult to their feelings is fresh in their memory? Can any one be safe under the domination of a party who thus, in the madness of their persecution, aim to sully the memory of one of the best and purest patriots that ever lived?

At the time when it was made known that the special counsel employed under authority of the state, in the Morgan investigation, had made a proposition to the acting governor to give two thousand dollars for the purpose of inducing a man to testify, almost every one was struck with horror at a proposition which amounted to little less than an attempt at subornation—a proposition which if it had been carried into effect, would have been the most serious blow at the purity and safety of trial by jury, which could have possibly been made. And the conduct of the governor in refusing to accede to that proposition was highly approved by all who had a true and disinterested regard for the preservation of one of the most inestimable rights of freemen.

But how was it with the party whose candidates Messrs. Granger and Stevens are? Did they unite in condemning this most dangerous attempt at the infraction of the holy privilege of trial by jury? No. They were loud and vociferous in justifying the proposition, and deep and boisterous in their denunciations of the governor for his rejection of it! And as the strongest and best evidence of their approval of that proposition, they have nominated for their Assembly, in Ontario county, the very man who made the proposition, which aimed to destroy a right which none but freemen enjoy, and which, should it ever be lost, would make us wretches and slaves! Can we be safe under the administration of such a party.

If the Albany regency are corrupt, and the public interests require that they should be put down, why are they not opposed on that ground? Masonry is dangerous it is said, therefore the Albany regency must be put down!—Morgan was taken off, therefore the Albany Regency should be annihilated! This is not the way to correct corrupt conduct in our public officers—this is not the mode to effect a wholesome change in our government. The true and honest way is to point out to the people the misdeeds of their public servants and the faults of their administration—then, if they are disliked, the people will displace them and put in others who will at least promise to do things better. Not make Masonry the test by which every thing is to be tried. What has Masonry to do with the merits or demerits of our state government? 'There are no tricks in plain and simple faith.'

Gov. Throop is not a Mason—therefore, we shall suppose, according to the antimasonic creed, that he is a just and proper man to be governor. Not one of the state officers who composed the Albany Regency are Masons; consequently, they must be honest men and no danger can rest from their retaining power.

If the object is to arrest the progress of corruption in state matters, let it be so said, and then all honest men can unite in the laudable exertion. Let opposition be placed on such a ground, that a man, though he be a Mason, may give a vote so that he shall not by 'his own interdiction, stand accused,' nor acknowledge by his own act, that he is unworthy of all political confidence, and unfit to hold any office or receive any honor from the people.

If any real and lasting reformation is to be effected in this state, PRINCIPLE must be the leading motive and cue of action. A reformation so produced, would endure; for principles are immutable. Health and purity would exist in our government. But if a change should by any chance be effected, by a delirious whirlwind, like antimasonry, that change can be but brief, for principles would be wanting. The obnoxious materials which had been displaced, would soon again return, and we fear that the people who had suffered under the temporary change would soon be brought to effect another alteration in the manner of government. They would desire a change, but would be apprehensive, judging from their last experience, that it would but lower and degrade their condition instead of elevating it.

Let true patriots, who have long sighed over the state of affairs here, think on this. Let them not mistake the indisposed and sickly fit for the sound desire for improvement.

In the course which we take, we have the satisfaction of knowing that we pursue the course taken by honorable and high-minded men, with whom we have heretofore acted in politics. Among a host of worthies in this city, it is with pride and congratulation that we mention the names of STEVEN VAN RENSSLAER and ABRAHAM VAN VECHE. Such men can have no inducement to govern them but that which they think is for the public good, and the preservation, uncontaminated and unimpaired, of our privileges and rights secured to us by toil and the blood of our fathers. They will not 'write their own reproach,' nor consent to the degradation of pure and honorable and gifted men, merely because they are members of the institution of Freemasonry. They have uniformly and efficiently opposed those who are now at the head of affairs in this state. But they are men of high and noble bearing, who despise fanaticism, and condemn persecution, whether it be in religion or politics, and they would rather remain forever in the minority than by mean and contemptible acts acquire an ascendancy. As their souls are above vice, so are their acts beyond meanness. They harbor no craft and seek no corrupt ends.

Declining into the vale of years, with all the vigor of their former days remaining, their opinions come to us as the doctrines of sages, and their words the language of prophets. They tell us of the dangers likely to ensue to our free institutions from the cherishing of the doctrine that men must be persecuted for opinion's sake; that they must be banished from all office—kept from all power—and denounced as unworthy of all confidence, for the reason that they belong to a particular society of men. They tell us that if such doctrines obtain the ascendancy, social harmony and domestic happiness are at an end, and that of all parties that ever agitated our country that of antimasonry is the worst.

In conclusion.

We appeal to the patriot, whether he can promote a cause which is calculated to determine the principles and sap the foundations of our free and liberal institutions.

We appeal to the friends of the lamented DEWITT CLINTON, whether they can support a cause which has sought advancement by the damnable assertion that he was a suicide and a MURDERER.

We appeal to the few remaining venerated patriots and soldiers of the revolution, whether they will record their votes in favor of the cause, which if it had prevailed in the days of '76 would have prevented Washington from taking the command of our armies;—which would have excluded Warren, and Montgomery, and George Clinton, and Mercer, and Gansevoort, and Willet, and Rutgers, and every general officer of our continental army, (except Arnold!) from participating in the glorious struggle for liberty; which would have denied to Lafayette, and to Stuben, and to Pulaski, their generous wish to engage in our cause;—which would have debarred from taking a part in promoting our freedom, Franklin, and Jefferson and Jay, and many others whose talents and virtues will forever remain a monument lasting as the liberties whose foundation they laid, and durable as the principles on which they are founded.

Finally, we appeal to all men, of all classes, who are the lovers of liberty and law, who are actuated by generous and liberal principles, and who are desirous to check a wicked persecuting, and advances a liberal and honest state of things, whether they can support a cause like that of which we have spoken. With them we leave the decision of the matter, confident in their judgment and relying on their intelligence. We have no motive but the protection of what is right and the opposition to what is wrong.—We have done what we conceive to be our duty as conductors of a public press. The end is left to the direction of heaven and the wisdom of our countrymen.

[From the Boston Statesman.]

Mr. Greene.—It must be amusing to a disinterested observer to see the consistency of the Antimasonic leaders.—At a caucus of —Republicans which assembled at Halifax on the 12th Oct. we find the Hon Christopher Webb associating and acting in concert with, literally, a lodge of Masons, and pledging himself to support for representative to Congress, their candidate John Q. Adams—and at an antimasonic caucus held at Albany on the 19th Oct. (seven days later) we find Mr. Webb chairman of a committee to report resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting, among which we find the following—

‘And whereas we have reason to believe that he (Mr. Adams) has already been made to drink of the bitter cup of Masonic proscription for daring to avow that he was not—never had been and never would be a Mason.’

Now it would seem that these Masons were ‘good enough Morgans for his purpose’ at Halifax, but would not answer for all the New England States, as almanack makers say—no! not even for Abington, only a dozen miles north. Notwithstanding Mr. Webb has been a long and ardent supporter of antimasonry, yet his eyes were not fairly opened until the Halifax caucus—for there or somewhere else, he learnt that ‘speculative Freemasonry is stained with crimes and infected with dangerous principles.’ Had their profound meditations resulted in any other nomination than J. Q. Adams, we might have thought him sincere, and that he had seen the error of his ways in attending the caucus at Halifax. If he was not aware of having been caught in such company at the time, common courtesy should have taught him better than to speak disrespectfully of those with whom he was associated, especially as he was appointed one of, and acted in concert with a committee of seven to draft an address to the electors, four of whom at least were Masons of high standing.

The Susquehanna, Pennsylvania Register, has the following paragraph.

The little editor of the Dundaff Antimasonic Investigator has very hastily left the country. We understand that the people of Dundaff were about arresting him for perjury, which probably accounts for his sudden disappearance.

GROANS AND SIGHS.

TUNE.—‘The Campbell’s are Coming.’

I’ve seen THE PROCESSION! Oh dear, we are gone!
Reflections so humbling are not to be borne!
I verily thought I should tear out my eyes,
But I vented my grief with my tears, groans and sighs.
Our leaders predicted, and we said amen,
That we never should see the procession again;
But when they came out, I was struck with surprise,
I was choked with vexation, with tears, groans and sighs:
I’ve seen the Procession! &c.

I’ve seen the Procession! &c.
I willingly own that I had not a doubt
Our party would get up a bit of a rout;
But we saw there the aged, the good and the wise,
And all riot was drowned in our tears, groans and sighs:
I’ve seen the Procession! &c.

I’ve seen the Procession! &c.
When they first came in sight, some small number reviled,
Some few of us grinned, and some two or three smiled;
But the people denounce all disorders that rise,
And our ridicule vanished in tears, groans and sighs:
I’ve seen the Procession! &c.

I’ve seen the Procession! &c.
Their banners so gay I would rend all in twain,
I would tear off each badge that was worn in that train;
I’d put each one to torture, and laugh at his cries—
But revenge is all turned into tears, groans and sighs:
I’ve seen the Procession! &c.

I’ve seen the Procession! &c.
The next time we met to consider our cause,
Our leaders could get not a word of applause;
Not a member then present his grief could disguise,
And we finished the meeting with tears, groans and sighs:
I’ve seen the Procession! oh dear, we are gone!
Reflections so humbling are not to be borne!
I verily thought I should tear out my eyes,
But I vented my grief with my tears, groans and sighs.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—The Legislature of Vermont, now in session, has under consideration, two bills for the abolishment of debt. The first section of the first bill, enacts that on the final judgment rendered before county courts or justice of peace, the debtor within four hours after rendition of judgment, may be examined on oath before the court or justice, and the court or justice may administer the poor debtor’s oath, and no execution is to issue against the body of the debtor.

The second section enacts that the debtor, availing himself of the provisions of the first section, may be proceeded against, as relates to the judgment creditor, within the meaning of the act directing proceedings against the trustees of absconding debtors.

The third section provides for the recommitment of a debtor who shall have remained within the liberties of the jail, the full term of six months, and the debtor shall not thereafter, be entitled to the liberties of the jail on such execution.

The second bill provides, that the body of no person shall be imprisoned for debt, by virtue of any contract entered into after the first day of January 1831.

STOUGHTON COLLECTION OF CHURCH MUSIC.—

The rapidity of the sales of last year’s edition, has induced the publishers, Messrs. Marsh, Capen & Lyon, (says the Traveller) to increase and otherwise improve the collection and to stereotype the whole for immediate publication. In the preparation of this enlarged volume many gentlemen of acknowledged musical taste and acquirements have been consulted; the genuine improvements of the day have been adopted; and the selections, whether new or old, are chaste in style and devotional in character. The new musical type from the New York foundry, which so much resembles engraving, and specimens of which may be seen in the Euterpeid and the Amateur, has been obtained as a model for stereotyping; and the book is now in such a state of forwardness that its appearance may be looked for early next month.

TREMONT THEATRE.—We make the following extracts, relative to the recent investigations which have been made touching certain charges preferred by Rev. Mr. Palfrey against this establishment, from the Transcript.

‘We have read with much satisfaction, the Report of the Committee of Inquiry, appointed by the Proprietors of the Tremont Theatre to ascertain the truth of the charges recently made and promulgated, respecting certain abuses which were said to exist within the walls of that building.’

‘The committee left no means untried to procure competent testimony. They have called before them many witnesses—visited, in person, the most obnoxious parts of the Theatre—examined door keepers and police officers—sought for information in every nook and corner, out of which there was the slightest probability of dragging a solitary fact to the broad light of day, and, as the result of deliberate and minute investigation, declare, that the Tremont Theatre ‘is actually under better regulations, in all points affecting public morals and good order than any Theatre ever has been in Boston; and, as they believe, none better is to be found in the United States.’

The Committee ‘declare it to be the duty of the Proprietors, and all other friends of a well regulated Theatre, to uphold the present Manager, in the course which he is disposed to pursue. With the publication of this report we hope the contest will be at an end. It must be obvious to all who read it, that the accusation against the Lessee are fictitious and groundless; that the Theatre presents a moral aspect more favourable than its best friends had anticipated, and that positive reform has at least paralyzed if not entirely eradicated abuses.’

‘The discussion will have its influence; Mr. Russell’s management will prove an era in our theatrical history, and if we err not in our estimate of the substantial good produce in the community by his judicious ordinances and regulations, he has established a starting point from which reform may continue to advance, but behind which it cannot again recede. He has fought a good fight; may he go on and prosper until he shall be commended by his foes, as he is lauded by his friends.’

NEW YORK ELECTIONS.—The recent elections in the State of New York have resulted in the total prostration of the antimasonic faction. Throop is elected governor over Granger, by a majority of between 15,000 and 20,000 votes. The Centinel of Wednesday has the following paragraph:—

‘Speaking of the New York election, the New York Commercial Advertiser says, ‘we have lost every thing but our honor.’ If our New York contemporary means by this that the Clay party in the State have generally exerted themselves to the utmost to prevent the election of the Jackson candidate for governor, we should judge by the number of votes polled in the city, that they deserved no great honor for their organization. If, however, it be meant that they would not join in the Antimasonic crusade even to defeat the Jackson party, then indeed have they preserved their honor. This seems most probable. No doubt thousands of liberal and enlightened men, disgusted with the ambitious schemes of the Antimasons, have refused to vote though heartily opposed to Jackson, lest it should be supposed that they were disposed to countenance the illiberal excitement against the Masons.’

We are happy to perceive that the editor of the Centinel has changed his views on this subject. When Mr. Granger was first nominated, he held the following language: ‘In this contest the Anties and the Olay Party of New York will heartily co-operate.’

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

CAUGHT IN HIS OWN TRAP.

The squib below, is copied from an antimasonic paper, of the first water and of the most vindictive spirit.

[From the Albany Journal.]

The traitor Arnold was a Freemason. 'There is a respectable revolutionary soldier now living in Ohio who has frequently sat with Arnold in Lodges. A citizen of Connecticut also knew Arnold was a Mason. Major Andre, as is stated in his biography was a bright Mason. As such Arnold and Andre could trust each other. The premeditated treason was undoubtedly matured under the protection and facilities which Freemasonry affords.

It is readily admitted that Benedict Arnold the traitor, and Major Andre, were both Masons, although we do not know that such was the fact.—But we admit the allegation. WASHINGTON was also a Mason, as all the world well know, and the antimaçons say that he was by his Masonic oath, bound to protect, and succor a brother in all cases, murder and treason not excepted. Andre a Mason, was found guilty as a spy, and as such was executed. An appeal was made in his behalf to Washington, and the most earnest petitions were set forth praying that his life might be spared, and his punishment commuted; yet Washington signed his death warrant, and caused him to be executed. Does this look like a Mason's protecting a brother in all cases, murder and treason not excepted? Benedict Arnold, the antimaçons say was a Mason! Did Washington protect him or give him succor? Did he not offer a very large reward for the head of the traitor? Does this look like a Masons protecting a brother in all cases murder and treason not excepted? The antimaçons are placed in a sad dilemma, and they must either pronounce Washington guilty of the crime of perjury, or confess that they are guilty of falsehood, when they say, that a Mason is by his oath bound to protect a brother in all cases murder and treason not excepted.

Oliver Watkins is an antimason, and so are the two Grays, all of whom are under sentence of death, and we wonder if they are better than any other murderers because they are antimaçons!

MORE BEAUTIES OF ANTIMASONRY. The following article from the Palmyra (Wayne co.) Sentinel of Friday last, is respectfully offered for the consideration of the pious and consistent Editors of the 'Daily Advertiser' and 'Journal of Commerce':—

Religious Intolerance.—At a late meeting of the members of the Presbyterian Church at Sodus, (East Ridge,) Dr. Gaylord and Mr. Bell were arraigned for trial, on the charge of belonging to the order of Freemasons. They were called upon to renounce the Institution, on the ground that their adherence to it was incompatible with their religious obligations. They publicly declared they had not, for some time past, attended the meetings of the Lodge, but that they could not renounce the order, persuaded that there was nothing in its creed opposed to the Holy Religion, of which they were professors. The attempt thus made to drive two worthy men from the pale of the church, has been defeated. Such conduct is enough to arouse the indignation of every citizen of this free land, and should be enough to expose the alarming tendency of Political Antimasonry.

Every antimasonic paper boasts that Francis Granger and Samuel Stevens support every principle and measure of the antimasonic party. Every vote given for their candidates in this city will be trumpeted forth as an approval of such odious, proscription, impious and unholy principles. Are the intelligent people of New York ready to be set down antimasonic, because Mr. Theodore Dwight commands it to be so? Is the age of Salem witchcraft—of burning people at the stake—of religious tyranny, come back upon us? If it is, then let the good people go to the polls and vote for Granger and Stevens.—[N. Y. Enq.]

ANTIMASONRY. Of this bitter and persecuting party, which has risen up in the State, and pursues every citizen with fire and sword, public safety requires that every freeman should buckle on his armour, and put it down. The flames of the Inquisition and of the Auto da fe, and the rack, and other tortures, will follow the triumphs of antimasonry in this state. No man who has ever been a Freemason will be permitted to enjoy the rights of citizens—and their triumphs will not end here; men's religion will be next assailed; their profession and occupations will follow next: a host of inquisitors, policemen, secret informers and midnight assassins will be found in the employment of the successful antimaçons—the reign of Ferdinand and Don Miguel will be imitated in this State. Let every man vote against such persons, as they cherish a regard for freedom and their own rights, and their children's rights. Grown desperate by repeated defeats, the enemy resort to these schemes and disguises to carry their ticket. Let them be met and put down, like the common enemy to mankind.—Ib.

THE BOQUET.

From the Craftsman.

THE LION AND THE ASS.

A FABLE.

Hark—ho—hallo! a race—a race!
Who are the champions, what the place?
The course is life's high mountain pass,
Rivals—the Lion and the Ass.

The Lion wore no fettering,
Of iron or of gold;
He bore upon his noble brow
The glorious stamp of days of old.
His glance was fire, his eye was pride,
His footstep had a regal fall,
His air was high born, if you please,
But that's aristocratical.

Then came the Ass. His waddling gait
Was wrapt in gay and shining gear!
With many a curious jewel'd band,
His Ass-ship tried to hide his ear.
It was in vain—the ear was long,
As often ears of Asses are,
'Oh then I'll try my dignity,
'And nought will be suspected there.'
With pompous strut and head erect,
The ear was more and more display'd;
'I am a knowing one,' he cried,
'Oh ay—I learnt it at my trade.'
'I'll tell the world the Ass's ear
'Is better than the Lion's mane;
'And if they dare to doubt me once,
'I'll tell it o'er and o'er again.
'I'll tell the world the Ass's gold
'Is better than the Lion's sense;

'And if they dare to question me,
'I'll bear it out by impudence.'
'Your gold, dear sir, have Asses gold?
'Yet pardon me—I am afraid—'
'Oh,' cried his Ass-ship, entre nous,
'I got it at my trade.
'Hidden with jewels, where's the choice,
'The Lion's brow or mine—'
'I'll say the jewel'd brow is best,
'Though it be asinine:
'And quite secure the Ass shall be
'Of having the majority.'
Well satisfied to have display'd
The cunning things he learnt at 'trade';
He stood awaiting the salute
Of insect, reptile, bird and brute.
'Thou art, sweet sir, we do agree,
'The pink of good society.'
Meantime the Ass much trouble had
To keep his reverend ears full clad,
As scarce indulged his head to bow,
His walk was stiff, his gait was slow.

The Lion came—his step was free,
His presence spoke nobility:
Haughty yet graceful, calm yet bright,
His bearing distant, yet polite.
The Ass stood watching him afar—
'Now for thy lustre, fallen star,—
'My star is up, one cringe from thee,
'Will serve instead of pedigree.'
He kindly spoke each lowlier one,
And passed the tricked-out Ass alone.
'Now by my fay—' the Assa looked blue,
'The world shall judge between us two.'
Trembled with rage from tail to snout,
So fearfully, the ear peeped out.

The court begins—the world attends—
Surrounded by his golden friends,
The Ass appears in brave a guise
As ever dazzled mortal eyes.
'La, what a splendid jewel that,
'And ermine—' gathered from a cat'—
'Nay now, no slander; see the gold,
'And lace in many a curious fold—'
'Methinks his head-dress very high—'
'Good—and we'll follow instantly
'A fashion so becoming.' 'True—
'It hides what least we wish to shew.'

If one voice there dare whisper aught,
Of far descent, of noble thought,
'Twas nought—the Ass could bend and bray
The Ass had ears, and so had they.
Well woe I where the victory—
The Ass had the majority.

WHEN I LEFT THY SHORES, O NAXOS.

[By LORD BYRON.]

When I left thy shores, O Naxos,
Not a tear in sorrow fell,
Not a sigh or falter'd accent
Spoke my bosom's struggling swell.
Yet my heart sunk chill within me,
And I waved a hand as cold
When I thought thy shores, O Naxos,
I should never more behold.

Still the blue wave danced around us
'Mid the sunbeam's jocund smile;
Still the air breathed balmy summer,
Wafted from that happy isle.
When some hand the strain awaking
Of my home and native shore,
Then 't was first I wept, O Naxos,
That I ne'er should see thee more.

ANECDOTE OF DOCTOR FRANKLIN.

Doctor Franklin having been absent from Boston several years and become so altered as to feel confident that his own mother would not know him unless it were by instinct, resolved, after the death of his father, to pay her a visit: and discover by actual experiment, if such an instinct does actually exist. On a chilly afternoon in January he knocked at his mother's door, and introduced himself as a stranger to the old lady, and requested a night's lodging. She coldly informed him that she did not keep tavern; but that to accommodate several members of the General Court she boarded and lodged them, and had room for no more at present. Upon his complaining of the cold she gave him leave to take a chair and warm himself. The boarders soon entered, coffee was served and the doctor partook with the family. To the coffee succeeded a plate of pippins, and the family formed a cheerful semicircle around the fire, while the new comer instructed, amused, and delighted them till 8 o'clock. At this hour supper was announced and Mrs. Franklin having been engaged in family affairs, felt something like surprise and resentment when she saw the stranger seat himself at the table with the same freedom of a member of the family.

Immediately after supper Mrs. F. sent her maid to ask her new guest aside, where she again informed him that she could not lodge him, that it was now late and she must request him to seek another lodging. He politely told her he would smoke another pipe with her boarders and then retire. Being seated accordingly, he entered into conversation on business then before the General Court, which he discussed so appropriately that it is no wonder that the clock struck eleven unperceived by the delighted little company.

The old lady now entered the room, and before the whole company, with some warmth complained of ill treatment and insisted on the Doctor leaving the house. He made a slight apology, put on his cloak and hat and approached the street door, lighted by the maid and attended by the mistress. No sooner had the maid lifted the latch than a roaring northeast wind forced open the door, extinguished the light and half filled the entry with snow and hail. As soon as the candle was relighted, the Doctor cast a wishful look towards the door, and thus addressed his mother:—"My dear madam, can you turn me out of your house in this dreadful storm? I am a stranger in this town and shall certainly perish in the streets. You look like a charitable lady;—I should not think you could turn a dog from your door this tempestuous night." "Do not tell me of charity," said the offended matron. "Charity begins at home—it is your fault that you tarried so long. To be plain, with you, sir, I do not like your looks or your conduct; and I fear you have some bad designs in thus intruding yourself in my family."

The warmth of this conversation had drawn the company from the parlor, and by their united interference the stranger was permitted to lodge in the house; and as no bed could be had, he consented to repose on an easy chair before the fire. Although the boarders appeared to confide perfectly in the stranger's honesty, it was not so with Mrs. Franklin. With suspicious caution she collected her silver spoons, pepper box and porringer from her closet, and after securing the parlor door by sticking a fork over the latch carried the plate to her chamber, charging the negro man to sleep with his clothes on, to take the great cleaver to bed with him and to waken the family and seize the vagrant at the first noise he made in attempting to plunder the house. Having taken every precaution she retired with her maid, whom she compelled to sleep in her room.

Mrs. Franklin rose before the sun, roused her domestics, unfastened the parlor door, with timid caution, and agreeably surprised to find her guest quietly sleeping in the chair. A sudden transaction from extreme mistrust to perfect confidence was natural. She awakened him with a cheerful 'good morning,' and invited him to partake of her breakfast, which was always served previous to that of her boarders. Pray sir said the old lady as she sipped her chocolate, as you appear to be a stranger here, to what distant country do you belong? I, madam, I belong to the city of Philadelphia. At the mention of Philadelphia, the Doctor declared for the first time that he had perceived any emotion in her. Philadelphia! said she, and the mother suffused her eye. If you live in Philadelphia perhaps you know our Ben. Who madam? Ben Franklin: my Ben: oh, he's the dearest child that ever blest a mother. What! said the Doctor, is Ben Franklin the Printer, your son?—Why he's my most intimate friend:—he and I lodge in the same room! can it be possible! exclaimed the old lady, raising her watery eye to heaven—and I have suffered an acquaintance of my Benny to sleep on this hard chair, while I myself rested on a good bed!!

How the Doctor discovered himself to his mother he has not informed; but from the above experiment he was thoroughly convinced, and was often afterwards heard to declare that natural affection does not exist.

'Or ere these shoes were cold.'

The widow of Bishop HEBER, as our readers may have learned from the latest foreign journals, has married a Greek Count.

The revulsion this has created in the public sentiment towards this lady, though it may not be entirely just, is perfectly natural. We had all seen with sympathy the sorrows of that wife for whom the most ardent affection had been entertained by a devoted husband. In the pious care with which she seemed to gather up every relic of his virtues and his fame, we thought that we perceived a love that would survive the selfishness of the longest life.

But after his journals and his poems, his sermons and his life have been, one after the other, given to the world, after the erecting of this splendid mausoleum to his memory, and the widow had gained her full share of profit and of praise, for having been the companion, the wife, the biographer of such a man, we hear of her second marriage to some obscure Greek Count, whose very name the foreign journalists have been unable to discover.

Who would believe, although a few short years had intervened, that the author of the beautiful 'lines written in India' could, amidst the accumulating praises of this world, and the constantly recurring image of his worth, be so soon forgotten!

If thou wert by my side, my love!
How fast would evening fail
In green Bengala's palmy grove,
Listening the nightingale.

If thou, my love, wert by my side,
My babies at my knee,

How gaily would our pinnace glide
O'er Gunga's mimic sea!

I miss thee at the dawning grey,
When on our deck reclined,
In careless ease my limbs I lay,
And woo the cooler wind.

I miss thee when by Gunga's stream
My twilight steps I guide,
But most beneath the lamp's pale beam
I miss thee from my side.

I spread my books, my pencil try,
The lingering moon to cheer,
But miss thy kind approving eye,
Thy meek attentive ear.

But when of morn and eve the star
Beholds me on my knee
I feel, though thou art distant far,
Thy prayer ascends for me.

Then on! then on! where duty leads,
My course be onward still,
O'er broad Hindostan's sultry meads,
O'er bleak Almorah's hill.

That course, nor Delhi's kingly gates,
Nor wild Malway detain,
For sweet the bliss both us awaits,
By yonder western main.

Thy Towers, Bombay; gleam bright, they say,
Across the dark blue sea,
But ne'er were hearts so light and gay,
As then shall meet in thee.

But, unhappily for the credit of the human heart, the subject of these sweet lines has proved herself but too indifferent to the deep, deep feelings which inspired them. The Niobe lately 'all tears,' has made 'the funeral baked meats serve for the wedding dinner!' And most probably the American publishers of the Bishop's life will find out that the profits of their philanthropy are to be remitted to some of the nameless islands of the Egean. So goes the world! false in love, fleeting in fame, uncertain in its wealth, unstable in its honors!—Happy is he who lays these truths to heart.

A mendicant one day applied to a lady for alms. She, observing him to be a healthy, strong and able-bodied man, capable of labor, refused to give him any thing; whereupon the man, in a tone indicative of despair, said to himself, on turning away, loud enough to be heard by the lady, 'and yet a very small sum would have saved me from the alternative.' The lady caught these ominous words, and fearing that the unhappy beggar intended to make way with himself, called him back and gave him some money. 'And now,' said the charitable donor, 'what is the dreadful alternative you would have been driven to?' 'Why, madam,' he replied, 'if your kind bounty had not interposed, I should have been driven to the awful necessity of working.'

HARD HEAD.—An old gentleman was relating a story of one of your 'half horse half alligator' St. Lawrence boatman. Says he, 'he has a hard head, for he stood under an oak in a thunder storm, when the lightning struck the tree, and he dodged it seventeen times, when finding he could not dodge it any longer, he stood and took nine claps in succession on his head, and never flinched.'

Knowledge and virtue are of the same stock: one is the tree of which the other is the fruit.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 13, 1830.

SHERIFF SUMNER.

Nulli negabimus, nulli differemus Justitiam.

However pure and irreproachable the character of an individual, or however eminent or honorable the place he holds in society may be; when he mingles in the strife of faction or the contest of party, his opinions and his actions become proper subjects of public scrutiny and, justly, of public animadversion. When a public functionary derogates from his own dignity, by uniting in contentious disputes with men, in almost every point of view, inferior to himself, he has no right to presume that the respect due to the office he holds will shield him from the lash of severe reprobation. It is an established rule with us, never to shrink from a rigid performance of our duty, even though the individual, with whose opinions and measures we are at issue, may occupy the highest seats in the synagogue. Our course is a plain one. Fear of consequences can neither move nor deter us; nor shall interest or dishonorable motives sway us. We are Freemasons, heart and soul; and are proud of the connexion. We shall not, therefore, tamely submit to be robbed of our civil and constitutional rights, by a combination of political jugglers, whom, as honest men, we can neither honor nor respect. Nor will we stand passively by and see our brethren abused and calumniated by the hireling slanderers of faction. We are arrayed against the enemies of the Masonic Institution, of whatever name, character or standing. We trust, however, we have too much self-respect, and too much regard for the laws of honorable warfare, to be induced, by any considerations, to attempt to derogate from the character of any gentleman, solely because he fills a public office or is engaged in professional pursuits.

We have made these preliminary remarks to shew that, though, while in the discharge of our duties, we have no more respect for a public officer than for a private individual, we were not influenced by the ridiculous cant of the day, and induced to select the letter of Mr. Sumner as a suitable subject for animadversion, merely because its author is a LAWYER. Towards Mr. Sumner we entertain no personal animosities. Our conduct in relation to him has been governed by honest motives; though, as will appear in the sequel, we have not acted altogether understandingly. That we have not so acted, we believe Mr. Sumner will acknowledge himself to be mainly in fault.

It is well known that Mr. Sumner has had correspondence with the principal men of the antimasonic faction in this city; and, as a consequent inference, he has been thought to co-operate in the measures adopted, and to sanction the course pursued by them, in regard to the Masonic Institution. He has therefore been ranked as a member of that party. We have regarded him as an enemy to the Institution, and have viewed his proceedings, having a bearing on the proscriptive and persecuting excitement, as the legitimate acts of an avowed antimason. But it affords us peculiar gratification that, from a personal interview and conversation had with him since our last publication, we have not only learned that we were in error, in relation to his views and motives, but we are enabled to assure our readers that, aside from the letter Mr. Sumner believed himself called on to indite, in replication to certain questions proposed to him by the notorious 'Suffolk Committee,' he has had no connexion or communication whatever with that party; except an individual instance, when, being solicited, he attended one of their private meetings, at which a single question was stated for his consideration; his answer to which not meeting with their entire approbation, a second was not proposed. We feel ourselves also authorised, and in justice to Mr. Sumner bound, to state further that, so far from having participated in their proscriptive proceedings, or from ever having countenanced their vile slanders upon the Masonic Institution, he positively assures us that he has not interested himself so much in the matter at issue, as to read their publications. So far, however, as their scurrilous and libellous slanders have come to his knowledge, they meet with his decided and unqualified disapprobation. He does not approve of the course pursued by these calumniators, and regrets that any of his fellow citizens should think so disrespectfully of him, as to suppose for a moment that he does.

As we have misunderstood and, consequently, misconstrued the nature of his connexion with the antimasonic party, we feel ourselves called upon, in justice to Mr. Sumner, to offer a few remarks in explanation of the article in our last. It will not be doubted, then, as Mr. Sumner, though charged with it, had never disavowed that he was disposed to favor the interests of antimasonry, that we had a right to consider him as having placed himself fairly and clearly in the ranks of that party. Entertaining this opinion of his views in relation to the Masonic Institution, at the time the article alluded to was written, we frankly and freely acknowledge that we did not seriously believe that Mr. Sumner intended, in his letter to the editor of the Transcript, to implicate the Police of the City; but we did conscientiously believe that he intended a severe and unjustifiable 'reflection' upon the Masonic Institution. We did believe that he meant to convey the idea that the Institution was too powerful as a 'secret mob,' to be controlled by the present Police; but that by a lapsus penne he had inadvertently missed his aim, and implicated the Police, instead of the Institution. These were our real views at the time we first read his letter; and in preference to taking him at what we thought he really meant, we chose to take him at what he really said; being content to take the other ground, when he should disavow the correctness of that which we had assumed. Mr. Sumner will at least give us credit for thus frankly avowing our views and intentions; and we take great pleasure in doing him the justice now to declare, in his own words, that he neither designed to implicate the City Police, nor to cast a disreputable reflection upon the Masonic Institution. We are satisfied that he intended simply to disavow his knowledge of the author of the 'doggerel stanza,' and his disapprobation of the calumnious reflection. As the 'disparaging language,' 'reflecting' on Mr. Otis, was unwarrantably and unjustly put into Mr. Sumner's mouth, he considered himself called upon to make this disavowal. Though we differ from him on this point, had he been less unhappy in the choice of his language, or less ambiguous in his periods, his having obeyed the supposed call, would not have been a matter of contention between us.

Now then for what we meant, and for what we did not mean. At the onset, we would expressly declare that, we meant nothing 'disparaging' to the private character of Mr. Sumner. We intended no personal reflections. This remark, we acknowledge, savors a little of supererogation; for we believe that our readers are pretty generally aware that when we speak of private character, (always relying on truth and evidence,) we take no particular pains to conceal our meaning behind ambiguous or equivocal terms. Whenever occasion requires that the dark spots in the moral characters of our opponents should be developed, in order to the attainment of a proper knowledge of their motives and designs, we are not accustomed to resort to undue or cowardly methods to effect such development. We know not how any of our previous remarks can possibly be construed into a reflection upon the private character of Mr. Sumner, yet to remove the basis on which such possibility, if it exist at all, must rest, (on a rather laughable supposition that we intended to compare Mr. Sumner to Achilles or Grimes,)—we will here remark that, the fame, character and achievements of Achilles are too generally known to the intelligent reader, to render it necessary, for the accomplishment of our present purpose, that we should enlarge upon either; but as there may be several personages who have assumed, or of right claim the cognomination of Grimes, some of whom may not be preeminently conspicuous for their virtues, it may be proper to say that we intended no disrespect to Mr. Sumner in the selection of this individual. We intended to illustrate the fact that the virtues and the peculiar characteristics of the great and the humble, in ancient and in modern times, had been immortalized by the poets. We could not, therefore, in the spirit of satire, perceive any valid reasons why Mr. Sumner should object to so distinguished an honor. But let that pass—we are satisfied that we entirely misunderstood the disposition of the Sheriff, in supposing that he was more emulous than other men to obtain such immortality.

The next point on which there is even a possibility of our having been misunderstood, is where we charge Mr. Sumner with assuming the same ground, in casting what we considered a reflection on the Police, as is assumed by the antimasonic party, (we will not say, as we said before, his 'antimasonic friends;' for if we rightly understand him, he does not wish to be considered as a member of that faction,) in regard to the Masonic Institution. We allege that their practice is to seize upon the great body of the Masonic fraternity, and belie, calumniate and villify them in the most opprobrious manner; and when confronted or called on to give a tangible shape to their base and groundless charges, they sneak away, like cowardly poltroons as they are, and shield themselves from responsibility, and the punishment due to their villany, behind the plea that their abusive criminations are alleged against the Institution, and not against its members! Now, the premises from which we reasoned, in arriving at the conclusion, that Mr. Sumner had assumed a position similar to that assumed by these men, may or may not be false. It may be that owing to our own obtuseness, we did not understand the true purport of Mr. Sumner's language. However, the meaning that we intended to convey, (whether warranted or not,) was not that Mr. Sumner is a 'cowardly poltroon,' who would shrink from responsibility; or that he would 'calumniate and villify' the Masonic Institution, or the City Police, in the most 'opprobrious manner;' but that the ground he had assumed, in first objecting to an unmeaning couplet, in which the head of the Police was named, and in then declaring that he did not object to the printing of the two accompanying lines, implicating in unequivocal terms, the Police as a body, (thus avoiding personal responsibility,) was precisely the ground occupied by the 'cowardly poltroons' of the antimasonic faction. We intended to illustrate the character of the reflection, (arguing that Mr. Sumner had assumed it as his own,) and not to implicate the reputation of the man.

As Mr. Sumner expressly disclaims having intended to sanction or approve, or to assume the responsibility of any portion of the 'doggerel stanza,' our call upon him for a definition of the anomalous term 'secret mob,' is of course, no longer valid.

This much we have thought proper to say, in justice to Mr. Sumner; nor can we dismiss the subject, without an acknowledgment of his frank and gentlemanly conduct.—The promptness with which he has disavowed his intention, either to implicate the Police or to reflect, 'disparagingly,' upon the Masonic Institution, is creditable to him. We are happy to learn from him, personally, that he does not approve of the course pursued by our unprincipled and reckless persecutors; and thrice happy are we to learn that he has not attached himself to their party. We trust he will never so degrade himself. And though he may entertain opinions, prejudicial to the interests of the Institution, we are sanguine in the belief that, should he ever deem it of consequence to investigate the matter, his candor will prompt him frankly to acknowledge that such opinions are founded in error.

A letter from the Postmaster at Shawneetown, Illinois, announces the painful intelligence of the death of the Honorable JOHN McLEAN, one of the Senators in Congress from that State.

'He died on the morning of the 14th inst. after a painful illness of one week. He was an ardent friend, a faithful public servant, beloved and respected by all who knew him. He left a young, amiable, and lovely widow, whose kind attentions, during his painful illness in this city, alleviated his sufferings, and exhibited the superiority of female excellence.'

ELDER GEO. WITHERELL.

Here is another of those hypocritical villains, who have stolen the livery of the court of heaven to serve the devil in—a wretch whom the common hangman would feel it a degradation to execute.

Our readers have all heard of the 'Attempted Assassination,' the 'Hartford Outrage.' Many of them have probably seen and read the doings of a 'public meeting' on the subject, at which Committees of Investigation were appointed, and measures adopted to ferret out the 'MASONIC ASSASSINS.' They have also probably read the affidavits of Mrs. Lucinda Witherell, (wife to the infamous scoundrel above named,) of George R. Witherell, (a promising son,) of Stephen Smith, and Nancy Chase. For fear, however, that they may not have seen the affidavit of the wife, we will here publish it.

AFFIDAVIT.

State of New York, } I, Lucinda Witherell,
Washington County, ss. } of the town of Hartford, in said County, being of lawful age, do depose and say, that on Monday night, the 27th of September, 1830, my husband, George Witherell, who is now, and for a length of time past has been, Pastor of the Baptist Church in Hartford, was from home, and was, as I was informed afterwards, at Mr. Hale's; detained in consequence of the rain, and did not return that night. That about 11 or 12 o'clock at night, as near as I could judge, I was awakened by the noise or stepping of some person or persons in the room adjoining my bed room. From the stepping I thought there were two. I then supposed it to be Elder Witherell, and thought some one had returned with him; and supposed if they wanted supper they would speak. I was not uneasy at all. Soon I heard them open a chamber door; this did not alarm me, as I supposed it to be Elder Witherell still. From the chamber door they went to the parlor door, which was open. Cannot say whether they entered the parlor or not. My bed room door was open, but the room was dark, and I did not then discover that they had any light. From the parlor door they came to my bed room door. I still thought it to be my husband, and was not frightened until, of a sudden, one of them exclaimed, 'you damned perjured scoundrel!' and said something about 'obligation,' which my fear and alarm prevented my hearing, or recollecting distinctly. At this instant I drew the pillow over my face, and in a moment he tore the pillow off, or partly off from my face, seized me by the throat with one hand, and at the same time struck a blow, in which his hand just hit the top of my head, the weight of the blow hitting the head board. In another moment, he put his hand to the top of my head as if feeling for my comb. The other one then, standing near the bedside, presented, a light—I thought it to be in a dark lantern—held it up—the light shone upon the bed—he had in his hand a cane, or knife, or dirk, I could not tell which. At this moment my son sleeping in the next room, spoke loud, and said repeatedly, 'Father, have you come?' On discovering by the light, as I supposed, that Mr. Witherell was not in the bed, they immediately left the room, and went directly out of the nearest door which was the back door of the house. They had no hats upon their heads. Their faces were covered with something dark—thought it was a black silk handkerchief. The voice was to me a strange voice. The man who had the lantern was a large man, rather fleshy or portly in his appearance. The other I could not describe, such was my agitation. After they left the house, I heard a waggon immediately drive off to the south, quite fast. Mr. Smith and some of the neighbors were soon alarmed, but I have not been able to learn who these men were. The reason why I did not speak, was in consequence of my affright, and further say not.

Justice of the Peace

We would now invite the attention of the reader of every honest man in community—to the following certificate of the examination of the REV. George Witherell.

LOOK AT THIS!

State of New York, }
Washington County, ss. }

The People } I, the undersigned, one of the Justices vs } of the Peace in and for the co. aforesaid,
David Brown. } do certify that a complaint was preferred before me against the above named defendant on oath, for an assault and battery on Lucinda Witherell of the town of Hartford in the county aforesaid, the wife of George Witherell, on the twenty-seventh day of September 1830, in the night time. I further certify that process was by me issued, and the defendant arrested and bro't before me for examination on the complaint. I further certify that the following witnesses were sworn.

[Here follows the testimony of Mrs. Witherell and her son, which is substantially the same as contained in their affidavits, as published in the Advocate and other Antimasonic papers. Then follows the direct examination of ELDER WITHERELL, by the counsel for the people, which is not material—we therefore omit it.]

I further certify that the complainant's counsel here rested, and that the counsel for the defendant here commenced the cross examination of the last witness, ELDER Geo. Witherell.

Qu. Where had you been on the day of the 27th of Sept. 1830?

Ans. Witness had been to the office of John Cray.

Qu. What was your business at Cray's office during the day of the 27th?

[Witness here appealed to the court—the court decided he must answer.

Ans. Witness had been there to see about ELECTION.

Qu. Was there any conversation held there about your renouncing Masonry?

Ans. Witness and Mr. Cray had some conversation upon that subject.

Qu. Was there any thing said about an expected attempt by the Masons upon your life?

[Witness again appealed to the court—the court decided that he must answer.

Witness said there were some fears apprehended.

Qu. Did it rain?

Ans. It rained.

Qu. What time did it stop raining that night?

Ans. Witness said it stopped raining about 8 o'clock in the evening.

Qu. What time in the evening did you go to bed?

[Witness again appealed to the court—decided that he must answer.]

Ans. Witness said about 1 o'clock.

Qu. Did Mr. Hale go to bed before you?

Ans. He went to bed about the same time.

Qu. Did Mr. Hale remain at home all the evening?

Ans. He did not, he left home about 11 o'clock.

Qu. How and in what manner did Mr. Hale leave home?

Ans. Witness said he left home in a waggon.

Qu. How long was Mr. Hale absent?

Ans. Witness said about two hours.

Qu. How far is Mr. Hale's house from your own?

Ans. Witness said about four miles.

Qu. Did you know before Mr. Hale left home where he was going?

[The witness appealed to the court who decided that he must answer.

Ans. Witness said that he did.

Qu. Was Mr. Hale's leaving home and going to the place where he did go, a matter of arrangement between yourself and him?

[The witness appealed to the court—the court decided that he must answer.

[The witness said he could not answer without CRIMINATING HIMSELF.]

The court then informed him that he need not answer the question.

Qu. Did Mr. Hale tell you after his return that night where he had been, and if so, where did he tell you he had been?

Ans. Witness said he did, and that he had been to his house.

Qu. Did any person accompany Mr. Hale when he left home that night?

Ans. There was.

Qu. How many persons accompanied Hale?

Ans. Witness said one.

Qu. Did that one person leave the house of Hale in his company?

Witness said that he did.

Qu. What was the name of the person that so accompanied him?

[Witness appealed to the court, the court decided that he must answer.

Witness said he could not without CRIMINATING HIMSELF.

[The court said he need not answer.]

Qu. Was there any other person at Hale's house on the night of the 27th Sept. but yourself and Hale?

Ans. Witness said, not to his knowledge.

Qu. Did you see Hale take a large knife with him when he left home?

Ans. Witness said he saw Hale take a butcher knife.

Qu. Did Hale take a dark lantern with him?

Ans. Witness says he did.

Qu. Is Hale an antimason?

Ans. Witness says he is.

Qu. Did Hale and witness go to witness' house on the night of the 27th day of Sept. 1830, as described in the testimony of Lucinda Witherell and George R. Witherell?

Ans. Witness could not answer without CRIMINATING HIMSELF.

I hereby certify that the defendant was discharged from the complaint, there being no testimony against him. I further certify that I am the person before whom the affidavits of Lucinda Witherell, Geo. R. Witherell, Stephen Smith and Nancy Chase, were taken on the 14th inst.

Justice of the Peace.

October 23d, 1830.

We shall offer no comments on this. We submit it to the consideration of a candid public. We have not language to portray the character of the heaven-daring scoundrel whose villany it exposes. Let it be read by all!—Let the 'Suffolk Committee' read it, and blush that they are associated with such villains; if a sense of shame be left them. This is not the first scheme of the kind that this clerical wretch has been engaged in. Some years ago the hypocritical knave spread a story that an attempt to murder him had been made by the agents of a worthy Priestess, who had preached away nearly all his flock.—For this lie he was hooted out of town, as he ought now to be out of the abodes of the human race.

REV. MOSES THACHER.—From a comparison of the returns of votes cast for this divine, at the Spring and recent elections, in six towns in Norfolk county, it appears that his Senatorial and antimasonic labors have not added much to his popularity. Thus:

	April 1830.	Nov. 1830.	Loss.
Roxbury,	142	30	112
Dorchester,	154	74	80
Milton,	107	96	11
Canton,	95	74	21
Braintree,	185	157	28
Medfield,	50	10	40
	733	441	292

His loss in the other towns in the county, is in proportion to the above. We rejoice that the good people of Norfolk are coming to their senses. At the next Senatorial election they will be enabled entirely to wipe off the stain that rests upon their escutcheon.

THE WREATH.

WE ARE SEVEN.

[By Wordsworth.]

A simple child,
That lightly draws its breath,
And feels its life in every limb,
What can it know of death?—
I met a little cottage girl;—
She was eight years old she said,
Her hair was thick with many a curl
That clustered round her head.
She had a rustic woodland air,
And she was wildly clad;
Her eyes were fair and very fair;
Her beauty made me glad.
'Sisters and Brothers, little maid,
How many may you be?'
'How many? seven in all,' she said,
And wondering, looked at me.
'And where are they? I pray you tell,'
She answered, 'Seven are we,
And two of us at Conway dwell,
And two are gone to sea—
Two of us in the church yard lie,
My sister and my brother;—
And in the church yard cottage, I
Dwell near them with my mother.'
'You say that two at Conway dwell,
And two are gone to sea—
Yet you are seven! I pray you tell
Sweet maid, how this may be?'
Then did the little girl reply,
'Seven boys and girls are we;
Two of us in the church yard lie,
Beneath the church yard tree.'
'You run about—my little maid—
Your limbs they are alive;
If two are in the church yard laid
Then ye are only five.'
'Their graves are green, they may be seen,'
The little maid replied,
'Twelve steps or more, from our door,
And they are side by side.'
My stockings there I often knit,
My 'kerchief there I hem,
And on the ground I often sit—
I sit and sing to them.
And often, after sun-set, Sir,
When it is light and fair,
I take my little porringer,
And eat my supper there.
'The first that died was little Jane;
In bed she moaning lay,
Till God released her from her pain,
And then she went away.
So in the church yard she was laid,
And all the summer day,
Together round her grave we played,
My brother John and I.'
'And when the ground was white with snow,
And I could run and slide,
My brother John was forced to go,
And he lies by her side;—
'How many are you then?' said I
'If they two are in Heaven,'
The little maiden did reply,
'O master, we are seven!'
'But they are dead, those two are dead,
Their spirits are in heaven!'
Twas throwing words away, for still
The little maid would have her will,
And said 'nay, We are Seven.'

MOORE & SEVEY, 46, WASHINGTON ST.

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

JUDICIAL INVESTIGATION OF ELDER WITHERELL'S HUMBUG.

The People } The examination and testimony of witnesses upon oath, touching the complaint of Alonzo Allen, against Alonzo Hyde, for an alleged attempt upon the life of elder George Witherell of Hartford, county of Washington, state of New York, taken on the 8th, 9th, 11th, and 12th days of October, 1830, before Slade D. Brown, Justice, &c. to inquire and determine if the said Hyde ought to be put upon trial, as well as what was the nature of the transaction at elder Witherell's and who were its perpetrators, &c. &c.

Mrs. Lucinda Witherell, being sworn, says: that on the night of the 27th of September last, she heard some persons walking about in the kitchen, being the room adjoining her bed room—her husband, elder Witherell, being absent from home, she thought he had returned, and brought some person with him—she heard the chamber door open and supposed he was putting some apples in the entry.—They then apparently went to the door of the north front room, where George and her children slept; the doors were open, she did not see them yet, but only heard them—it was dark, and she heard it rain at the time. Then they came to her bed room door, and said: 'You damned perjured scoundrel,' and said something else, but she did not understand what, except she heard the word obligation, but can't tell what else was said. They spoke with force and pretty loud, as she spoke; the force of the speaking alarmed her, and she immediately drew the pillow over her face, she had not yet seen them; one of them pulled the pillow off, or partly off, and then he grasped her by the throat and struck at her head, and hit her head and the head board both at once, but the head board took most of the blow; and then put his hand back as if feeling for her comb. After the blow, a light was presented, and it was in a dark pocket lantern, one side only was open—it was in the hands of a large fleshy man about the size of elder Witherell, or captain Hyde, who stood about midway of the bed-room, and the other stood at the head of the bed in the door. The large man had something in his hand, but don't know what it was—might be a cane, a knife, a whip or a sword, but can't say what it was, but does not think it was a sword, because it would have glittered.—The man raised the lantern as if to look over the bed; they had no hats on, but looked as if each had a black silk handkerchief over his face. The large man looked as if he had on grey satinett pantaloons, and a black coat—she don't know how large the other man was, nor how he was dressed, as she only saw his hand and arm, and it looked as if his coat was black. She does not suspect any one whatever—she thinks the one at the door as tall, if not taller than the other. After the blow, George spoke and said, 'father, have you come,' five or six times in quick succession—he screamed so loud, she should think he might have been heard at Mr. Hyde's (which is about an hundred rods distant.) He halloed very loud, and could have been heard a great distance. The children screamed, and Judson, who slept with George, said, 'let them stay, let them stay;' she thinks they were alarmed. The men then went out at the back door, and as soon as they had time to go to the road, she heard a wagon apparently go south, but could not tell which way it went—it was between ten and eleven o'clock at night, she thinks, but don't know the time; the wagon started immediately and went very fast—they must have hurried to get there before it started. It rained at the time they went out; and dashed hard against the house. She don't remember sending George away, but soon after, and she don't know how long, Mr. Stephen Smith and Warren Hubbard came there, a lamp was burning; but she don't know who lit it. She was weak with fright. Smith and Hubbard sat down and talked the subject over with her—don't remember that she requested an alarm to be made. Elder Witherell went away the afternoon before, to a Mr. Haile's, about one and a half miles distant—she did not send for him. When the Elder came home he inquired all about the affair—she told him the story, and he said but little about it—don't know as she spoke or screamed at all.

Cross Examined. Said George got home from Wells' last evening about dusk, (which was the 7th October, where he had been sent by his father early on Wednesday morning, the 6th of October, inst.) his father was absent at a conference meeting, when George returned—George said he was going to the meeting where his father was, and she told him it was not best to go away, so as not to be had at this investigation. She says that last Saturday, (Oct. 2,) E. D. Culver and others, from Fort Ann, were at her house and took down her relation, and asked her if she was willing to swear to it, and have it published.

Oct. 11th she was further cross examined and testified, she could not tell how long it was after the men left her room before she got up—she says that elder Witherell and others have told her she was hysterical.

Elder George Witherell sworn—says that he was absent from home at the time his house is said to have been entered, that he staid at Mr. Haile's that night, one and a half miles from home—left home about sun down it raining at the time. Returned next morning about nine o'clock, heard of the affair on his way home—took no measures to ascertain who they were. Never before had fears that any one would come into his house to do him harm—did not fasten his door, but has thought he was in danger of being 'poked over,' by being shot; or some other way when from home in the night—suspects from what has been told him about the persons that entered his house, that it was done by men under the influence of Masonic obligations—his fears has been with respect to Masons—he has violated his Masonic obligations—he has heard nothing from any individuals, or any body of men that excited his fears—has said that the instrument they had, probably was a Knight Templar's dirk, but did not judge it was from the description of it. He says that on Monday, the 4th of Oct. he understood at Fort Ann, that the committee appointed on that day at that place were to come to Hartford the following Wednesday or Thursday, to investigate the matter, and that on Tuesday evening preceding he sent for his son George to Captain Hyde's between 7 and 8 o'clock—sent his girl for him because he wanted to send him to Wells, but sent word that he wanted him to go to Mr. Brayton's for his horse; when George came home, he directed him to go to Wells' early next morning, (13 miles distant) to get $10 due him from his son and another person, which he was in immediate want of, but George asked if he might stay until Friday, and that he told him he might—he further says, that on Wednesday, at 9 or 10 o'clock, A. M. David Brayton, jun. told him that the committee from Fort Ann, were expected on that day to investigate this affair, and that he and his wife left home at 3 o'clock, and did not return until evening; that affidavits had been made with respect to the transaction, and that it was his opinion that it was all that was necessary. He has heard George express an unwillingness to be examined again, and that he, (witness) had told him he did not wish he should be.—Never has applied to any magistrate to do anything in the matter, that one lives within 80 or 90 rods of his house, and that some friends came and took an examination for the purpose of publishing it, which was sworn to at Fort Ann, which is eight or nine miles from where the outrage was committed—there was a meeting of the citizens held at Fort Ann at that time, at which meeting it was agreed that the proceedings of the meeting, the affidavits, and the offer of a reward, should be printed altogether—he says when the constable came to procure his attendance as a witness, he (witness) told him, 'I will go, but if there is anything about this business (meaning the investigation) that is not legal, I will take all the advantage of it in my power.' Says his wife was once bitten by an animal that had the hydrophobia, and before medicine could be got to operate, she had forty or fifty fits of it in succession, and they were excruciating, but she finally got over them, has never been as she was before in health or mind, and seems as if her very disposition was changed in some respects, and as if the effects of the disease still hung about her after the first set of fits—she had now and then one, sometimes once a month, and sometimes once in six months, and now has them about once or twice a year; she is as free from fear as any woman whatever, when she has not these fits; has been left alone a great deal, and never manifested any fear or alarm at staying alone—that she was bit by a mad lamb, that the fits last from fifteen minutes to an half hour and an hour—that she has sometimes told when they were coming on, and that sometimes she had her speech affected.

Stephen Smith sworn, says that George R. Witherell came to his house on the night of the 27th of Sept. last and waked him by calling Mrs. Chase—Mrs. Chase let him (G. R. Witherell) in, and on observing the clock found it was five minutes before twelve. George told him about the affair, he called Mr. Hubbard and went to the house—Mrs. Witherell also related it to him—saw the tracks on the floor, but did not see any out of doors until he got to the road—it had rained in the evening and was muddy, it stopped raining an hour and a half or two hours before that—he did not give any alarm because Mrs. Witherell and George neither asked to have an alarm made—he heard the stage go north in the night, after the rain was over, and afterwards heard what he thought to be a two-wheel carriage go south, saw some tracks in the road near the wagon tracks—said he did not think it necessary to give an alarm—(after George was sworn) he further testified that he should agree with deacon Brayton and John Thomas, as to George's truth and veracity.

Mrs. Nancy Chase sworn—says she was awakened on the evening of the 27th of September last by a noise at her door, and thought she heard some one call her name—says that she came down from the chamber where she slept, to inquire the cause; went to the window in the front room and heard a whistling as if it were across the road against the house east—she then went to the door and found George R. Witherell—let him in and he asked her to go and see his mother, and then told of the affray—she dare not go, and requested Mr. Smith to go, and he went.

Warren Hubbard sworn—says on the night of the 27th Sept. last about twelve o'clock, Stephen Smith called him up and requested him to go to Elder Witherell's. Smith went, and he soon followed after—after his arriving Mrs. Witherell told of the affray and requested him not to tell of it for no one would believe it if he did, and he did not alarm any one because he did not know whether to think any one had been there or not, and has not made up his mind yet—says that it is 12 rods to Mr. Whitford's, 5 or 6 rods to Mrs. Boss' house where are two robust men—about 8 rods to Captain Dennis'; about 15 or 20 to Isaiah Smith's, and from twenty to thirty rods to Mr. Washburn's, and Mr. Rowland's, and there are ten or eleven men who live nearer Elder Witherell's than himself and Stephen Smith, took a light from Elder Witherell's and examined the road against the house and found the track of the stage and a one horse wagon, they kept straight past the house and there was no appearance of a horse, or horses, or a wagon having turned up, or stopped against the house—thinks the stage went along an hour or an hour and a half after the rain—thinks the stage went along about an hour before he was called—saw a man's track in the road, and they were about the size of George R. Witherell's, and some he believes were larger than George R. Witherell's—if he had really thought that there had been an attempt to murder, he would have alarmed the neighbors—a loud call at Elder Witherell's would have aroused several of the neighbors, it was a bright star light and all cleared off nice, but thinks there was no moon, on the evening of the affray. Mrs. Witherell got up and walked across the room, and in going, staggered, and George said to her 'Mother, you act as if you had been drinking brandy,' being a nick-name often used by him for brandy, she said, 'if any one thinks that I have been drinking brandy, let them smell my breath!!!'

George R. Witherell, says he was at home on the evening of the 27th, of Sept. last, went home he thinks rather before nine o'clock—his mother and he sat by the fire and talked awhile and went to bed soon—in the night, heard the stage go by; don't know the time; had been asleep and it waked him; fell asleep and soon heard a wagon go north as he thought—the wagon awoke him—again got partly asleep and thought he heard a wagon come from the north and stop against the house, immediately heard some one in the kitchen—they went to the chamber door and opened it, and from that as he supposed to the door of the room where he slept and to the bed room where his mother slept, north of the kitchen; and while they were in the bed room, or at the door, he heard one say, 'you damned perjured scoundrel or rascal, you shall now suffer the penalty of your obligation,'—that he was up at the time, but did not see them, nor see as they had any light—he then said, father, have you got home? they made no answer. Witness then said father have you come?—Thinks that he did not say it more than twice. Witness then came to the door of the room where he slept, and discovered one had a light, but could not discover which one, and cannot tell what kind of a light it was—he saw some kind of a knife or an edged tool in his hand, but what kind it was he could not tell—saw them plainly when they came out of the bed room—they went out of the back door; and as soon as he spoke and said 'father, &c.' they went out of the house. Both their faces were covered with black, don't know what it was—had no hats on. As soon as they went out he thought he heard a wagon go to the south, and he then went to bed—soon after they had gone, his mother came into his room to the bed where he was, and he asked her what she came there for, and she answered she came to cover him up—he then got up and went out into the kitchen, and his mother told him to go and ask Mr. Chase to come there, for she felt as if she was agoing to have one of her fits; he went to the house of Mrs. Chase and called her by name—her door was fastened—called several times before she answered, and then she called back from up stairs, (as he took it,) and asked what he wanted. She lives in the same house with Mr. Stephen Smith. Before she came down he told her his mother was sick, she then came down and opened the door, and he went in and told her what had happened at his father's. Some one awoke Mr. Smith, but he don't know who, and Mrs. Chase said that she did not want to go to his father's, because she was afraid—believes he then told Mr. Smith he had better go, or Smith said he would go, don't remember which—Smith said that he would awake Mr. Hubbard, and did so. Witness and Mr. Smith, then went to his father's house, and his mother undertook to tell something about it—don't know whether it was before Hubbard got there—she had to stop, she was so frightened or something or other, after Hubbard came. Witness, Smith, and Hubbard, went to the road to examine the tracks—found a stage track and a wagon track, did not notice how many carriage tracks there were, saw men's tracks by the road, but did not notice particular where they were, believes they went to the south, again went into the house, and soon witness and Smith went down street, and left Hubbard at the house, they went and awoke Mr. Loomis and his wife, and they all returned to his fathers together. Mr. Loomis and his wife staid and Smith and Hubbard went home. Mr. Loomis said if the family would go to bed, he would stay until they got asleep. He slept till morning, and don't know how long Loomis staid. His father was from home. Saw both men, one was a tall slim one, and the other a thick set fleshy man—could not tell which had the light—don't know which came out of the bed room first—he was terrified at their being there, and by what they said—thinks he saw some edged tool and is confident he did because it shined and glittered in the light—could not tell how long it was—the man had it in his right hand, as he thought—can't say the man had the light—could not see into his mother's bed room from his door—heard nothing but the expression before mentioned. Witness spoke loud but did not halloo—was at the foot of his bed, when he spoke to them—he went to bed as soon as they went out, but did not cover himself up.—The men spoke before he did—he thought it was his father—got up to turn out his father's horse. The tracks he saw were men's tracks, but only saw one track—tracked them about a rod—about a middle sized track of round toed shoes—Alonzo Hyde usually has worn square toed shoes and boots, for a month or two past has not worn any other.

Cross Examined. Says he was awake before the men came in, but did not hear them open the door or shut it, they were at the bed room when first seen by him, the one who spoke had a coarse voice and spoke about as loud as one generally does when they speak distinctly; it is just as he takes a notion about getting up and turning out his father's horse, is in the habit of it; spoke to his father twice but did not speak very loud, can't tell why he called to his father, the one who stood in the door had the weapon, and not the one in the bed room, did not see the lantern, thought that he had an edged tool of some kind of iron or steel; took it to be flat—a cane will glitter sometimes in the light, one of the men, but don't know which, had on grey pantaloons. As soon as they went out he went to bed; can't tell what he thought he intended to do; don't know why he went to bed, unless it was because he was frightened; he was not so frightened but that he knew what to do, don't know whether it rained or not, but it was light and he should have noticed it if it had rained while the men were in the house, when his mother came to his bed she said she came to cover him up, and did not say anything else in the room where he slept; he then got up without her requesting it, and believes he went into the kitchen, and then she told him to go to Mrs. Chase and request her to come there; Mrs. Chase is a widow; don't remember as any thing was said about the men, or his father after he got up, and before he went for Mrs. Chase, but went for her immediately, his mother did not request him to tell what had happened or to alarm any one except Mrs. Chase, there was a light at Mr. Nobles, opposite to Mrs. Chase, but he did not give any alarm there because he had no business there, he was not sent there, he did not hear his mother make any noise or speak, while the men were there. His sister came for him on Tuesday night last (5th Oct.) he was at Capt. Hyde's, in bed and asleep when she came, when awakened by his sister told him his father wanted him to come home and catch his horse—he went home and his father told him that he wanted him to go to Wells, for some money, and said nothing about the horse. Mr. Smith was there, and he and his father were talking about the trial that was to be had next day; he started for Wells after day light. He returned from Wells on Thurs. night, don't know what time, and then went to Deacon Caleb Brayton's and staid all night, in the morning Deacon Brayton told him that he had better stay if they were agoing to have any court to day, and also that he believed they were not going to have any court, did not get the money he was sent for; after his return told his mother when Orrin was coming home—did not tell his mother he was going to conference where his father was, but did tell her he was going to Deacon Brayton's and his mother told him he had better go as long as he was not a witness, and there had been a fuss and they had tried to have a trial and it was adjourned, his mother told him that there had been a court here while he had been gone, and it had been adjourned, and that they could not do anything because he was not present—and he told her that he would go away and keep away, and she said he had better go to Deacon Brayton's, and he went there, but did not go to the conference, where his father was; he kept away intentionally to avoid being called as a witness—did not know as it was any body's business, and he was afraid they ment to pick his oath to pieces—says he went from Deacon Brayton's, to the canal in Kingsbury, he was told by Doct. Corbin and ELDER Colver at Kingsbury, of a certain house he could go to and stay for the purpose of keeping out of the way—they did not advise him any way about coming home or staying, but if he chose to stay he could go to those houses and be kept. Some persons in Fort Ann, told him he had better have a copy of his affidavit, which was taken at Fort Ann, Deacon Brayton, E. D. Colver and his father were present, and they told him so, don't recollect whether Mr. Colver told him when he handed it to him to swear to that and nothing else, and that he would bear him out in it—believes Mr. Colver told him to swear to the paper or something to that effect, had no suspicion who was in the house—has not said to any one that he did not see any one in the house that night, but if he did it was only in sport, don't recollect of saying so to or in the presence of Frederick Sherman, at the paint-shop, or any other place, he did tell Alonzo Hyde that he knew one of the men, and it looked some like Rowland Carrington—did not tell him he knew it was Rowland, but told him he thought so, but thought he could not hardly be guilty of such a crime—don't think he stated that it was Rowland Carrington and that he could swear to it—but thought it was him—but should not be willing to swear to it; his father did not tell him when to come back from Wells; don't remember asking his father if he might stay till Friday. Staid at Elder Colver's Friday night (October 8th.) went there in a wagon with E. D. Colver just at dark, Elder Colver and E. D. Colver conversed a while and then went away—saw Deacon Brayton on Friday (October 8th) at Fort Ann and asked him if he had better go home and Deacon Brayton said he would go and ask Mr. Colver—has often answered questions relating to this affair, and has answered them many different ways—says that he meant to tell Alonzo Hyde what he did not believe, and did not believe it when he told him it was Rowland Carrington, did not think it was him, but one was about as large as Rowland, rather thick set, he could easily make himself as large by putting on large clothes and stuffing something into them, had some false faces some time ago but not lately—has examined his copy of the affidavit he made at Fort Ann (and which Mr. Colver gave him) several times, did so while the court had an intermission, to day was told by Mr. Henry B. Northup, while in the custody of a constable and before his examination, that he might go home and he (Northup) would bear him out in it, and would go if he was in his place. Mr. Norton and Mr. Kincaid came for him yesterday at Fort Ann to procure his attendance as a witness, and while on his way home he stopped at Richard Norton's, and saw David Brown there and in conversation with him told him he wished he had stayed away until after Election; was not very serious about it, thinks it would have made some difference—thinks the antimasons had taken it up to fix a piece before election—and the others wanted to. The men left the house as soon as he spoke; don't remember as there was any light—when he spoke they brought the light out about four feet, did not see the lantern—could see them distinctly and they were not over a foot apart, but could not tell which had the lantern, the man who was before had the weapon in his right hand, but could not tell which had the lantern, and don't know which had the weapon—not much difference in the size between Rowland Carrington and Elder Witherell, the man at the bed-room door came out first and had the weapon. Witness was sixteen years old last August—did not alarm the neighbors nearer than Smith's, because he was sent for Mrs. Chase, heard some one whistle while he was at Mrs. Chase's, it appeared as if it was across the street towards Mr. Noble's house. Noble's family were up; a scream would have brought several neighbors to their assistance, two men reside not over six rods off at the house of Mrs. Boss, no one screamed, but he spoke to his father as he would from one room to another, don't know as he ever went to bed because he was afraid—his father has been a Mason and has renounced, he thought the words used alluded to Masonry. Witness did not come down out of the chamber just before the men were seen, if he recollects right (this answer was given with reluctance and hesitation,) kept his false faces at Doctor Munson's, put them on when he had a mind, and no one made any objections, did the errand his mother sent to Mrs. Chase, which was his mother was sick and wished her to come up there, did not try to frighten his mother that night as he recollects of. [hesitatingly] Mr. Erastus D. Colver told him he wished he had been at Fort Ann when he (witness) was sent for, but don't recollect his reasons, don't know as there was any liquor about the house on the night of the 27th of September, but when Mr. Hubbard came, he said, I guess your mother has been drinking brandy ha'n't she, and witness said yes, don't remember whether he had any conversation with Mr. Fred. Sherman or in his presence in the paint shop or not, nor of telling him that the first he knew of the men being there was when his mother came to his bed and called him, nor anything to that effect, but if any such thing was said he might have said it in sport.

Frederick W. Sherman, sworn, says he knows Geo. R. Witherell, he heard of the transaction in question on the morning of the 28th of September, was in Mr. Wood's paint shop on that morning. Mr. Wood was there and also a stranger that he did not know, besides himself Geo. Witherell. Witness is a stranger here, and he and the other stranger had conversation with George; and George was asked what the fuss was about some men coming into his father's house, and George answered that he knew nothing about it until his mother came and awoke him and told him to go for Mrs. Chase and also told him that the men had been there, &c. George was in earnest and did not say it in sport.

Jeremiah Briggs, sworn, says he saw George R. Witherell at Fort Ann on Saturday the 9th of October, and George said they did not offer up bounty enough, if they would offer up one or two thousand dollars, he would own it and go to States Prison and stay three or four years and learn a trade and come home and have money enough.

Samuel Harris, sworn, says he knows George R. Witherell, he thinks he is not reputed to be a boy of truth; it is about 100 rods from B. Hyde's to Elder Witherell's.

Robert Morton, sworn, says he knows George R. Witherell, believes his reputation for truth and veracity is not very good, he is a rude wild boy, from his reputation in community should not rely on him under oath;

Isaiah Smith and James Boss are reputed antimasons and live nearer Elder Witherell than Stephen Smith.

Deacon Caleb Brayton, (called to support George R. Witherell's character) being sworn says he knows George R. Witherell and has known him for some time, he is considered a very wild boy, but if he should say anything to him in earnest, don't know but he should believe him, he is very profane and it is more difficult than in common boys to tell when to believe him.

John Thomas, (called to support George's character) being sworn, says he knows George R. Witherell, knows nothing against him as to truth, but his general reputation as to veracity is bad, he is a very wild boy, but as to truth has not heard anything said.

Elisha Webster, jr. sworn, says he has not heard any thing about George R. Witherell's truth and veracity, and thinks he should believe him.

Benjamin Hyde, sworn, says he knows G. R. Witherell, his character for truth and veracity as far as he knows is bad. Witness is an Innkeeper, and has heard him often spoken of, says George has lived at his house considerable.

Frank Gordon, sworn, says he knows G. R. Witherell, his reputation for truth and veracity is not good.

ANTIMASONIC SYMPHONIES.

NO. IX.

THE DOMESTIC ANTI-SYSTEM.

Our home-made fabrics now are quite in vogue;
The maker honest—or, perhaps, a rogue.
Who asks a question so much out of rule,
Will be set down a madman, or a fool.
Domestic fabrications, thus sustained,
Hold the same rank the patriot has gained:
One boldly makes the fabricator great,
By loudly bawling, 'it concerns the State.'
Another cries, with quite as much parade,
That 'competition is the life of trade.'
Thus, by our arts, we gain the public ear—
By a good, home-made fabric—it is clear.
Now wit, now learning; heavy prose or rhymes—
All wholesale manufactories of crimes.
Credulity and folly now prepare
To purchase largely of our favorite ware.
Profits advance—the trade must e'en increase—
'Tis just the laborer should receive the fleece.
Now speculation ponders on the scheme,
And hope and fancy mingle in the theme.
Amazed, some wretch whose fortunes are awry
Looks o'er the project with an eagle eye;
With eager purpose enters on the plan,
To make himself a more notorious man.
Thus flourishes the trade—thus profits grow—
Thus weak men follow—for great knaves do so!
Where such vile principle invades the soul,
Truth, virtue, honor, lose their just control.
The hired cut-throat, and the bold bandit,
Have soul and virtue for the trade just fit.
No little, half-way, flinching rogues succeed,
Where want of honor marks the villain's creed.
The boldest dealer in the boldest crimes
Now finds his genius fitted to the times.
Invention—circumvention—rule the day:
Fame, fortune, honor, lead them on their way.
'Tis a bold trade that Antism drives;
Where honesty decays—where knavery thrives.

SPIRIT OF POLITICAL ANTIMASONRY.

We copy below two articles relating to a remarkable affair which recently took place in the western part of the State of New York—the hot-bed of political antimasonry. The account of the outrage said to have been committed upon the Rev. Mr. Witherell, referred to in these articles, has been extensively published in the antimasonic papers

[From the Concord Patriot.]

VILLANY AND HYPOCRISY.—A story has been circulated in all the antimasonic papers, just previous to the election in New York, that an attempt had been made to murder a Mr. Witherell, a Baptist preacher and a seceding Mason, residing in Washington County, N. Y. Witherell was absent some five miles from home, on an appointment to preach. It being rainy he did not return, but remained at the house of one Haile, another antimason. In the night Mrs. Witherell was alarmed by hearing foot steps approach her bed-room: when the door was thrown open some person exclaimed in a rough voice, 'Now, you damned villain, we will inflict on you the penalty of your obligation.' A blow was aimed at Mrs. W. which struck the head-board,—one of the men then opened a dark lantern, and discovering that the Reverend Mr. Witherell was not there, they left the house and drove off rapidly in a wagon. A poor fellow by the name of Brown was arrested and tried for the outrage—but it appeared on the trial, and by the Reverend Mr. Witherell's own testimony, that the Reverend Mr. WITHERELL AND HAILE THEMSELVES COMMITTED THE OUTRAGE!!! This reverend hypocrite went with Haile to his own house at the dead of night, and scared his own wife half to death, for the purpose of accusing the Masons, and to aid the Anties at the election! This is antimasonry to the life;—and the reverend Mr. Witherell manifested as much principle in this transaction, as we have ever seen in antimasonry any where.

[From the U. S. Gazette.]

Some weeks since, we placed in the columns of our paper, without comment, an account from the western part of New York state, of an outrage said to have been committed in the house of Elder Witherell, a seceding Mason. The statement, our readers will probably recollect, was that in the night, while the Rev. gentleman was absent, some ruffian entered his house, and proceeded to his bed, and with a long butcher knife, attempted to stab Mrs. W. on the supposition that the husband was in bed. The murder was prevented by the knife hitting the head-board, the wretch at the same time exclaiming, that he would punish the perjured wretch, meaning Elder W. Mr. David Brown was taken up on suspicion, and the testimony of Mr. Witherell's family was near convicting him, when on a cross examination of the Elder, it appeared, that on the day previous to the outrage, he (the Elder) had contrived the plot in a LAWYER'S OFFICE, and that a Mr. Haile, a violent antimason, consented to act the part of the assassin, and frighten Mrs. Witherell with threats of vengeance on her husband, so that her testimony might be used to affect the election.

LAFAYETTE.—Many of the Antimasons in our country appear to be much grieved to learn that LaFayette, a high and zealous Mason, is placed at the head of the National Guards in France, at this time, when the people have just thrown off the shackles of despotism, and buckled on the armor of freemen. 'No Mason ought to hold any office of honor or trust,' is the creed of antimasonry; therefore, they are opposed to the revolution in France, because it is mostly effected by a high and zealous Mason—LaFayette. Something must be done to put down La Fayette and Masonry in France; and we would advise the Antimasons to call upon their patron, the pious and benevolent Ferdinand VII. of Spain, to aid them in so noble an undertaking, as 'he takes great delight in the agonies of Masons, expiring under the torture of the Inquisition.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SPIRIT OF ANTIMASONRY.

We blush for the character of the town, when we tell the following story, which our duty compels us to make known to an enlightened world, and to all members of honorable society.

A young man, a very worthy member of one of the churches of the town, attached to St. John's Lodge, was called upon, some weeks since, by a seceding Mason, who solicited him to follow his example, and renounce the principles of Masonry. The young man said to his applicant, that he had not thus far in life, had any reason to regret that he had attached himself to a Masonic Lodge:—that he believed the Institution to be pure and perfectly compatible with the religion he professed, and that, as he was not disposed to commit the crime of moral perjury, he should not become a seceder. He was firm and resolute, and the antimason found to his satisfaction, that he could not move him.

Finding that he could not, either by threats or persuasion, move the unadulterated Mason, the seceder, with an effrontery and a wickedness of purpose, which admits of no palliation in the eyes of God or man, left his intended victim, and repairing to his house, made an attack upon the prejudices and sympathies of his wife. He said to her, that her husband was attached to an institution, whose objects were guilty, and whose supporters were thieves and murderers; and that if he did not renounce Masonry, she owed it to herself, to society and to her God, to retire from his embraces, and take up a separate maintenance. The wife became alarmed, when she was told that her husband was associated with robbers and murderers, and she resolved that she would make use of what influence she possessed, to induce him to withdraw from the circle of his alleged associates in crime.

On the return of the husband to his place of residence, the wife, with a bosom surcharged with grief assailed him;—said she had been informed that Masons were murderers and thieves—that they conspired for the perpetration of almost every crime, and conjured him to renounce a society, which was so fell in its purpose, and so damnable in its executions. The husband remonstrated—he assured her that the tales that had been told her were false and malicious, and besought her by the love that she bore him, not to believe the falsehoods of his traducer. But the influence of the antimason was too well founded; it had corroded the better principles of a lovely woman, and almost alienated her affections from the man she had loved, and who worshipped her with a fervency which was as elevated as it was pure and holy. But the hand of Almighty God was interposed, to arrest the threatened shipwreck of hearts and loves—the destruction of a once happy and prosperous family,—and the wife, in the end, once more reposed in the confidence and embraces of a fond and a doating husband.

Here then, we behold the horrible effects of antimasonry, and the accursed deeds which its partizans attempt to perpetrate, in defiance of all law, and in violation of all the injunctions of the everlasting God! And what punishment, can be sufficiently severe, to mete out to the unprincipled mortal, who to subserve partizan zeal and fury, can attempt to dissolve the ties that bind man to woman, and to burst asunder, all the vows and pledges, of friendship, constancy and love! No punishment which man can inflict, can be adequate to his guilty purposes, nor can the outpourings of the wrath of Heaven, or the vengeance of Hell, afford an ample reward for the fiend-like designs of the guilty. Accursed be the man, who attempts the dissolution and the disgrace of a family—the prostration of those institutions which were created by Almighty God, for the happiness of his children; and, which have been sedulously guarded and venerated by man, as the sole protectors of the morals of the age, and the welfare of the Universe.

We cannot think of a man who is guilty of such an outrage, without outraging our own sensibilities; and, here we leave him, to receive the abhorrence of all, who value the repose of society and the sanctity of the marriage institution, which if once destroyed, would reduce the human family to a state of corruption and degradation, which even the brute creation, would look upon with loathings and disgust.—[Subaltern.]

OUTRAGEOUS INSULT AND LIBEL.

A story, based on the authority of a fellow who calls himself the Reverend Moses Thacher, and endorsed by a kindred spirit named Charles Mathewson, a resident of Vermont, was yesterday published in the Free Press of this town, which goes on to avow, that some two or three years ago, a man was murdered in this town, by the Grand Lodge of Rhode Island. The name of the murdered man is not given—it has been forgotten, by the Reverend Moses Thacher and his associate Mathewson; but both know that the deed was most scientifically done, and they saw it, if we are to take their words for 'coin and reinish.'

Such black, such foul, such horrid falsehoods should not escape unpunished, and the perpetrators of them, should be held answerable for their crimes.

The story will probably be repeated in the Providence Daily Advertiser, and will be vouched for by the editor of that most veritable publication! And will the public consent, that such black and hellish falsehoods, shall be countenanced?

At the time that Thacher and his associate date the deed of murder, Peter Grinnell, Esq. was Master of the Grand Lodge of Rhode Island; and is there a man in this community, that will believe that that most worthy and generally beloved citizen, participated in the crime of murder! Can the people of Providence, believe for a moment that the Carilles, the Wilkinsons, the Bowens, the Jacksons, the Maurans, the Nestells, the Cliffords, the Browns, the Wheatons, and a thousand others of the most respectable and intelligent citizens of Providence, have been guilty of the crime of murder! And yet they are accused of it by a public press, called the Free Press, and the allegations will probably be repeated to day, by a still more venal publication, called the Daily Advertiser, and endorsed by so responsible an individual as Benjamin F. Hallett of Cape Cod!

We appeal to the young men of Providence, and ask them, if they will countenance such shameful and malignant charges against their fathers, friends and benefactors. If they will, we are sadly mistaken in the nature and quality of their spirit and manliness of action. Let them look on the fabricators of such scandals with silent contempt, and withdraw their support from those who give them currency, and endeavor to make them wear the aspect of credibility.—Id.

☞ We republish the following certificate of the result of an examination of the REVEREND George Witherell, from our last, in order that the reader may have at once, a full view of the testimony which consigns him over to eternal infamy.

Washington County, ss. }

The People } I, the undersigned, one of the vs } Justices of the Peace in and for David Brown. } the co. aforesaid, do certify that a complaint was preferred before me against the above named defendant on oath, for an assault and battery on Lucinda Witherell of the town of Hartford in the county aforesaid, the wife of Geo-Witherell, on the twenty-seventh day of September 1830, in the night time. I further certify that process was by me issued, and the defendant arrested and brought before me for examination on the complaint. I further certify that the following witnesses were sworn.

Here follows the testimony of Mrs. Witherell and her son, which is substantially the same as contained in their affidavits, as published in the Advocate and other Antimasonic papers. Then follows the direct examination of ELDER WITHERELL, by the counsel for the people, which is not material—we therefore omit it.

I further certify that the complainant's counsel here rested, and that the counsel for the defendant here commenced the cross examination of the last witness, ELDER Geo. Witherell.

Qu. Where had you been on the day of the 27th of Sept. 1830?

Ans. Witness had been to the office of John Crary.

Qu. What was your business at Crary's office during the day of the 27th?

Witness here appealed to the court—the court decided he must answer.

Ans. Witness had been there to see about ELECTION.

Qu. Was there any conversation held there about your renouncing Masonry?

Ans. Witness and Mr. Crary had some conversation upon that subject.

Qu. Was there anything said about an expected attempt by the Masons upon your life?

Witness again appealed to the court—the court decided that he must answer.

Ans. Witness said there were some fears apprehended.

Qu. Did it rain?

Ans. It rained.

Qu. What time did it stop raining that night?

Ans. Witness said it stopped raining about 9 o'clock in the evening.

Qu. What time in the evening did you go to bed?

Witness again appealed to the court—decided that he must answer

Ans. Witness said about 1 o'clock.

Qu. Did Mr. Haile go to bed before you?

Ans. He went to bed about the same time.

Qu. Did Mr. Haile remain at home all the evening?

Ans. He did not, he left home about 11 o'clock.

Qu. How and in what manner did Mr. Haile leave home?

Ans. Witness said he left home in a wagon.

Qu. How long was Mr. Haile absent?

Ans. Witness said about two hours.

Qu. How far is Mr. Haile's house from your own?

Ans. Witness said about four miles.

Qu. Did you know before Mr. Haile left home where he was going?

The witness appealed to the court who decided that he must answer.

Ans. Witness said that he did.

Qu. Was Mr. Haile's leaving home and going to the place where he did go, a matter of arrangement between yourself and him?

The witness appealed to the court—the court decided that he must answer.

The witness said he could not answer without CRIMINATING HIMSELF.

The court then informed him that he need not answer the question.

Qu. Did Mr. Haile tell you after his return that night where he had been, and if so, where did he tell you he had been?

Ans. Witness said he did, and that he had been to his house.

Qu. Did any person accompany Mr. Haile when he left home that night?

Ans. There was.

Qu. How many persons accompanied Haile?

Ans. Witness said one.

Qu. Did that one person leave the house of Haile in his company.

Witness said that he did.

Qu. What was the name of the person that so accompanied him?

Witness appealed to the court, the court decided that he must answer.

Witness said that he could not answer without CRIMINATING HIMSELF.

The court said he need not answer.

Qu. Was there any other person at Haile's house on the night of the 27th Sept, but yourself and Haile?

Ans. Witness said, not to his knowledge.

Qu. Did you see Haile take a large knife with him when he left home?

Ans. Witness said he saw Haile take a butcher knife.

Qu. Did Haile take a dark lantern with him.

Ans. Witness says he did.

Qu. Is Haile an antimason?

Ans. Witness says he is.

Qu. Did Haile and witness go to witness' house on the night of the 27th day of Sept. 1830, as described in the testimony of Lucinda Witherell and George R. Witherell?

Ans. Witness could not answer without CRIMINATING HIMSELF.

I hereby certify that the defendant was discharged from the complaint, there being no testimony against him. I further certify that I am the person before whom the affidavit of Lucinda Witherell, Geo. R. Witherell, Stephen Smith and Nancy Chase, were taken on the 14th inst.

MR. EDITOR.—The following Ode was written by a young Lady of my acquaintance of Newburyport two or three years since for the raising of the Pillars of the Masonic Hall in that place; not having seen them in a paper since, I have taken the liberty to send them, if found worthy, that you may give them a place in your useful Paper, and oblige a subscriber.

ODE.

Descend, thou great Spirit of him who of old
Made the Mount of Mosiah his Temple's foundation,
And raising its Pillars, o'erlaid them with gold,
Then made to JEHOVAH its grand dedication.

Come, hallow the rite

We engage in this night,

Be thy counsel our Compass thy wisdom our Light!
While our voices and hearts at the Altar combine,
As pure be our incense, our songs sweet as thine.
And Brethren all hail to the Pillars we rear
From the rude shock of time may they long be protected;

And to age after age, in their Beauty appear,
Untarnished and strong as they now are erected!

Though we leave them behind,

May they oft times remind

Our sons of the union in which we were joined;
And the sacred deposits there bosom inclose,
As years roll along, undiscovered repose.

Lo! ye who have felt not the Gordian tie,
Which binds us together, in vain ye resolve it!
Its mystery all your research shall defy,
For not the Great Conquerer's sword can dissolve it.

The SECRET divine,

Which our bosoms enshrine,

Your eye ne'er shall scan, nor your science define;
'T is a tree that will yield you its shade and its fruit
Displaying the branch but concealing the root!
There's a chord in the heart of each Mason, that bleeds,

And trembles with pain at the wounds of another;
There's a flame of delight that is kindled, and feeds,
On the joys that may glow in the breast of a Brother.

Nor, to Craftsmen alone

Is our sympathy shown,

The world are our brothers—their weal is our own.
While we sojourn on earth, through life's shadows or sun,

In FAITH, HOPE and CHARITY, still we are one.
And when the green Cassia must drop on our clay,
And our essence immortal returns to its Giver,
May the Angel of Peace waft our spirit away,
Keep our ties closely drawn and cement them forever!

In the Temple above,

May our Master approve

Of our services here, in the labors of love;
And a halo of glory encircling us there,
Be the song of His favor, the badge that we wear!

THE SPECTRE.

There is a story going the rounds of the periodicals, that a Miss. G. of respectable family young and very beautiful, attended Lord Byron in the habit of a Page. Love, desperate and all-engrossing seems to have been the cause of her singular conduct. Neglected at last by the man for whom she had forsaken all that woman holds dear, she resolved upon self destruction, and provided herself with poison. Her designs were discovered by Lord Byron who changed the poison for a sleeping potion. Miss. G. with that delicate feeling of affection which had ever distinguished her intercourse with Byron, stole privately away to the funeral vaults of the Byrons, and fastened the entrance, resolving to spare her lover the dreadful knowledge of her fate. She swallowed the supposed poison—and probably died of starvation!—She was found dead soon after. Lord Byron never adverted to this subject without a thrill of horror. The following, from his private journal, may perhaps have some connexion with it.

'I woke from a dream—well! and have not others dreamed? Such a dream! I wish the dead would rest, however. Ugh! how my blood chilled—and I could not awake—and—and

'Shadows to-night

Have struck more terror to the soul of Richard,
Than could the substance of ten thousand men—
Armed all in proof.'

'I do not like this dream—I hate its forgoing conclusion. And am I to be shaken by shadows? Ay, when they remind us of—but no matter—but if I dream again, I'll try whether ALL sleep has the like visions.'

She came to me last night—

The floor gave back no tread;

She stood by me in wan moonlight

In the white robes of the dead.

Pale—pale, and very mournfully,

I heard no sound—I felt no breath

Breathe o'er me from the form of death;

Its dark eyes rested on my own,

Rayless and cold as eyes of stone—

Yet in their fixed, unchanging gaze,

Something which told of other days—

And sadness in their quiet glare,

As if love's smile was frozen there,

Came o'er me with an icy thrill—

Oh God! I feel its presence still!

And fearfully and dimly

The pale cold vision passed,

Yet those dark eyes were fixed on me

In sadness to the last—

I struggled, and my breath came back,

As to the victims on the rack,

Amid the pause of mortal pain,

Life steals to suffer once again!

Was it a dream? I looked around,

The moonlight through the lattice shone;

The same pale glow that dimly crowned

The forehead of the spectral one!

And then I knew she had been there,

Not in her breathing loveliness,

But, as the grave's cold sleepers are,

Silent, and cold, and passionless!

A weary thought—a fearful thought—

Within the secret heart to keep;

Would that the past might be forgot—

Would that the dead might sleep!

THE CHARITABLE HIGHWAYMAN.—It is said of Poulter (a better sort of highwayman,) that one day riding on horseback on the road, he met a young woman who was weeping, and who appeared to be in great distress. Touched with compassion, he asked her what was the cause of her affliction, when she told him that a creditor, attended by a bailiff, had gone to a house which she pointed out, and threatened to take her husband to jail, for a debt of thirty guineas. Poulter gave her the amount, telling her to pay the debt and set her husband at liberty; and she run off loading the honest gentleman with benedictions. Poulter in the mean time waited on the road till he saw the creditor come out; he then attacked and took back the thirty guineas, besides every thing else he had about him.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 20, 1830.

THE HEAD-BOARD MURDER.

We have given, in preceding pages, some additional facts and circumstances relative to this most infamous transaction; a transaction that more fully develops the nefarious principles of antimasonry, than anything that has recently fallen under our observation. It has been truly said that the spirit of antimasonry stops at nothing. To attain its ends, it resorts to any and to all measures; it commits the crimes of sacrilege, perjury and treason, to God and to man; and rips up the depositories of the grave, to glut its vengeance. And yet this vile faction is sustained by men, who would have the world believe them honest! They may have been so; but we hold that the man who countenances such base principles, who co-operates with a party that acknowledges for its leaders such men as ELDER George Witherell, can be little less culpable than himself. Witherell is a degraded tool of the party: a mere puppet, set in motion by political wire-workers behind the scene. Though he is to be execrated for his baseness; he is not to be considered alone responsible for his crimes. His guilty patrons and coadjutors, must bear their portion of the infamy that of right attaches to his iniquitous transactions. It is useless to compromise the matter, antimasonry is the legitimate offspring of villany, and is sustained by means that none but the morally depraved and degraded can knowingly practice or sanction. There is not one honest principle in the whole creed, and we have cause to doubt whether there be one honest man in the whole party; excepting alone their ignorant dupes. If there perchance should be even one, and he feels himself aggrieved at this remark, he will recollect the fable of the stork and the geese; and that it is reasonable that a man be judged of, by the company he keeps.—So long as he prefers to associate with knaves, he must be content to be considered a knave. We know of but few individuals who have taken a prominent and leading part in this infamous farce, that, when divested of the stolen cloak that covers their hideous deformities, will not present more characters as base and infamous as are the fiendish principles of the party to which they belong. We have had some experience in this matter. We have taken the pride and the boast of the party, stripped them of their false coloring; and a more infamous set civilized society cannot produce. Let the unprejudiced reader turn to the long list of antimasons whose characters we have held up to public execration, and say whether a cause supported by such men, can be an honest cause. The implicated may talk as they please of Masonic vengeance and of Masonic slander: they dare not put us to the proof. As for Witherell, words that would fully express our views of him, or would paint the character of his transactions in their proper colors, indeed

Had need

Come glowing from the lips of deepest Hell.

What ought we to think of a wretch who, with a heart black as perfidy and wickedness can make it, dressed in the sacerdotal robes of the most responsible and sacred office which man is called to fill,—we repeat, what ought we to think of such a man, when he breaks the bread of life; kneels at the altar of his God in solemn mockery, and hypocritically raises his hands to heaven in supplication for pardon and for continued blessings? Such conduct supposes a degree of moral depravity, morbidity of heart, and vileness of principle, to be expected only in the reputed characters of demoniac spirits. Yet, is this not the true character of Elder George Witherell? Has he not violated every principle of honor and justice, and put in jeopardy the lives of two of his fellow men, that his own ambitious and damnable ends might be accomplished? Ay, for political purposes, from which he could have but little to hope, he has deliberately violated the laws of God and man, and done such deeds as —‘Dug hell, and kindled all its bounds

With wrath and inextinguishable fire.’

From the examination of Brown, the person falsely and basely charged with the commission of the crime of which the hypocritical Elder is himself the father, contriver and actor, it appears that Witherell's business at the office of John Cray, on the day preceding the alleged outrage, was to concert measures relative to the approaching election. Here the subject of his having renounced Masonry, and of the contemplated assassination, was introduced and discussed. The manner in which the assault should be made, seems to have been arranged between Witherell and a fellow by the name of Haile. Agreeably to this arrangement, they left Haile's house together in a one horse wagon; Haile taking the ‘butcher knife’ and ‘dark lantern’ with him: they proceeded to Witherell's house together, which they entered, ‘as described in the testimony of Lucinda Witherell and George R. Witherell.’ It does not appear which of the two exclaimed, ‘damned perjured scoundrel,’ or which tore the pillow off the face of the affrighted wife. But it was probably the Reverend gentleman himself, as he was particularly careful to miss his dear wife's head, and vent his anger on the unoffending ‘head-board!’ This opinion receives additional confirmation from the fact that he took immediate measures to ascertain if he had not accidentally broken his lady's comb! Like enough he asked her the question! However, after opening the ‘dark lantern,’ and ‘holding it up’ so as to throw the light upon the bed, that the woman might distinctly see how heroically her husband could flourish a ‘butcher knife,’ ‘they went directly out of the nearest door!’ Reader, do you recollect the story of Potiphar's wife? When she could not entice Joseph to be criminal, she contrived the appearance of crime, to furnish evidence of crime against the innocent Joseph. Verily the Elder must have diligently studied his Bible, and practically illustrated it to the edification, no doubt, of his antimasonic audience!

At the examination of Alonzo Hyde, given in a preceding page, there seems to have been a strange clashing of evidence. Mrs. Witherell swears that the man in the bedroom had the weapon, and her son testifies that the man at the door had it. She says George exclaimed five or six times, ‘father, have you come home;’ and George says he exclaimed so but twice. She testifies that George screamed so loud that he could be heard to one of the neighbors, and George swears he spoke only as loud as he would ordinarily from one room to another, and did not scream or halloo loud. It appears also from the Elder's testimony in relation to his wife's state of mind and health, (she having been bitten by a mad sheep, and being at this time subject to fits of hydrophobia,) and from George's impression that his mother acted ‘as if she had been drinking prund,’ and from her desire that some one should ‘smell of her breath,’ that any relation she could give of the ‘outrage’ is not to be relied on. If it be relied on, she or George, and perhaps both, are guilty of perjury.

In reading the report of the examination of Hyde, the inquiries naturally suggest themselves, Why did not George call on the men who lived within six or eight rods of his father's house, if anything were wrong, in preference to passing by them and going to Smith and Mrs. Chase? and why were not more of the neighbors disturbed, when a single scream would have brought several to their assistance, as testified by George and Mrs. Witherell? Why did Mrs. Witherell advise Mr. Hubbard not to tell what had happened, alleging as a reason that NO ONE WOULD BELIEVE IT, if she thought there had been any one there who did not belong to the house? Why did George go to bed immediately, and say nothing to his mother about the men who had left the house a moment before? and why did she go to his bed ‘to cover him up,’ and say nothing of the men having been there, until after George got up and had been sent for Mrs. Chase, as George testifies? Mrs. Witherell says she did not speak or scream during the attack! so says GEORGE, both of his mother and of himself; and yet MURDER was intended, AS THEY BELIEVED! Messrs. Hubbard and Smith were at the house soon after the men had been there, and saw nothing to cause an alarm, and Hubbard says, if he had really thought there had been an attempt at murder, he certainly should have alarmed the neighbors. George said, the next morning, he knew nothing of the affair, except what his mother had told him. The conscientious Elder swears that he was absent from home at the time his house is said to have been entered; and yet he could not say, on the examination of Brown, who entered his house with Haile, without CRIMINATING HIMSELF! If this be not PERJURY, we should really like to know by what term it may be designated. It is perfectly clear to us that Witherell, his wife and son, if they have have not all positively perjured themselves, they have come as near to it, as most honest people would like to come. The Elder thought that as affidavits of the transaction had been made and published, nothing more was necessary! We want no better evidence than this, that he himself is the greatest villain of them all. Is it possible to believe for a moment that a man, whose house had been violently entered, his wife abused in her own bed, and he himself threatened with assassination, would quietly set down, content that a mere affidavit of the circumstances had been made? He must be either fool or knave who would believe such ridiculous stuff. That the affidavits were sufficient to answer the purposes for which they were designed—TO INFLUENCE THE ELECTION—we can readily believe. It is not a matter of surprise, therefore, that his Reverendship did not wish his son examined again.—But we will pursue the testimony no further. The great depravity of human nature that it exhibits, is sickening to the heart.

In the words of another. ‘What a striking commentary upon the base principles of the party, does this disgraceful transaction afford! A citizen of respectable standing, a minister of the Gospel, to join with a brawling, unprincipled faction! himself with another, disguised like midnight assassins, break into his own house—commit a violent outrage upon his own family; frighten and abuse his own wife at the dead hour of night! Witherell's self in black disguise; calling upon Witherell and threatening to murder him! At the same time himself and assistant ruffian, in order to frighten and convince his family that they were bona-fide murderers, display most hideously a huge looking butcher knife, a dark lantern, etc. threatening Witherell with instant death if they could only come at him!—Talk of Masonic obligations forfeited—executing murderous penalties upon Witherell's devoted carcass if they could come across it, and then depart, uttering oaths and imprecations—go to a house about four miles distant—where Witherell throws off his assassin's garb, then returns to his insulted family, a stranger of course to what had happened, and becomes, when the tale of horror is told him, redoubled in his fears of being masonically murdered! Then to close the disgraceful scene, the affair is published, with comments and notes upon the execrable principles of the fraternity, in all the antimasonic papers, headed in staring capitals, “ANOTHER DARING MASONIC OUTRAGE!!!” These papers are handed about by the leaders of the party, who put on very grave faces and assure the honest citizens, that they believe every word of the spurious outrage, and strive, by means of this and other stories, to keep up that feverish, unnatural excitement upon which their party is based.’

We trust this matter will not be permitted to rest here; that Witherell will not be permitted to escape the punishment due to his villany.

—The Patriot of Wednesday republishes an article from the Buffalo, N. Y. Journal, in which the writer states that he has reason to doubt the correctness of the cross examination of Elder Witherell, before A. T. Bush. He does not give his reason. His belief, however, that it is a forgery, rests on the fact that the Albany Record, in giving what he supposes to be the ‘actual proceedings,’ makes no mention of this ‘cross-examination.’ The proceedings referred to, as having appeared in the Record, are given on the first page of this day's Mirror. It will be seen that they have exclusive reference to the examination of Alonzo Hyde, had on the 8th, 9th 11th and 12th of October. The cross-examination of Witherell took place on the 23d,—eleven days after—and on the examination of David Brown, the second person implicated.—The Record was published on the 30th, and therefore probably could not have received the result of the second examination, in season to appear with the 'actual proceedings' of the first. The Buffalo editor seems to have had no other 'reason' for pronouncing the statement a 'forgery.' And indeed, if he had given other reasons, it would seem a little strange that, situated three hundred miles from the scene of action, he should be in possession of a knowledge of the forgery, a fortnight before it was ascertained to be so, by the papers published in the immediate vicinity. There is no paper published at Hartford. The Washington County paper, in which the certificate of Mr. Bush first appeared, is published weekly at Salem, ten or twelve miles below Hartford. So that, if it were a forgery, the friends of Witherell had it in their power to declare it to be so, the next week after its publication.—This they did not do! Further, had it been a forgery, is it to be supposed that Mr. Bush would have permitted it to pass unnoticed? The gentleman of the Journal was in too much haste to exhibit his wonderful powers of penetration and discovery. We quote from his remarks:

'Since that publication we have received in the Albany Record, what we suppose are the actual proceedings of the court held in the case, and these, as we have entered upon the subject, we shall give entire next week.—Many of the facts set forth in the forged statement ARE CORROBORATED here, and quite enough appears to warrant the sweeping denunciation of the whole affair, as AN ANTIMASONIC TRICK TO OBTAIN VOTES.

'This, however, in no respect, excuses, justifies or palliates the forgery, which stands before the world a defenceless deed of wickedness. As the former account most pointedly impeached Mr. Witherell as an actor in the fraud, and as much of our comment was upon this part of the pretended testimony, it is proper we here state that, the actual investigation, though it does not fully clear Mr. W. from suspicion, does not implicate him so deeply, nor in the same way, as our publication did. We will not comment farther here upon the promised proceedings, except to state that THEY PROVE, most pointedly, a more wide spread knowledge of the trick, among the antimasonic party, THAN EVEN THE FORGERY claimed it to have had!

Now, if many of the facts set forth in the forged statement, are corroborated by the other testimony, and those facts do not clear Witherell from suspicion, but warrant the sweeping denunciation of the affair, as an antimasonic trick to obtain votes, (all of which the writer admits,) what in the name of wonder could have induced any man to commit the forgery? Suppose it be a forgery, every essential fact stated, is admitted to be corroborated by the testimony adduced on the examination of Hyde. We invite the reader to an attentive examination of the evidence in this day's paper. Let him carefully compare the 'cross-examination' of Witherell in the case of Brown, with the testimony elicited on the examination of Hyde, and he will be able to determine for himself whether the charge of forgery is sustained or not. We give all the evidence the editor of the Buffalo Journal has to justify such a belief.

ANTIMASONIC BRUTALITY.—A wretch, bearing the form and aspect of a man, has been convicted and fined, in the paltry sum of twenty dollars! for HORSE WHIPPING, SO AS TO DRAW BLOOD, Mrs. ANNE ROYAL!!—the aged, unfortunate, and unprotected widow of a Revolutionary patriot! The thing who did this—is an antimason. The Pittsburgh, Penn. Statesman, says, 'the defendant pleaded guilty to the charge; but it was insisted by his counsel, Mr. Lowrie, that the penalty ought to be light, merely a nominal fine, owing to the bad character of the prosecutrix and, in particular, because of her abuse of the antimasons!' Was there ever anything more contemptible—more base! Every drop of blood the cowardly villain drew from the body of that defenceless old woman, should have cost him a year of his liberty. Such a brute ought not to be permitted to run at large.

The following extract of a private note to the publishers, from one of our most intelligent and respected fellow-citizens, takes a just and fair view of the persecuting spirit of antimasonry.

'It seems to be a befove every man who loves the principles of justice, respects the rights of individuals or cherishes the good character of our common country, to discountenance that child of the Inquisition, antimasonry: which appears to be a compound of embeccle credulity and persecuting bigotry, lead on by the blackest and most depraved villany. Its ranks are seen to be the common receptacle of what is most vile and infamous in the social and political world. And it would hence certainly seem to be impossible that the honest meaning men, and there are doubtless many of them, who have been duped into the cause, can long remain uncontaminated by the association. To charge men falsely with committing murders that have never taken place, with the design of deceiving the credulous and destroying the innocent, is but one remove from the guilt of assassination itself: and he who would do the one can be restrained by no moral principles, but by the fear of the law alone, from perpetrating the other.

Whatever may be the testimony of seceding Masons, or the belief of the uninitiated, to the contrary, every Mason knows that, that institution, like other social and charitable associations, enjoins upon its members, as a paramount duty, to be just, veracious, upright, benevolent and charitable, and that there is nothing in it calculated to impede the operations of the laws of the land, or thwart the principles of justice. Hence, it is only necessary to spread the light of truth and the darkness of error will vanish. It will then be seen that there is no evil in Freemasonry and as little good in antimasonry. In this work you seem to be diligent and efficient laborers, and I wish you God speed.'

The killed and wounded in the late conflicts at Paris, are ascertained to amount to 7,000. There had been received into hospitals the following number of wounded:

De la Charite,	150
Hotel Dieu,	500
Hotel Dieu, out patients,	300
Hospital Beaujon,	86
Grand Caillon,	250
De la Pitie,	120
Val de Grace,	32
FREEMASON'S LODGE,	80

No returns had been made from the Ambulances, or from St. Louis and Antoine. The killed, and deaths from wounds, were estimated at 2,700. Most of the wounds were severe; they were generally gun shot wounds, and almost all were received in front. The operations, though of a very serious nature, had generally succeeded; and the people in the hospitals had exhibited great heroism, whilst the wounded soldiery had lost all moral and physical energy.—[National Intel.]

THEATRE.—The enterprising manager of the Tremont Theatre has given notice that he has concluded an engagement with the celebrated tragedian, Mr. C. Kean, for six nights. He will appear on Monday evening in the character of Glo'ster, in Richard the Third. The box office will be opened this day, at 10 o'clock. Kean is spoken of by the Southern critics in high terms of commendation; his person, voice and manner are said to resemble those of the father so closely, as to render the illusion, on the score of personal identity, almost complete.

Miss Clara Fisher closed her engagement at the Tremont on Wednesday evening.

EXECUTION.—On Friday last, James Gray (one of the signers of the 'Antimasonic Declaration of Independence!') was executed in this village, for the murder of Samuel Davis. He was taken from the jail a little after 12 o'clock, and walked the distance of about a half a mile to the gallows. He appeared strong and resolute, keeping the most perfect time with the music, which played his death march. On arriving at the gallows, he ascended the stairs with a firm step, without any assistance. A sermon was preached on the scaffold by the Rev. Mr. Fillmore, and prayers were made by several of the Rev. gentlemen who were present. At fifteen minutes before two, he was informed by the Sheriff that his time had arrived. He immediately sprung upon his feet, and stood, unassisted by any one, while the halter was tied around his neck. He then shook hands with the Sheriff, and the Clergyman who had attended him—the cap was drawn over his face, and he resolutely stepped upon the drop—the Sheriff cut the rope, and he was launched into eternity. The concourse of people that assembled to witness the execution was immense—not less than 20,000. No accident occurred during the day.—[Batavia Times.]

CONVICTION.—Joseph J. Knapp, Jr. has been convicted, at Salem, as accessory to the murder of Joseph White, and sentenced to be executed. George Crowninshield charged with the same offence, has been acquitted. Another indictment was read, charging the prisoner with misprision of felony. He was ordered to recognize himself with one surety, in the sum of $500 each, and was released.

The Hartford Mercury says that a gentleman from the west states that a pedler of Navarino bonnets, supposed to be Frederick R. Hatch, from Concord, N. H. is supposed to have been murdered by one Goodspeed, at Castleton, who invited him to go to his house, 2 or 3 miles distant, since which he had not been heard of, and G. had absconded.

NEWSPAPORIALS.—Mr. Hill, editor and proprietor of the Boston Galaxy, &c. has purchased the Commentator, which for the future will be distributed every Sunday morning, under the title of 'The Commentator and Sunday Times.'

A rumor of the death of Geo. IV. and of a French revolution was mentioned in Calcutta papers in March, several months before those events.

Mr. T. A. Hayden of Lincoln has picked 400 bushels of cranberries on his farm this season, which he sold in this city for $600.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, Mr. Benjamin Beal, jr. to Miss Elizabeth Leighton.

In Concord, Mr. William Dodge to Miss Emily Ann Augusta Prescott; Mr. Bradley Blanchard to Miss Mary Bowers.

In New-Bedford, Mr. Silas Denham, to Miss Martha D. Baker.

DEATHS.

In Wilmington, Mass. on the 15th inst. Dr. Jabez Brown, aged 88.

In Monson, Mr. Emery Hyde, aged 25.

In Wilbraham, Mr. Joseph Cooley, aged 62.

In Westhampton, Mr. Solomon Judd, aged 78.

READING ROOM.

In compliance with the wishes of many of their friends, the publishers of the Mirror, have procured the Chambers No. 22, Cornhill, (late Market street,) for the purpose of opening a Masonic Reading Room. Subscriptions received at this office.

REMOVAL. The office of the Mirror will be removed to the above place, about the first of next month.

THE MIDNIGHT MAIL.

[By Miss. H. F. Gould.]

'T is midnight—all is peace profound!
But lo! upon the murmuring ground,
The lonely, swelling, hurrying sound
Of distant wheels is heard;
They come—they pause a moment—when,
Their charge resigned, they start, and then
Are gone, and all is hushed again
As not a leaf had stirred.

Hast thou a parent far away—
A beauteous child to be thy stay
In life's decline—or sisters, they
Who shared thy infant glee?
A brother on a foreign shore?
Is he whose breast thy token bore,
Or are thy treasures wandering o'er
A wide tumultuous sea?

If ought like these, then thou must feel,
The rattlings of that reckless wheel,
That brings the bright, or boding seal,
On every trembling thread
That strings thy heart, till morn appears
To crown thy hopes, or end thy fears—
To light the smile, or draw thy tears,
'As line on line is read.

Perhaps thy treasure's in the deep—
Thy lover in a dreamless sleep—
Thy brother where he canst not weep
Upon his distant grave!
Thy parent's hoary head no more
May shed a silver lustre o'er
His children grouped—nor death restore
Thy son from out the wave!

Thy prattler's tongue, perhaps is stilled,
Thy sisters lip is pale and chilled,
Thy blooming bride, perchance, has filled
Her corner of the tomb.
May be, the home where all thy sweet
And tender recollections meet,
Has shown its flaming winding sheet,
In midnight's awful gloom!

And while alternate, o'er my soul,
Those cold, or burning wheels will roll
Their light or shade, beyond control,
Till morn shall bring relief,
Father in Heaven, what'er may be
The cup which thou hast sent to me;
I know 't is good, prepared by Thee,
Though filled with joy or grief!

[By Thomas Moore.]

Oh say, thou best and brightest!
My first love and my last!
When he whom now thou slightest,
From life's dark scene has past:
Will kinder thoughts then move thee?
Will pity take one thrill
For him who lived to love thee,
And dying, loved the still.

If, when that hour recalling
From which he dates his woes,
Thou feel'st a tear drop falling—
Ah! blush not while it flows:
And all the past forgiving,
Beneath gently o'er his shrine,
And say, this heart when living,
With all its faults—was mine!

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

[ORIGINAL.]

ANTIQUITY OF FREEMASONRY.

Opposition frequently elicits the evidence of truth.—Many things have been adduced by the enemies of Freemasons to demonstrate to the world that their institution is of modern date, as if the fact proved would detract from its usefulness and respectability. To Masons it is of little importance whether the society has existed from time immemorial or of recent origin; but to science it may be useful to understand that Masonic emblems do not originate from fancy, as the badges and decorations of folly. The object of this communication is to illustrate not only the antiquity of Masonry, but that the society existed in the early ages of the world, when all language was symbolic, when mental perceptions and affections were expressed by things of nature, by visible objects of the world, to which perceptions and affections of the mind correspond. The science of correspondence was lost in the early ages, since which we see the figures or representative images without a knowledge of their interior meaning or signification.

‘It is a fact which was well known in ancient times, though it has long been lost sight of, that there does exist, by the first laws of nature and creation, a constant mutual relation between spiritual things, or such as relate to the mind and its perceptions, and the objects which appear in outward nature; which is such, that natural things answer to spiritual by an unalterable, fixed, and most exact analogy or correspondence, so that in every natural object an image of some spiritual thing or principle is to be seen. Then who does not know without any one to inform him, that light is an exact image of truth; darkness of ignorance and falsehood; fire of love? And if some natural things thus clearly answer to certain spiritual things, who can doubt that all natural things do the same, and that such correspondence is essential to nature?’—Reverend Samuel Noble.

Ignorant of letters, wanting facilities we possess to communicate their ideas, the most ancient people transmitted to posterity not only their sacred records, but the common concerns of life by images or representations engraved on wood and stone corresponding to the ideas and thoughts signified by the representatives. Thus was preserved their knowledge of sacred things: and such is the language of the sacred scriptures dictated by God to man as expressed in the letter, representing spiritual and divine things by natural images. The most ancient people perceived that things of the natural world derived from the spiritual as their cause had reference and corresponded thereto. The same ideas are expressed by St. Paul, where he says, ‘the invisible things of Him (God) from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made even his eternal power and God-head.’

From this source we learn the origin of symbols and hieroglyphics. ‘Kirby and Spence in their introduction to entomology, speaking of natural objects as representatives of spiritual things proceed to account for the origin of idolatry. To what degree of knowledge the primeval races of men attained after the fall we are no where informed; but we learn from the highest authority, that the revelation that God made of himself to man was in time corrupted by those professing themselves to be wise, became fools to the grossest idolatry, which sunk men into the lowest depths of sensuality, vice and wickedness. In no country was this effect more lamentably striking than in Egypt, whose gods were selected from the animal and vegetable kingdoms. This species of idolatry doubtless originally resulted from their having been taught things in nature were symbols of things above nature and of the attributes of the God-head.

‘In process of time, while corruption remained, the knowledge which had been abused was lost or dimly seen. The Egyptian priesthood perhaps retained some remains of it; but by them it was made an esoteric doctrine not to be communicated to the profane vulgar, who were suffered to regard the various objects of their superstitious veneration not as a symbol, but as possessed of inherent divinity; and probably the mysteries of Isis of Egypt and Ceres of Elis were instituted, that this esoteric doctrine, which was to be kept secret and sacred from the people might not be lost?’

‘What with the most enlightened scientific writers has been conjecture is now plain matter of fact, subject to neither doubt nor argument. The reader cannot but be struck with the coincidence of the views above expressed in the extract from Kirby and Spence on the subject of idolatry, with those he may meet with in No. 7097 of the ARCANA CAELESTIA, of which the following is an extract. ‘The Egyptians from ancient time knew Jehovah, by reason that even in Egypt there had been an ancient church, as may manifestly appear from this consideration, that they had amongst them the representatives and significations of a church; the Egyptian hieroglyphics are nothing but such [representatives and significations]; for by them were signified spiritual things; they knew also that they actually corresponded; and in as much as they began to apply such in their worship, and to worship them, and at length to turn them into things magical, and thereby to be associated to the diabolical crew in hell, therefore they destroyed the ancient church among themselves; hence it is, that by the Egyptians in the word cre signified the perverse scientific of the church.

‘When divine worship was thus perverted in Egypt, then also it was no longer allowed them to worship Jehovah, and at length not even to know that Jehovah was the God of the ancient church; and on this account, lest they should profane the name of Jehovah.

‘That the name of Jehovah was also known at that time and this before it was again declared to the posterity of Abraham by Moses in Mount Horeb, evidently appears from this consideration, that Balaam, who was from Syria not only knew Jehovah, but also adored him and likewise sacrificed to him.’—N. J. M.

It cannot be a matter of doubt that in most ancient times there existed a far better state of the world, than at subsequent periods; succeeding which there was a long period of moral and intellectual darkness attended by murder and rapine. ‘And God saw the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually; and the earth was corrupt before God; and the earth was filled with violence.’—Genesis vi. 5.

Notwithstanding the general prevalence of wickedness, immorality and vice the consequence of idolatry, the knowledge of Jehovah the true God being lost among the nations, yet individuals were to be found amongst the great mass of the people, who, if not openly, yet privately paid humble and sincere adoration to his most holy name. According to the unenlightened ideas of that age, these were denominated good and true. It has ever been the case, that men agreeing in opinions upon subjects moral and intellectual, have separated themselves from those whom they believed immoral or less virtuous; and have formed associations for mutual protection and defence. This was more necessary when mankind were under no restraints religious or civil against the commission of crime. A band of brothers thus constituted found it not only convenient but absolutely necessary, during the dark ages of idolatry, to form signs and symbols in conformity to the analogical language of that period, expressive of their principles, and by which they were able to recognise each other wherever dispersed, to communicate and transmit to their successors through their generations what knowledge they possessed of God, His attributes and moral science by natural images corresponding to things spiritual and moral represented by them.

These emblems are still retained by the fraternity, but much of the science, or its highest signification was lost or impaired during succeeding ages of idolatry and universal depravity of the nations of the earth. The remains of symbolic language are at this day found among the Eastern nations, but under perverted and corrupt forms. Even the knowledge of the hieroglyphics of Egypt, which in all probability will be demonstrated to be a record of their religious institutions, is lost to the descendants of that ancient people, its present inhabitants. Those relics of ancient science have always excited the wonder of modern nations. It is reserved for the investigating spirit of the present age to give a key to these recondite treasures of ancient learning, which, as we are informed by undoubted authority are in successful development.

To return, these signs and symbols, at that early time, became a language known to the fraternity amongst all nations and every tongue, for signs and symbols signifying ideas of things, having always the same essential meaning may be understood to all, without the aid or medium of vocal sounds or articulate language.

Permanent hieroglyphical representatives of things spiritual, moral and intellectual were by them employed for mutual convenience and safety, when idolatrous worship often accompanied by human sacrifices, was enforced by arbitrary authority under severest penalties for disobedience. All religions since the fall, not excepting various denominations of the Christian, at times have been coerced on man in some way by arbitrary authority. This was more especially the case when all nations of the earth were subjected to authorised idolatry. Of this we have abundant evidence found in the sacred oracles. The history of the three children of Israel, who refused to obey the decrees of Nebuchadnezzar to worship a golden image set up in the plain of Dura is well known to readers of the scriptures.

When Darius was elevated to the throne of the Medes and Persians, he preferred the prophet Daniel to the first place amongst the presidents and princes of the kingdom. Jealous of the prophets growing popularity and favor with the king, the nobility excited his impious pride to proclaim this decree, ‘that no man should ask a petition or any God or man for thirty days, save the king, under the penalty of being cast into the den of lions for disobedience. Daniel was known to be a worshipper of the true God; and was anticipated the prophet was found praying and making supplications to his God. The penalty was enforced, and he given to the wild beasts: but Jehovah by his angel shut their mouths and preserved him from harm. These men faithful to their principles proved themselves to be good and true. The above facts from sacred record are here adduced to remind the reader that Jehovah always interfered for his true worshippers, during the gloomy ages of infidelity and idolatry.

It is most evident that Moses was an idolater, and was ignorant of Jehovah until He manifested himself in a flame of fire out of the bush, at Mount Horeb. When Jehovah directed him to go to Pharaoh and bring forth out of Egypt the children of Israel, Moses hesitated on account of his inability to execute so great a work, until he received the promise of God, that he would be with him; and as a token of its fulfilment, He said to Moses, 'When thou hast brought forth the people from Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain.' Moses said unto God, 'behold when I come to the children of Israel, and shall say unto them the God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say unto me, what is his name? what shall I say unto them?' And God said unto Moses 'I AM THAT I AM. Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel I AM hath sent me unto you.'

We learn from the scriptures by what means Jehovah protects those who acknowledge him in sincerity and truth, and how He restores to Himself those who have led idolatrous lives.

Where history is silent respecting the fraternity tradition supplies its place. A large proportion of profane history is traditional, but is received as fact, since hieroglyphic science has given place to letters. Under the Mosaic dispensation, the fraternity, united as they were for mutual protection, and known to each other by their signs and symbols, enjoyed higher privileges than they had experienced under the regimen of idolatrous nations. Their essential emblems had been preserved through all the periods of the rise and decline of kingdoms. What stronger demonstration of the remote origin and antiquity of the society, than their preservation of the signs and emblems with the same significations, which appertained to them during the period of symbolic language. These without other evidence incontrovertibly prove the antiquity of Freemasons.

As the institution of Masons, at its commencement, was merely moral, and even during the ages of idolatry acknowledged Jehovah as the one God, so they rested in safety among a people who had been idolaters, but to whom the worship of Jehovah had been miraculously restored. The fraternity, at the period Solomon under Divine direction commenced the building of the temple for the worship of God, were held among that nation in estimation for their integrity and industry; and from these, who had exceedingly increased in number under the theocratic government of the Israelites, Solomon selected his cunning artificers and scientific workmen. The Jewish nation having beheld its morning-dawn, its rising greatness and passed its meridian splendor and glory, was doomed on account of sins and iniquities to be subdued, its religious institutions subverted, and to return to the state of bondage, from which it had in its infancy been miraculously liberated. During the Babylonish captivity this people hung their harps upon the willows, their songs of joy were not heard in a strange land.

The object of the preceding is to demonstrate that Masonic signs and emblems were first instituted in that age of the world when all language was symbolic; that is when all nations expressed interior perceptions and mental affections by natural representatives, or by natural things and images corresponding to perceptions and affections of the mind; and further exhibit proofs that Masonry is as ancient as the symbolic signs or emblems employed, retaining still the same significations as when originally used.

The fraternity during the dark as well as more enlightened periods have acknowledged Jehovah as the one and only God, whether as individuals they have worshipped Him in spirit and truth or not; and have received his holy word to be the rule and guide of their faith and practice, whether in their lives they have conformed to its precepts or not, without subscribing, as a society, to any creeds or dogmas of faith compiled by men; believing as they do that the scriptures in their purity ought to be venerated more than the uncertain traditions and commentations of men, which often lead astray from truth.

In all ages, Freemasons have been more or less persecuted, in some parts of the world. Their pacific deportment has not been, at all periods, their shield against sectarian bigotry and malevolence. Notwithstanding their wish to live in peace with all, yet during that sanguine age when christendom was subjected to papal hierarchy, and men were immolated for their principles, Masons were persecuted in most of the kingdoms of Europe in common with the various protestant denominations, who dared to publicly abjure papal dominion and its religious faith.—Rather than renounce their principles, many with protestants suffered imprisonment and death: extraordinary as it may seem such were the corruptions of the age that the persecuted in their turn became persecutors so soon as they had power to exercise their vindictive spirit. What Masonic principles are, the civil and religious institutions of this country, at this day attest. We take a laudable pride in acknowledging ourselves descendants of those noble and virtuous men, who dared to cast off the prejudices of a corrupt education, to renounce doctrines not consonant with reason, nor in conformity to the word of God.

The fundamental principles of Masonic institutions may be now perceived to be liberty and equality. These principles in their infancy were cherished and nurtured in secret society, because of the hazard attending their avowed and open promulgation. Hence one objection among others against secret societies is, that they are dangerous. We admit they are dangerous to arbitrary governments and men possessing the impure spirit and principles of arbitrary powers; these only persecute secret societies. Let it be remembered that every improvement in civil and religious opinions, during the reigns of terror, were first suggested and matured for overt operation in secret society, till so much strength had been acquired, that oppression was openly braved and successfully resisted.—The reformation commenced in Germany in secret society. Papal power alarmed for her prerogatives issued her murderous bulls. Thousands were massacred under the prescriptive influence of the bloody edict of Nantz. The reformation nevertheless progressed, and was the immediate parent of all civil and religious liberty on earth. The reformation effected much good by removing obstacles to improvement—and but one remains to be accomplished. None but bigots and friends to arbitrary powers will allege that secret societies are dangerous to civil and religious liberties. It has been said that secret societies were the source from which the reformation originated. We as Masons do not claim so much honor as is due to the bold conscientious leaders of the reformation. We intend only to establish the fact, that these important principles which led to the reformation, liberty and equality were always nurtured in Masonic societies.

Well might the antimasonic Abbe Burnel of France and professor Robinson of Scotland, both powerful advocates of arbitrary governments denounce the secret Masonic institutions of Germany and France, at the period of the French revolution, believing as they did, that the doctrines of liberty and equality which by them were propagated, would eventually subvert both civil and religious institutions of Europe. Abbe Burnel has pointed out the causes of what he most dreaded, and we live to see the effects in full operation.

Has the age of Masonic persecution returned? The tyrant in principle and feeling is always the same. Under some governments he is under greater restraints than others. Here the fraternity have nothing to fear from deadly persecution; the foe, internally immoral as he may, be is restricted in his nefarious actions by penal laws; still he threatens evils to those who do not succumb to the creeds of his assumed orthodoxy and perjured practices; deprived of the power of cutting off heads, he gluts his revengeful appetite with the destruction of good reputations. The same savage principles are now in operation, which proscribed men for opinions and burnt heretics at the stake; but power is wanting while the principles remain.

As a society Masons have no higher ambition for this life than to make themselves useful members of society. Civil preferment, places of honor or profit they never courted. If elected to office, by the fair suffrages of their fellow citizens, they feel a laudable satisfaction in the performance of its duties. They were ever among the first to encourage freedom of opinions as a principle of their institution, where the persecuted of every denomination might find an asylum.

The United States enjoy their excellent civil codes supported by liberal sentiments, advocated, at all periods, by the fraternity. Considerate men require no higher evidence of their benevolent intentions. It is true, they do not, as customary with other societies, ostentatiously proclaim to the world their pecuniary charities; their precept is, 'let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth.'

It has been said by their enemies, that Masons are a combination of immoral men to subvert all civil and social order. Without calling into view many of the acknowledged best characters that America ever did produce and who in their lives bore testimony to the purity of Masonic principles, it may be demonstrated there are as few morally bad men in the society, as any denomination whatever, not excepting the most pure. The infuriated leaders of a faction mounted on the antimasonic hobby-horse would ride over better men to office and power.—Such are those who subvert civil and social order and destroy the peace and harmony of society.

The penman of an observation intended as a flattering compliment to Masons on occasion of the late procession, has laid too great stress on their moral courage. A man requires no stronger support against the obloquy and slander of his enemies, than a conscience void of offence towards his God and man. The time was, when Masonic principles, in a moral point of view, superseded all the religious institutions of the world; that period is past; the period here alluded to was when all nations bowed in adoration to idols. Under the corruptions of papal dominion, the Bible ever esteemed the great light of the fraternity, was industriously concealed in cloisters from the public eye. At this day, we are or may be made free by its general diffusion,—by the light of Divine truth emanating from the sacred volume. This society without arrogating to itself any goodness has existed, under Divine Providence, for ages, wherein was preserved the unity of the God-head, amidst idolatry and universal corruption. In most impressive language, the Lord Jesus Christ repeatedly reproves pharisaical goodness. Masons believe that to love the Lord with all the heart and mind and the neighbor as ourselves is the fulfilment of the law and the prophets.

The use of Masonic societies has been questioned by the ignorant. If they have been beneficial to its members during the dark ages of idolatry as protection against rapaciousness and murder; if during the wars of all ages, individuals have had their lives spared, have been relieved of distress, their wants supplied by a brother under the garb of an enemy, will it be said the institution is useless? It is said the charities of the society being partial in their effects are opposed to the Christian doctrines of universal benevolence. The same argument is equally valid against all civil and religious societies, so far as they appropriate their funds to promote their particular views and special purposes. Such like feelings will continue to have an operative influence, until the doctrines of Christianity are universally known and become effective on the minds of all men to produce unity of opinions and harmonious concord. This is remote from being the state of mankind at the present period. When the millennial age anticipated by Christians will arrive we are ignorant. Until then Masonic institutions may be useful, as they have been, proportionate to their means of benevolence, more than this of themselves can any society predict? Opinions are in a state of revolution. The present period is an age of warfare and commotion. Mankind are fighting not only for their political rights and civil privileges, but contending for their religious institutions and dogmas of faith. This day is the following prophesy spiritually fulfilled in our ears. 'The Egyptian shall fight the Egyptian, kingdom against kingdom, city against city.' The Egyptian fighting the Egyptian, signifies, those who are deeply grounded in error, contending with those in persuasions equally erroneous. Kingdom against kingdom, signifies those who are imbued with false opinions disputing with others who are also in fault for the sake of dominion. City against city represents the doctrines of the various disputants.

ANTIMASONIC SYMPHONIES.

NO. X.

NEW-ENGLAND SPIRIT.

TUNE,—Smiling little bottle of rum.

Come, Anties all draw near,
And I'll tell what's like small-beer:
So, gentlemen, I pray come, come;
Freemasons have the merit
Like small-beer to want true spirit—
But the Anties are a bottle of rum, rum, rum,
But the Anties are a bottle of rum.

We have banged the Masons well,
More than any tongue can tell,
Still they all have, to a man, been mum,
Now its proof they're very tame
To keep still while we defame;—
But the Anties &c.

The Anties I admire,
See what spirit! see what fire!
It really does revive me some;
While the Masons, stupid drones,
Are as spiritless as stones—
But the Anties &c.

Can Masons be to blame,
To be timorous and tame?
Not a member dares to lift a thumb!
They are just like any child,
They're so quiet and so mild—
But the Anties &c.

When we met at Faneuil Hall
We were driven to the wall,
The jacks so hissed and groaned: what a hum!
Freemasons don't inherit
Half their real New-England spirit—
But the Anties &c.

Between ourselves, you know,
And no farther it's to go,
When the Irish bubble burst, we were dumb.
Still the craft were very quiet
When we thought they'd make a riot—
But the Anties &c.

Our Committee, I must say
Felt a little down that day,
It did each member's sense benumb;
But we soon got up again,
And it's therefore very plain
That the Anties are a bottle of rum, rum, rum,
That the Anties are a bottle of rum.

'PENNSYLVANIA IS ANTIMASONIC.'—Thus saith the Antimasonic Herald, a paper published somewhere in this county, and this conclusion to which it has arrived, is not the result of a mere speculation, or idle dreaming, but of sober, deep and accurate mathematical calculation—the language of figures, which cannot lie. It is not our intention now, neither has it ever been, (for that indeed would be an endless and a thankless and a useless task,) to follow and refute that respectable Journal, 'the child of thirty six fathers,' in its multitudinous ramblings into the labyrinths of folly and of falsehood, but just now and then only, for our special amusement, or to excite the risible muscles of our readers, either of pity or contempt, at some of the bold strokes of its multi-paternity. Pennsylvania antimasonic!!!! 'What recklessness of assertion?' The very insinuation, were it to proceed from a respectable source, would be an open insult to the virtue, intelligence, and patriotism of our citizens.—Pennsylvania never was and never can be antimasonic.—Is it necessary to argue that matter?—We think not. Every thing in our past history—every thing in our present condition, and every thing in our future prospects, scout at the idea. The memory of our sages and heroes of the revolution—the virtue and patriotism of the present generation—the principles and nature of our institutions and government, all, all alike forbid it. Before Pennsylvania can become antimasonic, she must desert her principles—slander the memory of her best benefactors—turn traitor to her unflinching democracy, and finally desert the old Hero of New Orleans!! And is she prepared to do all this? Who will answer in the affirmative? No other than a knave or a fool—the fit tenant of a jail or a madhouse. There is, moreover, not a state in the union antimasonic—none so foolish and so suicidal—none that would so far calumniate the memory of the sainted Washington, and his illustrious compatriots in the glorious work of the revolution.

New York, indeed, in a moment of delusion, in the fancied attempt of avenging the insulted and broken laws of the country, seemed for a while to lean that way, but the delusion passed away, when she discovered that it was not the broken law, the bleeding victim, which antimasonry wanted to avenge; but that the object which it wished to achieve, by the means of the sympathies of our nature, by a professed reverence for the constitution and laws of the land, was political, basely political, the acquisition of political power and of office. Then, indeed, in the honest indignation of her heart, she threw from her embrace the deceiver—the serpent in disguise, and now, like Pennsylvania, and every other state in the union, she is republican to the core. Antimasonry is in magnitude and character, to Pennsylvania and to the union, only what the spots upon the sun's disk are to that glorious luminary—nothing more.—[Lancaster Republican.]

The anti-papers seem determined to be satisfied with nothing which is calculated to allay the commotion they have produced. They appear to be very nettlesome about the Act repealing the charter of the Grand Lodge in this state, and come out with strong efforts (the North Star and Antirepublican in particular) to provoke a fresh excitement, and substitute other fuel for that which the act in question has taken away. This is precisely as we expected. They dread nothing so much as the allaying of the present excitement, for with it would depart all their hopes of future power and greatness.

We have ever entertained and expressed an opinion that could the leaders of antimasonry completely annihilate masonry from the earth by a single nod, no argument could prevail upon them to do it, and we believe every person who has the exercise of his sober reason, would entertain the same opinion, if he would duly consider the following facts, viz. that most of the leaders of antimasonry are or have been candidates for office, to wit, Clark, Palmer, Jones, Slade, Flint, Loveland, Ransom, Merrill, Cutler, Caboon, &c. As an evidence that the people have not heretofore considered them fit for the stations to which they aspire, we offer the fact, that they have either opposed their elections to such station or if elected have found them incompetent or unfaithful, and have re-elected them to the shades of private life. These men have become dissatisfied with the verdict of the people, and are taking hold of the present excitement for the purpose of reaching the desired elevation. And now should Masonry which is ostensibly the exciting cause, be destroyed—the great majority of the antimasons who are doubtless acting from honest motives, would cease to be excited, reason would resume her throne; and judgment again would be duly exercised. Let such a state of things exist and the hopes of these aspiring leaders vanish forever. They are aware of this, and therefore desire nothing so much as to perpetuate Masonry to feed the excitement, until they can accomplish their ambitious designs. For the purposes of deception no doubt the Antirepublican says, the 'bill was introduced by one of the fraternity.' But if the Journal of the House is correct, the bill was introduced by Mr. Eurbank of Newbury, who never was a Mason, and who is very extensively known as not being one.—[Vermont Enquirer.]

A GOOD PROPOSAL.—The Editor of the Genesee Republican has addressed a letter to the Editor of the Le Roy Gazette, from which we make the following extract.

Suppose, sir, we embark in a fair and candid discussion of a subject which now agitates the minds [of our readers.] I do not mean that we shall discuss Masonry; but as you have charged me with joining a Masonic party in my politics, I now propose to you to come forward and prove that there is such a party in existence. You profess to be contending against a Masonic party in politics; do, sir, point out the existence of such a party; and in addition, prove your own party is one that a republican can honestly support.

From this letter we gather that the Editor of the 'Le Roy Gazette' is an advocate of the Antimasonic 'Humbug,' and that his opponent of the 'Republican' is more than probably, a Mason. We hope the proposal will be met fairly, and the subject frankly discussed. We have for a long time heard of the Masons being murderers and scoundrels, but before we credit any more assertions of this nature, we must have the arguments and see the proofs. Indeed, the violence and fanaticism of the Antimasons of the west, have long ago convinced us that the charges could not be substantiated, and in fact we know that they cannot.

We believe that Morgan was murdered—and murdered by three or four men calling themselves Masons,—but those three or four men who were guilty of this outrage, are alone to blame, and there is no excuse for their conduct.—By this unwarrantable deed, they have put themselves without the pale of civilized society, and we know, that could the perpetrators of that crime be found, no portion of the people would be more willing than the Masons, that they should receive the reward of their evil deeds.

We know that the Masons do not esteem a man the more for merely being initiated or introduced among them,—they must prove him an honourable and upright man, or they do not fellowship him as a Mason. We believe that every honorable and upright man is a Mason in heart and no others are Masons. We believe that the greatest secret is charity, and this secrecy consists in doing good to mankind privately, and without blazoning it through the public prints, like our pharisaical givers of alms. This is the head and front of their offending as a body, and if unworthy individuals have crept in among them, it is no more than may be said of the best religious societies that ever existed. There is no place without its unclean things. Is a whole society thus constituted, a legitimate object of persecution? God forbid—else there is no security in the social compact.

But we have yet to learn what influence the Masons have had in politics. We know that as a body, they have waited quietly for the storm of opposition and persecution to pass by, and have displayed a Christian spirit of forbearance which in the minds of the just will put to shame the infuriated zeal of their opponents. With the Editor of the Republican, we may say to the Antimasons, 'You profess to be contending against a MASONIC PARTY IN POLITICS! Do, gentlemen, point out the existence of such a party.' For ourselves, we have had no reason to believe that it does exist—except in the distempered brain of fanatics. To put down fanaticism of any kind is the business of the press, and with the blessing of Heaven, we will not be found among those who will hang back and see any man or set of men persecuted for opinion's sake, nor hunted down like wild beasts to gratify the crafty and designing riders of an infamous political hobby.

DEWITT CLINTON.

Perhaps there is no man that ever lived, who will longer remain in the memory of posterity, or who will receive a higher degree of respect and gratitude from his countrymen than will the man whose name heads this article. His abilities as a statesman placed him in the very front rank of greatness; his acquirements as a jurist were second to but few if any; his learning as a scholar was preeminently great; his knowledge and science was most extensive; his conduct as a man was without reproach and above suspicion. He was the pride of his country and the admiration of the world. His friends loved and revered him, and even, his worst enemies acknowledged his private virtues and moral worth. Amidst all the conflicting violence of a long political life, and during the greatest ragings of the storm of party strife, no one ever by look or word, or any 'ambiguous giving out,' denoted that he knew or suspected aught against him in the least detrimental to his private character, or in any degree injurious to him as a man of honor, probity and virtue.—When he died, all, friends and foes, united together in expressing high testimony not only to his talents but to his purity of life.

But after he had been some time in his grave, a fiend arose—the fiend of antimasonry—like a mildew blasting all that came within its pestiferous and pestilential influence. With the spirit of a demon it uttered the language of detraction against the man who during his life had been unassailed in his private reputation. It sought to lay the charge of infamy on his memory and to bring foul reproach on his good name. This evil begotten slander was, that he had committed suicide in consequence of the workings of a guilty conscience by reason of his being concerned in the murder of Morgan! That, fearful his crime would be divulged, he had preferred 'DEATH TO DISGRACE!'

This is the slander that was boldly uttered, and has since been repeatedly insinuated by the antimasonic party. Yet these men now have the unblushing assurance to call on the friends of the Great Dead, to give them their votes to sustain a cause which hoped to further itself by the libel on his memory.

If such a man as Clinton, after having devoted his whole life and talents to the service of his country, to the promotion of learning and science, and to the advancement of knowledge and virtue, be not safe from the shafts of malice, who can expect to escape calumny? If a party aim to build itself up, by insulting all that is good and villifying all that is great, what can we expect from it should it acquire power? Persecution would stalk abroad and vengeance would meet us in our daily walks. Malignity would continually scowl at us, and ill-will would constantly threaten us. Our prayer, our sincere prayer, is, that such an evil may not visit us. Of one thing we feel a confident assurance, that the sincere friends of Clinton will not lend their aid to advance the calumniators of the man, with whom they so long acted, of whom as a chief they were proud, and for whose elevation they so ardently laboured.—[Albany Advertiser.]

TIT FOR TAT. In the address of the Seneca County Antimasonic Convention, signed by Robert S. Rose, we find the following inquiries.—

'Have Antimasons robbed a wife of her husband, and children of their parent?' 'Have they murdered a brother?' We answer yes. Two of the signers of the antimasonic 'declaration of independence' have been convicted of murdering a husband and a parent and are sentenced to be hung at Batavia on the 5th of next month; the punishment of one of them, however, has been commuted through the clemency of Gov. Throop.

Precisely the same reasoning that would implicate all Masons in the murder of Morgan, would make all Antimasons guilty of the murder committed by the two Grays.

THANKSGIVING.

As the season has returned, which custom has established for the observance of a day of Thanksgiving in this Commonwealth, it may not be mistaken to turn our attention to those pleasing associations, which are connected with this festival, and to one, who enters into the spirit and design of the day, it may not be altogether unprofitable.

The fitness and propriety of keeping such a festival will not be doubted by any who believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, who is the sole Governor of times and seasons, who so uniformly brings seed time and harvest. Though He has been pleased to fix certain general laws by which the vast machine of nature is governed, yet we are dependant on His truth and veracity, alone, to carry those laws into effect. Philosophers tell us that the pleasing variety of the seasons is produced by the elliptical figure of the earth's orbit. What keeps this planet within its circumscribed bounds, so that it neither wanders too far from nor approaches too near its grand centre? 'Attraction and repulsion,' says the sneering infidel, and after he has exhausted himself in following up the concatenation of secondary causes, he finally gives over the chase, and mentally acknowledges a Great first Cause.

Thanksgiving then, is a grateful act of praise to the truth and veracity of the Great Mover of the spheres. It is no argument against the harmony and regularity of the vast machine of nature because the common bounties of the earth are not equally distributed in every part of the globe. If one part suffers by drought, other parts, of course, have the greater supply of rain and the more abundant harvest. If some parts exceed others in fertility of soil, the rolling ocean wafts the superabundance to cold and sterile lands. Surely God is the first object of gratitude and praise.

If ever the finer sensibilities of our hearts are brought into exercise, they will be on this occasion. We are all children of the same family, having the same general wants, and alike dependant on one another's friendships and good offices. We should feel, then, that this earth is one habitation, and that its inhabitants are all brethren. The very laws of nature we have seen, teach us this fact. If the rolling ocean is designed as a medium by which to make a more equal distribution of the goods of the earth, then let us remember the poor and needy,—the solitary widow, and the weeping orphan. Let us not regard the contents of our well filled barns and storerooms merely as objects of gain and speculation. Let us not send the famished mendicant from our doors with the cold and heartless cheer of 'how came you here in this forlorn situation?' Let us do good and communicate, and as we have received bountifully, so freely let us give.

Every well ordered family, on this day, is ambitious of preparing something by way of cheer, which is a little out of the common course, and if prudence and economy are duly consulted, who will find fault? Why should we not be joyful, when Providence has crowned our labours with success? We are sensitive beings, and there are times and seasons when it were almost criminal in us not to manifest our contentment and happiness, by some decent outward token. I may be an enthusiast, but I do verily believe that a thanksgiving supper, eaten with suitable reflections, is the best expression of gratitude to the Great Giver of all good, which the good man experiences during the year. The holy devotions of his heart are not damped by a distrust of Divine Providence, (so common to human nature, before hope is consummated) for he has been cared for.

After the day has been spent in a manner which is in unison with its spirit and design, friends and neighbors may get together, and enjoy the evening in innocent festivity. We are not drones, nor eremites; but active, rational and social beings. I have no kind of objection to the association of the young people for an hour or two, and if Edwin and Carella are not a little too rude and noisy, I will be the last to interrupt their innocent and well-timed glee.

Seriously, I do regret that this interesting day, so fit and proper in itself, and which is a relief of our venerable forefathers, should have grown so much into an antiquated formality. It certainly does not tell well of the growing morals of a community, when its members refuse to lay aside all labor and recreation, which are incompatible with the services of such a day as Thanksgiving.

FLORIO.

FISH STORY.

We find the following two stories in the Augusta (Geo.) Courier. The highly respectable editor of that paper doubtless saw the transaction to which he refers, and on that supposition we are bound to believe every item—so much for having a good character. There is scarcely an editor, present company excepted, who could claim as much of his readers.—[U. S. Gaz.]

'One day a trout fisher fastened his hand line, (a large strong line, whose hook is thrown off 30 or 40 yards in the river) to his leg, finding the multiplicity of his tackle inconvenient to manage. A large cat-fish, weighing 48 pounds, seized the bait, and before our fisherman was well aware of the fact, he was posting down the river faster than a tow boat a stern of a steamer. Luckily the cat-fish, as much alarmed as its follower, did not keep the deep channel, but attempted to pass a sand bar, which nearly crossed the stream. Here our almost breathless acquaintance caught hold of something which brought the fish to a sudden halt, and the fisherman was enabled to avenge himself for his temporary discomfiture. The other case occurred only a few miles above the city. The sturgeon in the heat of summer is very sluggish, and will lie panting like a hog in the coolest parts of the stream, regardless almost of the approach of danger. Our friend found one of these animals seven and a half feet long in a shallow part of the river, and being much of a man, 'thought he could master him by jumping astride of him, at the same instant clapping his hands into his gills. He jumped, and was successful in placing the fingers of both hands in the fish's gills. Instantly the animal darted down the river like a race horse, sometimes under the water and sometimes out. The rider could neither stop him, nor get his hands out of his gills, which clasped them like a vice. Fortunately the frightened animal, after a race of upwards of a quarter of a mile, bolted into one of our friend's own fish traps, and there the spectators who had pursued on the bank, finally found him swearing, in the most positive manner, it was the last sturgeon he would ever ride.

PRINTER'S ODE.

Written for the Celebration of the French Revolution, in the City of Washington, Oct. 28, 1830.

I.
When time was young,
And, idle and unstrung
Its stirring chords, the harp of history stood—
Or to some pale Ascetic's high disdain
Of Truth's and Nature's Melodies, subdued
To murmur forth a brief and broken strain
In fretted cloister and the vaulted cell,
Whence not a breeze might waft its stifled swell—

II.
Mildew'd, as into life they burst,
The blossoms of the mind
Fell from their stems, like things accurst—
The abortions of their kind;
As dense and sunless atmospheres
On Nature's opening fruits and flowers,
So fell on mind's unripen'd powers
The blight of those long perish'd years,
Of those gone glories scarce a glimmering ray
Broke through the midnight mists, and struggled into day.

In vain, along that Gothic night
Tradition flashed his lonely light;
The dim and shadowy forms that came
Careering up the path of fame,
Flitted, like phantom shapes, away,
And scarce, of all the vast array
One bold creation left his track behind,
'To guide the coming footsteps of mankind.

III.
But, through the gloom of thrice a thousand years,
What dazzling light appears!
Through the dense clouds what sudden day-dawn breaks!

What magic spell athwart the darkness cast
Opens the glorious Treasury of the past,
And the long tyranny of ignorance shakes!
Thrown on the Lethæan wave,
Under whose surge lost generations lay,
What charm disturbs the unfathomable grave,
And wins the unknown ages back to day!

IV.
Thine—first of arts—'t is thine!
That power from Heaven's own inspiration caught,
The spell divine,
That gave omnipotence to thought
The ponderous book of Time unclasped; and thence
Of many an age the radiant history
Disclosed in all its long magnificence—

A fable's charm, without its sophistry!
That bridg'd the gloomy gulph that lies between What is, and is to be—and what has been.

V.
Forth went the spirit of the press—emblazed
Amid the broad and banner'd folds it rais'd—
'Knowledge is power!'—
Swift, at the glorious signal, rush'd along,
From every wind, a bright and buoyant throng:—

Science, with his flashing eye:—
Music, with her minstrelsy:
Poetry, with tuneful lay:—
And Painting, loitered on the way,
To extract the sun-tint from the flower:—
And Freedom with the broken chain,
Never to be link'd again!

VI.

At once—away
The harpy brood of gothic demons sped
As from the morning ray,
Creatures obscene—the progeny of night—
Retreat in wild affright,
So, from the press, as broke the day
Of knowledge o'er the night of mind,
Rolling her vapours from mankind,
Ignorance, with all her blasted offspring, fled.

VII.

Far as the forest leaf was stirr'd
By the free winds of Heaven,
The feudal requiem was heard:—
Forth from his stearn grasp riven,
The despot dropp'd his iron mace,
And where the desolating trace
Of tyrant steps had left its sear,
Flowers amid the desert sprang,
And woodland, field, and mountain rang
To Liberty's inspiring cheer.

VIII.

Centuries cours'd onward—while the tracks of mind
Shone in the countless pathways of mankind.
As deeds that long had smoulder'd, hid in night,
At History's touch, came kindling into light,
Genius and worth, in bright examples shown,
Obtain'd our homage, and became our own.
The hero's valor fir'd:—
The bard inspir'd:—
His moral maxims taught the sage:
And from a thousand founts supplied,
Of valor, wisdom, truth, the tide
Sweeps through each coming age.

IX.

Still as it first began,
Guardian of Science, and the friend of Man,
In all its matchlessness of might,
On moves the spirit of the Press.
At every step, expanding light,
To every point diffus'd—from pole to pole—
Pours the full blood of knowledge o'er the soul.

X.

On, glorious Art!—To latest ages cast
The bright monitions of the lengthening past!
Wider the gates of truth extend!
And to the temple where she sits enshrined
Conduct the endless progeny of the mind,
Before her thrown to bend!
Let Freedom breathe her fervent prayer,
And seek her sure protector there!
And Piety, where the world's patriarchs trod,
Repair, and as her vows she pays,
Hail Thee—by whom, to every age and clime,
Is spread the Gospel page sublime,
That gives the promise of eternal days,
And lifts the mortal nearer to the God!

NOVEMBER.

It has been fashionable to stigmatize this month as 'the saddest of the year,' a season of gloom and frost—a time for suicide and blue devils. 'Tis a villanous abuse to the cleverest nymphs among the twelve sisters. True November has not the light, airy beauty of May, nor the softness and voluptuous charm of June—but there is an honest and familiar frankness in her coming, which renders her, uncouth and rude as she may be—an agreeable visitant. She is like the buxom fair one of the bygone times of our grandmother—with her tresses unadorned and with a homely garb, but with a kindly spirit and a warm heart.

November is after all a pleasant season. If the flowers are dying, one after another, as the frost, like a vegetable pestilence, passes over them. What if the leaves do wither, and wear for a time the yellow and sickly hue of decay, and then, fall, with every breathing of the wind, like wearied birds stricken down from their resting place?—What if a change does come over the things which we have loved, when we know that in this change—this shifting aspect of seasons—this variety of Nature, which makes the world so beautiful and beloved? If flower and leaf and herbage, and all the glorious things of Summer are departing—there are other joys and other scenes in perspective.—There are the gathering around the household fire; the long and pleasant evenings—the song—the merriment—the glad thanksgiving—the Christmas Ball!—Then to the long bright evenings of approaching Winter—when the earth is white with the beautiful vestment of snow—when the whole Heaven is brilliant with stars—and the clear moonlight casts the still shadows of the skeleton trees upon the white lustre that surrounds them.

Who, at such a time, does not love the sleigh ride—the merry joyous sleigh ride? Who has not gazed until his eyes ached with the magnificence of the scene, upon the frost works of Winter—when the fine, misty rain has become frozen upon every visible object?—Summer has nothing to compare with the simple scenery of winter when

'The frost perform its silent ministry,
Unhelped by any wind,'—

when every blade of grass and every twig flashes like a living diamond—when every tree rises like a tall column of silver, and the branches, long, tapering and leafless, glow like the jewelry which lightened on the eye of Aladdin in the cave of the Enchanter.

The glory of the summer has gone by—the beautiful greenness has become withered and dead.—Were this all—were there no associations of moral desolation—of faded hopes—of hearts withering in the bosom of the living—connected with the decaying scenery around us, we could not indulge in a moment's melancholy. The season of flowers will come again—the streams will flow gracefully and lightly as before—the streams will again toss their cumbrous load of greenness to the sun light—and by mossy stone and winding rivulet, the young blossoms will start up, as at the bidding of their fairy guardians. But the human heart has no change like that of Nature. It has no second spring time. Once blighted in its hour of freshness, it wears forever after the mark of the spoiler. The dew of affection may fall, and the gentle rain of sympathy be lavished upon it—but the sure root of blighted feeling will never again waken into life, nor the crushed flowers of hope blossom with their wonted beauty.

There are many persons, who, both in conversation and writing, are in the practice of using very large words to convey very small ideas.—Such persons are like a man who seizes upon a sledge hammer to kill a fly.

'Here lies my wife poor Molly; let her lie—
She finds repose at last;—and so do I.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 27, 1880.

THE WITHERELL HUMBUG.

The detection and exposure of this infamous transaction, have thrown the whole antimasonic faction into consternation and disorder. They are publishing, in a spirit of triumph, the certificate of Amos T. Bush, Esq. of Fort Ann, in which the cross-examination of Witherell is pronounced a forgery. Admit that this certificate is genuine, and that the alleged examination of Witherell before Bush never took place, the case is not altered in any material point. Nor do we perceive what advantage the antimasonic party expect to reap, by pronouncing merely the cross-examination a forgery. On the contrary, it is to their interest and credit that it be proved to be true; for, if it be correct, the weight of the iniquity rests on Witherell; when, if it be a forgery, as they are desirous to prove, it is shewn by the evidence elicited on the examination of Hyde, before S. D. Brown, (the correctness of which they admit,) that the affair is the result of preconcerted measures, between the Witherell family and the antimasonic party. In the one case, Witherell is charged as the principal, and the party is not directly implicated. In the other, the party is charged as principal, and the Witherell family as accessories only. If the examination before Bush be a forgery, the most that can be said of it is that, it removes a portion of the disgrace from the shoulders of Witherell and casts it upon the whole party. We care not who bears the load. 'Quite enough appears,' says the editor of the Buffalo Journal, in speaking of the examination of Hyde, 'to warrant the sweeping denunciation of the WHOLE AFFAIR, AS AN ANTIMASONIC TRICK TO OBTAIN VOTES.' He further says that the evidence elicited at this examination 'PROVES, most pointedly, A MORE WIDE SPREAD KNOWLEDGE of the trick, among the antimasonic party, THAN EVEN THE FORGERY CLAIMED IT TO HAVE HAD.' This is the language of a paper now, or formerly, in the interest of antimasonry, and which was the first to pronounce the examination before Bush, a forgery! Perhaps we ought not therefore, to object to any measures that they may take to prove the alleged fabrication, since they themselves are much more deeply implicated by so doing.

There is however something so mysterious and inexplicable, in the affair, that we are unwilling to permit it to pass with this short exposition. On the examination of Hyde, it appeared in evidence that there was a magistrate within 80 or 90 rods of Witherell's house. He was not called on, say the antimasonic papers, to take the affidavits of Mrs. Witherell and others, because he was a Mason. It was alleged also, as a reason for going to Fort Ann, ten miles distant, that none but an antimasonic magistrate could be trusted, or that none other was willing to take the affidavits. They now tell us that Bush, by whom the affidavits were taken, is a 'worthy Mason and respectable magistrate!' Is this said now with a view to satisfy Masons and the public that there were no improper measures resorted to in the examination of the deponents? They have not yet been charged with this offence, though we doubt whether the matter would bear investigation. And since their first reason is no longer valid, we should like to hear what they have next to offer why they went ten miles to procure the assistance of a Masonic magistrate, when there was one within 90 rods! Further, the first indication that the certificate was a forgery, came from an antimasonic paper published in Buffalo, more than three hundred miles from Hartford, when the leading antimasonic paper in the State, is published at Albany, not forty miles from the scene of action! The question naturally arises how came the Buffalo editor in possession of the alleged fact that it is a forgery, before the Albany editor, and some days before Bush had disavowed the truth of the statement? We can answer this question only by the natural and rational supposition that, the leaders in the affair perceiving, from the testimony adduced on the examination of Hyde, that their villany must be exposed, THEY THEMSELVES FORGED THE CERTIFICATE, in the hope that by being able first to expose and declare the forgery, they might, by a concealment of the facts, make it appear that the whole exposition was equally fabulous. Their whole aim now is to divert the minds of the people from the examination of Hyde, which they admit to be correctly reported, and which corroborates every essential fact stated in the alleged cross-examination of Witherell, and to fasten the public attention on the forgery. But this they will not be able to do. The people in this section of the country, are too intelligent to be duped by any such shallow artifice.

Witherell swears that the man who held the lantern at the door was about the size of Elder Witherell; and her son George R., hearing the voice of the man, twice exclaimed 'FATHER have you come home?' Is it reasonable to suppose that the wife and the son could both be deceived, in the identity of Witherell?—the wife in the appearance and the son in the voice! We do not believe any such thing. If Witherell and his wife were not guilty, whence the desire to keep George out of the way, that he should not be examined in Court? Is it nothing that the Elder thought and declared that, as affidavits of the transaction had been made, it was not necessary that anything more should be done? If he himself had not been instrumental, or a participant in the outrage, would he have been satisfied with a mere exposition of the facts? It were folly to believe any such thing. Witherell says, under oath, that he learned, while at Fort Ann, on Wednesday 4th Oct. that the committee appointed on that day and at that place, were to proceed to Hartford on the Wednesday following, to investigate the matter; and on the Tuesday evening preceding, between 7 and 8 o'clock, he sent for his son George, under false pretext, and on his arrival he 'directed him to go to Welles, early next morning—13 miles distant!' Were Witherell innocent, would he have taken this measure to keep his son out of the way? Warren Hubbard thought that Mrs. W. was not in a right state of mind at the time of the affair; and from the testimony of several of the witnesses, it appears that George's evidence is not to be credited, even though it be given under oath! Mrs. Witherell requested Hubbard not to tell of the affray, alleging as a reason that no one would believe it if he did! and H. swears that if he had really thought there had been an attempt at murder, he would have alarmed the neighbors.

With these hasty remarks we take leave of the subject, for the present, requesting the reader to bear in mind that the alleged forgery is confined to the Cross Examination of Witherell, before A. T. Bush. The testimony given before S. D. Brown, on the examination of Hyde is admitted by all, to be correct. NO MATERIAL CIRCUMSTANCE IS AFFECTED BY THE ALLEGED FORGERY—other than that it proves the party to be more deeply concerned in the villanous transaction, than was at first alleged.

Since writing the above, we have received the Batavia Times and Press, from which we extract the following remarks. It will be seen that the editor agrees with us in the belief that the Certificate of Witherell's examination, is an antimasonic forgery. He promises to follow it up until he ascertains the truth. We wish him God speed.

The Elder Witherell Affair.

During the Election, we received two handbills, by the Telegraph mail, containing a pretended examination of one David Brown, for an alleged attempt to assassinate Elder Witherell, had before A. T. Bush, Esq.

In these handbills there was set forth a cross examination of the Elder, in which it plainly appeared that he must have been concerned in the pretended attempt at assassination. We immediately issued a handbill, containing all the essential parts of that examination; and made some pointed comments upon it, in our paper.

Being met by leading antimasons, with confident contradictions, and seeing a statement signed by E. C. Dibble, declaring it to be a forgery, our friends wrote to Mr. Bush, to know the truth of the matter. His answer has been received; by which it appears that it is a gross imposition.

There was indeed, an examination before S. D. Brown, Esq. by which it fully appears, to all impartial observers; that the pretended attempt to assassinate Elder Witherell, was a villanous contrivance of the antimasons, to effect the election, or at least a roguish trick of his son, and some other mischievous boys.

But all this does not excuse the knavery of tramping up a false account of an official, judicial examination, and palming it upon the unsuspecting friends of order and truth, who were prepared, from the extravagant and unreasonable account of the pretended attack on the Witherell family, to see, and believe, any plausible exposition of the foul story.

If it came from our political friends, we hope the author or authors may be exposed and punished, to the utmost rigour of the law, and of public contempt and execration. If from our opponents, as we have strong reason to believe, we have only to say, that it shall be garnered up, with the body of Monroe—his whiskers—the Anderton story—the Vermont stories—the original Witherell story, and all the rest of the villanies practised by the vilest of knaves, in the vilest of causes, to deceive an honest people. And in the general retribution before public opinion, for this multitude of sins, we trust that this trick will be both exposed and punished.

There are many circumstances to induce the belief, that those handbills were fabricated by antimasons, and sent to us, and others of our friends, on purpose to deceive us. For, at every point where they appeared, antimasons were found ready to bet that it was a forgery. At Palmyra, at Rochester, at Buffalo, here, and several other places, it seemed to be perfectly understood. In order that it might not injure their cause, they were prepared to contradict it; and in order to speculate on it, they were prepared to bet, that it was spurious.

We believe they must have known the game; and when we reflect that no man of common sense, can possibly imagine any reason why one of our political friends should start and publish so vile an imposition on their own party, which must inevitably be detected within a few days, and recoil with fifty fold mischief, upon the heads of those it seemed designed to assist, we cannot but believe it originated with our enemies. We shall not suffer this matter to rest, until we ascertain the truth concerning it, if it be possible.

The Albany Record of the 20th, has the following paragraph on this subject.

On the 30th ultimo, we published a full and impartial account of a judicial investigation had in relation to Elder Witherell's 'Humbug,' termed by the Antimasons the 'Hartford Outrage.' Another account purporting to have come from A. T. Bush, and signed by him, has been published at the west, which we have no hesitation in pronouncing a base fabrication. The only paper in this city that has given currency to the forged account, is Weed's antimasonic Evening Journal. The fabrication was probably prepared and given to the public by the antimasonic party, in order, if possible, to weaken and do away the effect of the genuine account of the investigation. The account of the trial, as published in the Record, we received direct from Washington county, and was reported by an eye-witness. Whatever consolation the followers of Antimasonry can derive from that, they are welcome to; we defy them justly to cast the least colouring of falsehood or misrepresentation upon it. In that report (the People vs. Alonzo Hyde,) the whole of the antimasonic story—affidavits and all,—comes from the judicial tribunal with the indelible mark of infamy attached to it.

The Vermont Legislature, have passed a law abolishing imprisonment for debt.

THEATRE.—Young Kean made his first appearance before a Boston audience on Monday evening, in the character of Richard Duke of Glo'ster. He was received with great applause, and shewn much kindness throughout the part. His conception of the character, so far as we are capable of judging, was generally very correct—we think he has not been surpassed by any representative of the crooked-back'd tyrant who has appeared on our boards since the time his father was here. Richard was a head-strong violent villain; but even he did not run when devising means of villany. K. might profit by the example of his father, or Booth or Cooper in this particular. His voice is very bad—his figure passable. He has many of the peculiar and striking characteristics of his father, by which he is enabled to redeem his bad points. We have heard it said that he strives to imitate his father. This is not strictly true; or, if it be, he totally fails at what he aims. Yet there is not half the originality about him that there is about Pearson. His reading is after the style of Cooper; though his utterance is too rapid, and his enunciation anything but clear and distinct. Faults alike unpardonable in the orator and in the actor; because they can be remedied. His soliloquies are delivered with some effect; and he treads the stage like one raised to the business. The fencing scene (with Pearson for an antagonist, and a better one he could not have,) was excellent—his father could not have done better, in his best days. As a whole, he sustained the difficult and arduous character of Richard, in a manner creditable to him as a young man for whom there is much room for improvement.

We saw him on Wednesday evening, in the character of Sir Giles Overreach. We have seen it played better. As a whole, and in the whole, Scott is not a whit his inferior. We should like much to see Scott in both these parts. He would acquit himself creditably, and we doubt not draw good houses. Kean has an admirable method of bringing up at the last end. It covers a multitude of faults.

[We know nothing of the merits of the case noticed in the following communication. But as we are pleased with the view the writer has taken, of the cause of the evil which led to the trial, we publish it. As the defendant was proved to be guilty of the offence alleged, none will deny the righteousness of the judgment rendered. Yet, if any measures can be taken as the writer suggests, to prevent the too frequent occurrence of like cases, by the enactment of severer laws, or the more rigid enforcement of those already existing, it is desirable that it should be done.—Ed. Mirror.]

COMMUNICATION.

Commonwealth vs. Harriet Russell. S. J. Court, Nov. Term, 1880.

This was an appealed case from the Municipal Court for keeping a disorderly house; the sentence in the Court below, six months imprisonment in the House of Correction and ten days solitary confinement. The case came on before Justice Wild, and after trial the Jury brought in 'Guilty.' S. D. Parker for Defendant, and J. T. Austin (Sol. Gen. and Atty. Gen. being absent,) for the Commonwealth. After trial, it was urged in mitigation of punishment that the Defendant was young, and that this was the first offence of any kind of which the Defendant had been accused, and it should operate favorably with the Defendant. The Judge confirmed the sentence originally given.

It is not for the purpose of shielding crime from punishment that we give the result of this trial; but to speak a feeble sense of guilt which we believe attaches to many that belong to what is called 'Good Society' in our community, and to denounce the authors as well as the sufferers of guilt. Here is a beautiful girl, young, engaging, but depraved, whose home is now the cell and prison—whose vivacity and hopes are mildewed, and whose reputation is blighted forever;—but who is the cause? The effect of a cause endures that punishment due to the cause itself. If punishment is due to womanly weakness, (and we admit that it is,) what punishment is due to its manly cause? But one goes 'unwhipped of justice,' and the other goes away to death, without a single tear shed upon her grave!

We undertake to say that the promoter, the visiter, the tempter and encourager of vice, merits the rack far more than the frail being who is his victim. The heart should bleed for the one irretrievably lost; but it should burn with indignation against the author of early ruin. Let our peace officers gather into our courts of justice the rakes, black-legs and gamblers of our city, and cases of like character with this, will become less frequent. But the unprotected suffer, for the wrongs done by an unnoticed few, and the rascal who created the evil, rides in his carriage, while his victim lingers out a wretched existence, in the damps of a cell, or in the abode of crime. These things should not be so. Strangle the cause, and the effect will not ensue; punish the author and the consequences will not exist. We take this case as a sample and call loudly upon the laws of our land for redress, as one of crying evil.

OUTRAGE.

'There is no doubt but the Grand Chapter of this state issued orders to all subordinate Lodges, directing the brethren throughout the state to vote for Throop.'

The above precious morsel is from the Rochester Enquirer, an antimasonic paper, under the editorial charge of Whittlesey, of pugilistic memory. Are the people prepared to swallow such stuff? Did not the veracious writer of the above know, that the Grand Chapter of this state meets only once a year, and that meeting we believe is in February, at least 6 months before any nomination for Governor was made? Whittlesey knew when he was penning that article, that he was uttering a downright falsehood. And why the necessity of all this? Answer—it is by such base and unprincipled means that he has thus far supported himself and his equally abandoned coadjutors in office in this part of the State—and it is by such means that he endeavors to mislead the unsuspecting yeomanry of the west. The people should mark such political dishonesty with their disapprobation and censure.

[Batavia Times.]

GROSS IMPIETY AND PROFANATION OF ANTI-MASONRY.—Thurlow Weed, publishes in his last paper a report made by Mr. Maynard of this state at the recent Philadelphia antimasonic Convention, on the 'inquiry into the effect of Freemasonry on the Christian religion.' We have read it with utter astonishment. It is without exception or equivocation, one of the most disgusting, impious, impudent, profane and atrocious documents that ever was presented by a sane man to any body in a civilized age. The impieties, the atrocities of Joanna Southcoate, of all the mad and blood-thirsty factions that ever appeared do not exceed it. If it had been brought to light before the recent election antimasonry would not have got half the support it did in New-York.—[N. Y. Courier.]

The Ontario, N. Y. Messenger contains an article in which it is stated that, in preparing the list of grand jurors for the town of Richmond in that county, every person selected was a political antimason; and every Mason was excluded! At least thirteen of the grand jury now hold, or have recently held, offices conferred upon them by antimasonic votes. The writer in the Messenger says: 'We used to think our grand juries should be composed of the honest, well informed yeomanry, without distinction of sect or party, impartial and independent. But we have indeed fallen upon evil times, if the temples of justice may be thus packed with sets of office-holding jurors, selected under the influence of this rank and particular prejudice of political antimasonry.'

The anties may cast their skin—may change their name, when they find, as they will find, that it is odious to the people, but unless they change their principles and their practices, they will still be held in contempt and abhorrence. A change of their names will not do. The reformation must go further.

GOLD.—During the year 1829, the gold of the United States received at the Mint, amounted to about $134,000, being very nearly equal to the foreign supply for the same period; the amount received from the Southern States within the first three quarters of the present year, has been nearly 320,000, while that received from foreign sources, within the same period, amounts to little more than half the sum. Previous to 1814, the supply from domestic sources did not exceed 3000 per annum.

ANOTHER MURDER.—A man by the name of Thos. L. Boynton was brought before justice Savage, at Salem, on Tuesday last, charged with an assault upon his wife, with intent to murder. He was ordered to recognise in the sum of 750 dollars, with surety in an equal sum, for his appearance at the Supreme Court in April. He was committed. Mrs. Boynton died on Thursday.

The Paris Journal des Debats of the 19th Oct. contains an editorial article respecting the deplorable condition of the bookselling trade, la librairie, the heads of which had petitioned the government for three of the thirty millions to be lent to the several branches of industry. The number of persons in Paris who depend on the trade for subsistence, is more than thirty five thousand, most of whom are reduced to extreme distress for want of employment.—In consequence of the general stagnation of business in Paris, the approach of winter was particularly dreaded, as the working classes must then suffer in a particular degree, and of course be more excitable.

IRELAND.—The papers brought by the last arrival from England, furnish the proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, forbidding the meeting of the Anti-Union Association, and Mr. O'Connell's letter to the people of Ireland on that subject. The excitement among the people of that island respecting the project of a separation from Britain appears to be extreme, and it is no wonder that it should be regarded by the government with some alarm.

Evening Post.

REMARKABLE DROUGHT.—According to a letter quoted in the Mobile Register, from Clark county, there had been no rain there since the 14th June. The Alabama river is something like three or four feet lower than it has ever been known before. The drought through several of the counties, south of the mountains, is unparalleled and very distressing to the inhabitants. Many of the planters have to haul water five or six miles.

The Charleston City Gazette gives a favorable account of the success of the new Locomotive Engine on the Charleston Rail Road. It is computed that the engine will carry four times its own weight, 4 tons with a moderate pressure of steam, at a speed averaging from 25 to 30 miles an hour. 'Such at least,' the Gazette remarks, 'has been the amount of its speed, during the course of the experiments already made.'

GEORGIA.—A bill has been reported in the Georgia House of Representatives, appropriating $30,000 for the erection of a college edifice at Athens, in the place of that recently burnt, and for the purchase of astronomical apparatus, books, &c.

The Gazette de France observes—France within the last forty years, has tried every kind of government, except the Federal Republic, to which the current is now setting with almost irresistible force.

Blackwood's Magazine represents the internal peace and the monarchy of Great Britain as in extreme danger from the excitement of the times.

NAPOLEON has been made the subject of several melodramatic pieces, in several of the theatres of Paris.

THE WREATH.

THE SICILIAN KNIGHT.

Gentle zephyrs of morning were stealing
Mid the dew spangled leaves of the grove,
Where a knight, to his lady-love kneeling,
Breathed anew his professions of love.
While his war-steed, impatiently neighing,
Chid the gallant young hero's delay,
And the loud bugle's clamorous braying
Called the soldier to battle away.

Though she listens in silence, her blushes
Are confessing an answering flame,
And the sparkling tear tenderly gushes,
As he whispers of danger and fame,
One embrace—a farewell—and 't is over,
For his gallant steed bears him afar,
And she prays to the saints for her lover,
As he hies to the Palestine war.

Many months sighed the maid in seclusion,
And in dreams saw the chivalrous youth
Plunge the Saracen host in confusion,
In supporting the banner of truth.
And that banner was gilded with glory,
As it gleamed like a comet afar,
And the deeds are recorded in story,
He achieved at the Palestine war.

Yet, amid the rough battle's commotion,
Would his fancy retreat to the grove,
Where he last breathed the vows of devotion
To the fair one who sanctioned his love.
But the rude din of war is now over,
And her champion returns from afar,
While she blesses the day that her lover
Boldly hied to the Palestine war.

From the Token, for 1831.

THE LAST REQUEST.

By B. B. THACHER.

Bury me by the Ocean's side—
O give me a grave on the verge of the deep,
Where the noble tide,
When the sea-gales blow, my marble may sweep,
And the glistening surf
Shall burst on my turf,
And bathe my cold bosom in death as I sleep!

Bury me by the sea—
That the vesper at eve-fall may o'er my grave,
Like the hymn of the bee,
Or the hum of the shell in the silent wave!
Or an anthem roar
Shall beat on the shore
By the storm and the surge, like a march of the brave.

Bury me by the deep,
Where a living footstep never may tread—
And come not to weep—
O wake not with sorrow the dream of the dead!
But leave me the dirge
Of the breaking surge,
And the silent tears of the sea on my head!

And grave no Parian praise—
Purple no turf for the heartless tomb—
And burn no holy blaze,
To flatter the awe of the solemn gloom!
For the holier light
Of the star-eyed night,
And the violet morning my rest will illumine:
And honors, more, dear
Than of sorrow and love, shall be strewn on my clay
By the young green year,
With its fragrant dews and its crimson array—
O leave me to sleep,
On the verge of the deep,
Till the sky and the seas shall have passed away!

ILLUSTRATIONS OF MASONIC EMBLEMS.

In a former communication demonstrating the Antiquity of Masonic Institutions, reasons were adduced that the fraternity had strong evidence of their antiquity as far back as the ages of symbolic language; and that the emblems retained by them from time immemorial, illustrate the truth of the position. We now proceed to explain some of the emblems alluded to, shewing they are not the result of unmeaning fancy the decoration of folly, but that they naturally involve moral truths of the highest order. Their significations illustrate how spiritual and moral perceptions and affections are represented by natural images, or in what manner the world of mind from the throne of heaven down in all its gradations is represented by correspondences in the world of nature. The doctrine of correspondence understood in its true light demonstrates the plenary inspiration of the scriptures, and restores the mind from infidelity to the belief, they are the essential Word of God, by shewing that the Word in the literal sense involves correspondent celestial and spiritual things. From scripture language we will illustrate that the explanations of Masonic emblems are governed by the same principles of exposition, by which the Word should be explained to render it, in all its parts, consistent with itself to the understanding. Our intention is not to pursue the illustration further than of a few of the Masonic emblems, but to leave the subject with the inquisitive in search of truth to contemplate its use and investigate its importance for their improvement and edification.

As the scriptures are expressly denominated the Word of God, is it not rational to suppose they have reference, in all their parts, to things above nature, and that the literal representations, therein expressed, are significative of spiritual things and of the attributes of God? A volume of writings relative to things of the natural world, the civil transactions of men, of nations and of kingdoms can have no claims to be called divine, unless in their analogical style they signify divine things, as does the Word of God. Masonic emblems it is said are of the scriptures, because they are representatives therein found and from thence taken.

1st. In our illustrations we commence with the emblem light. More fully to explain its meaning a text is selected, in which that literal word first occurs in the scriptures; 'And God said let there be light and there was light.'—This was said on the first day of creation. In as much as the natural luminaries of the earth, sun and moon, were not formed according to the letter until the fourth day, commentators with all their science and explanations, have not satisfied men of reflection and consideration, what is to be understood by this passage of the scriptures, that is, what is meant by the light brought into existence three days before the sun and moon were created. As the selected text is of the Word of God, it would appear to savor of infidelity to suggest that it cannot be literally understood; but when it is known that the language of the scriptures to be fully comprehended requires a mode of explanation different from all human compositions; and that while the writings of man express ideas by natural language, the Word of God exhibits spiritual things by natural images correspondent thereto: wonder ceases that expositors of the scriptures having no rule to govern, nor key to unlock their treasures, should differ in their explanations. When a signification of a word, or literal expression in the scriptures is given, and the same signification is found, in all cases, to apply in the connected sense, the mind is convinced that the explication is correct. For example, the Lord Jesus Christ says of himself, 'I am the light and life of the world.' No person bearing the text receives the idea that natural light proceeding from the sun is to be understood, but naturally referring the expression to mental perception, perceives the idea of truth. The Lord, in another place, so expresses Himself, 'I am the way the truth and the life. Light then is the literal or natural image of truth.'

Let us apply this mode of interpretation to the text adduced, and we may learn what is to be understood by 'And God said let there be light and there was light.' Light signifies truth; when predicated of God, light signifies Divine truth, as in the above text. For what God says shall be done, is brought forth of Him. The text represents His proceeding influences into the human mind; for man is the subject of whom creation is predicated. The text, therefore, signifies the incipient influences of Divine truth into the mind of man. We may now see the correspondence. As light gives the first material impressions on the infant eye; so Divine truth is the first operative principle received in the mind of man, when from the natural he progresses to the spiritual, in moral improvement and regeneration. By this mode of interpretation it may be perceived, the first chapter of Genesis relates to the commencement and progress of man's regeneration, or his growth and increase of moral and spiritual things, represented by the images of the natural creation and productions of the natural world.

2d. Sun and Moon. 'And God made two great lights, the greater to rule the day, the lesser to rule the night.'—The sun is the greater light.

The states of the human mind in its spiritual and moral improvement are continually changing, the prior state compared with the latter in its advancement from good to better is relatively as evening and morning, night and day.—These states are regulated by the two principles of goodness and truth, which operate upon the mind agreeably to its receptive state or capacity of reception. Goodness is of love, truth is of wisdom. Love is represented by the sun, truth or wisdom by the moon. Let us attend to the illustration. As the sun of the natural world by its light and heat is the instrumental cause of the life and vigor of the natural productions of the earth, so it signifies love, the influencing principle of all good affections, the life and support of the moral world, the human mind. The sun in its supreme sense predicated of the Lord, signifies Divine love, the essential source of created existences, celestial, spiritual and natural. 'God is love.'

3d. Moon. This luminary shines by reflected light of the sun without its heat, and represents truth. In as much as it gives during the absence of the sun a dim light to direct man in his way through the shades of night, so it represents truth, the source of true faith—the anchor of hope while the mental perceptions are clouded in darkness of error and ignorance respecting our highest moral and spiritual concerns. 'Faith is the substance of things hoped for and the evidence of things not seen.' The Moon in the spiritual sense signifies truth or wisdom, in the supreme sense Divine wisdom. Sun and Moon in the supreme sense represent DIVINE LOVE and DIVINE WISDOM, the co-operating essential cause of all creation. The universal world is created of DIVINE LOVE by DIVINE WISDOM.

4th. Stars, signify knowledge of goodness and truth.—The knowledge of a thing which comes by the ear is feeble and imperfect compared with that which is presented to the eye. Stars being remote shining lights make weak impressions compared with those of the sun. Historic facts of the dark ages are less vivid than those of the present, much of which we are or have been spectators.—The signification of this emblem is not so obvious as that of light and of the sun, because the two last are more familiar to us in common language. We sometimes hear of eminent divines, philosophers and orators being called stars,—and of vicious eccentric characters 'wandering stars.' In states of error and ignorance the knowledge of goodness and truth represented by stars are feeble aids compared with operating influences of truth; a man may know a truth without having the affection of it; but feeble as the knowledge of goodness and truth is, it may lead the mind step by step from weak perceptions of truth to stronger, from one good affection to better states in its journey through this life preparatory to spiritual.

To give a further illustration of the doctrine of correspondence, or the analogical language of the scriptures, a text is selected in which the sun, moon and stars are connectedly the subject treated of. Previous to His crucifixion, our Lord related to His disciples the consummation of the age and the signs of his second advent in the following prophetic language;—

'The sun shall be darkened, the moon shall refuse to give her light, the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken.'—'Then they shall see the SON of MAN coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory.' The preceding representations in the text have been and continue to be understood as literal truths, it is believed the second advent of the LORD JESUS CHRIST will be announced by destruction of the visible heavens and the earth, when HE will be seen in his own person, by the natural eye riding on clouds floating in the atmosphere. However satisfactory, the implications of expositors upon the text have been to themselves, or their readers, yet as philosophers they will be exceedingly puzzled to explain whereto the stars of heaven will fall, when a single star in magnitude is much larger than the earth. Supposing they may be thrown out of their orbits to wander in chaotic disorder, they cannot be said to fall, as they respect the earth and our natural ideas of falling; every object revolving exterior to the circumference of the earth must be said to be above, not in a precipitating state. The text in its connections with what proceeds and follows cannot therefore be satisfactorily understood in its literal sense. Respecting the last portion of the text, 'mankind from age to age have lived in the expectation of beholding the LORD appear in the clouds of the firmament, and of being themselves caught up to meet HIM at his coming in the air.' A little reflection will convince any one that the literal representation of the second coming of the LORD is purely figurative and symbolic; 'a distinct prophetic style used in the scriptures, in which the ideas intended are representatively shadowed out by the images used for expressing them; that the Lord Jesus Christ who is in a glorified body should be seen by the natural eye in the clouds floating a few miles above the earth is really an absolute impossibility.

The spiritual sense of the text is its true explication;—natural things or images representing spiritual truths as follows; 'The sun shall be darkened,' signifies that divine love including love to the Lord and charity to our neighbors will in the church become extinct. 'The moon shall cease to give her light,' signifies that divine truth will be obliterated in the human understanding by falsifications. 'The stars of heaven shall fall,'—that the knowledge of goodness and truth will be lost.—'The powers that are in the heavens shall be shaken,'—that the good affections will be perverted by evil. The succeeding clause of the text having no immediate connexion with Masonic emblems might have been omitted, but it seems necessary to exhibit in connexion the spiritual meaning of the whole text. 'And then they shall see the SON of MAN coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory.' 'Clouds of heaven' signify the literal sense of the Word concealing interior goods and truths, as natural clouds exclude the light and heat of the sun. 'SON of MAN,' [who is Himself the Word] signifies Divine Truth Himself in His glorified humanity, who will be perceived and plainly revealed when the spiritual sense which the letter of the Word involves is understood, acknowledged and received in our lives. 'With power and great glory,' expresses the superior influences, which the spiritual sense of the Word communicating goodness and truth to the mind compared with the literal sense, has on the life of man.

5th Emblem—The Eye. 'The light of the body is the eye;—'If thine eye be evil thy whole body will be full of darkness.' No person reading these texts from the scriptures, although literal truths, supposes that natural light and the eye of the body are meant; nor when reading, 'If thine eye offend thee pluck it out,'—the literal sense is to be observed and practised. As the eye is the organ of natural vision, so it signifies the understanding—the mental perception,—a power of perceiving the moral truth of things,—motives of action, and discriminating between good and evil, truth and error. 'If thine eye be single thy whole body will be full of light.' Here again one would naturally suppose that two would admit more light than one eye. The mind when arranged in conformity to divine order, (which can only be regulated by the word of divine truth) will not be influenced by principles opposed to truth, nor will its indwelling good affections be perverted by evil. 'No man can serve two masters'—he 'cannot serve God and mammon.' The eye, in the supreme sense signifies Divine perception and represents Omnipresence an attribute of the Lord. To realize this sublime truth, our thoughts, words and deeds must conform to his divine precepts.

6th Emblem—The Ladder represents by its steps the three spheres of the universe, celestial, spiritual and natural, and the three degrees of the human mind, inmost, interior and exterior. This emblem, which Jacob saw in vision, one foot resting on the earth and the other in the heavens, on which were seen angels ascending and descending, represents the immediate connexion and continued intercourse between the heavens and the earth, between angels and men; by which communication may be understood, in what manner divine influences are continually proceeding from the Lord through the celestial and spiritual to the natural principle of man, by which influences the natural mind resting on terrestrial objects is opened and gradually elevated to celestial things. The above doctrine is the reverse of that erroneous philosophy of the present day, which teaches that all influences which man receives are from the natural world through the medium of the natural senses. The natural body of man has not life itself, but receiving its increment, and supplying its waste from nature, is merely an organ receptive of life from the only source of life—the Lord through the heavens; verifying His divine declaration; 'I am the life and light of the world.' Pursuing this mode of explication according to the law of divine order, which in all cases in agreement with itself through all grades of creation is not arbitrary; but consonant with that revelation God made of Himself in the beginning. If man was created both moral and natural after the likeness and according to the image of God; it follows that God is the divine antitype, of whom man is a semblance; and that God is the essential divine antitype of which man in his first and highest state was a humble shadow or type. In following this divine order through universal creation, it will be readily perceived the natural world must be a type of the spiritual, from which it proceeds as an effect of its cause; wherefore spiritual things can be represented to the human mind only by their types,—by natural images of which the divine Word is a composition representing spiritual antitypes by their types.

The preceding explanations are mere sketches of a few of the emblems involving the principles of Masonic Institutions. Will it be said of their principles they are vicious,—repugnant to the Word of God? Masonic emblems taken from the scriptures may appear in their detached form trifling to the ignorant, until informed that the Word previous to the invention of letters was transcribed down through ages by hieroglyphics or natural images representing spiritual things. Is it not natural to suppose that a society whose object was to separate themselves from prevalent idolatry, corruption, outrage and violence should associate under the sublime principles of goodness and truth and preserve these principles by the only means they, at that period, possessed, by emblematic images representative of their principles? The emblems themselves correctly understood demonstrate the truth of the proposition, and further illustrate that all the scriptures may be significative of spiritual things and thus explained and received give us more exalted ideas of their contents, than as now understood in merely their literal sense.

An argument urged against the correctness of any principles, that some bad men do openly avow them, is equally valid against the heavenly doctrines of Christianity; it is undeniable that vicious characters are found in every denomination.

No apology will be expected for this communication, since the fundamental principles of Masonry are not only opposed, but the members secretly vilified and publicly proscribed by scandalous and defamatory observations under the hypocritical garb of religion, avowedly for political effect. Masonry from its commencement has been considered nothing higher than a moral institution. It has no pretensions to that species of false sanctity which is assumed by some, excluding the rest of the world, condemning all not within its pale. Such characters would do well to improve their ways and manners by calling to mind the reproving words of our Lord to those who brought criminal accusation for a breach of the moral law; 'Let him who is without sin cast the first stone.'

Whether the preceding explanations will be received by antimasonic opposition with an evil eye or a single eye cannot be foreseen; if they are truths as many believe, men of consideration will not reject them as idle tales, but will attentively examine them, not for the sake of an institution for ages known by their emblems, but for the purpose of better understanding the scriptures, when their apparent inconsistencies and contradictions, effects of mental darkness, will no longer be their stumbling blocks. When better understood it will be known why St. Paul calls that an 'allegory,' where he explains to his hearers, what is written of Abraham, who had two sons, 'one by a bond-maid, the other by a free-woman'—one after the flesh the other by promise; and it will be further understood why St. Peter denominates other portions of the scriptures,—'figures.'

The Ontario, N. Y. Phenix a short time since observed that 'it was matter of astonishment that De Witt Clinton had been so mysteriously called from time to eternity.' An insinuation which none but the vilest wretch and most abandoned villain could be capable of making.

PRINCIPLES OF ANTIMASONRY.

When in the course of events it became our duty, as conductors of an independent press, to express our opinion in relation to Antimasonry; we did not intend to continue the subject, but to leave the matter to the judgment of our fellow citizens. But on further examination of the matter, we find so much which exhibits the wicked character of that party, that we feel constrained again to caution the public of the dangers with which they are environed, from the persecuting principles which characterize it, and of the perils which would abound, should those principles ever become dominant in our land. The best way to satisfy the community what those principles are, is to quote from the addresses, resolutions, &c. adopted by antimasons at different times, in various parts of the country. There can be no possible doubt of their being their legitimate opinions, and no objections can be entered that we draw unfair conclusions.

The following are a few of the many extracts which we may hereafter give.

By the Pennsylvania Antimasonic State Convention:—
'ALL who are not FOR US are AGAINST us!—Those who are NOT Masons are their DANGEROUS and LESS REPUTABLE coadjutors!! That EMASCULATED class of politicians; entitled to no manly regard, who are only fit to swell their voices in a HAREM, but dare not sing the song of victory!!!'

Mr. Burrows rose in violent opposition to striking out this clause. He thought these 'emasculated few' the very worst class, worse than the Masons themselves, that he would show them no quarters! Our party, said Mr. B. was in the minority at the last election! and if we do not put down these men they will keep us in a minority!!

From the Sunbury Beacon.

'Stand ready, armed and caparisoned, and if necessary even for mortal combat. Three alternatives are placed before you—Bow submissive to the yoke of despotism—CIVIL WAR and BLOODSHED—or beat them at the polls. Which is the best and most consistent in our peaceful and happy country, we leave you to determine.'

By the Saratoga County Convention:

'Resolved, That we will not hereafter vote for any man who belongs to any such association, (meaning Masonic) unless he will previously, in a PUBLIC and UNEQUIVOCAL manner RENOUNCE his connexion with the same.'

Resolved, That we absolve ourselves entirely from all connexion with either of the old parties—that we will hold no connexion with them.'

By the New York Antimasonic State Convention.

'Resolved, That every election, whether local or general, a ticket should be formed on the distinct principle of opposition to Masonry.'

'Resolved, That we, the members of this Convention, disavow all connexion between antimasons and any political party which has heretofore existed in the United States.'

These extracts show clearly what are the views and intentions of this party.

No man who belongs to the Masonic Society can receive a vote for any place of honor or profit.

He is like one expatriated from his country.

He is made an alien, with not even the privilege which our laws give a foreigner, that he may hold office after residing a certain time among us.

The native of Europe, of Asia, or of Africa, may receive places of trust and profit, after naturalization, but the free born American who happens to be a Mason shall have none.

The Turk, the Hindo, or the Kamschatkian, may come among us and be advanced to power, but the native citizen of the U. States, shall be forever kept from participating in the government of his own birth place.

The cozening knave or the arch villain may hold an of-social situation, provided he be not a member of the Masonic institution, but the honest man and the valuable citizen, who is a member, shall hold none.

The patriot, whose every act has been for the good of his country, and who has fought her battles and poured out his blood in her cause, shall not be trusted with power because he is a Mason.

The citizen whose mind has always been exerted, and whose talents have always been used for the public benefit, shall not hold an office, because he is a Mason.

The christian or the moralist whose aim has always been to walk humbly before God, and do to his neighbor as he would be done by, shall not hold an office, because he is a Mason.

The old man who through life has been honest and just, who has always respected the laws, and never done any thing but what was proper and right, and whose grey hairs command respect, and whose purity of conduct excites admiration, shall not hold an office, because he is a Mason.

The young man whose course has been blameless, and whose abilities all approve, and who has the laudable ambition to advance himself in life, shall not hold an office, because he is a Mason.

The military man who, when his country is in war, burns with a holy ardor to avenge her wrongs or defend her invasion, and whose military skill all admit, shall not receive a place wherein he can serve his country, he cannot be trusted, because he is a Mason.

Fellow citizens—If such doctrine should prevail, how long would it be before the spirit of persecution and the demon of fanaticism, would attempt to deprive a man who is a Mason, of the privilege of even voting for his rulers? If the fact of a man being a Mason be sufficient to disqualify him from holding office, if it be dangerous to trust him with any civil and military power, would it not follow that he ought to be debarred from the right of suffrage? We exclude the alien from office, but we at the same time exclude him from the ballot box. It is an anomaly in government to give the privilege of voting to those who are ineligible to office.

If it should ever so happen that the principles of ant Masonry should obtain among us, the same spirit that dictates the exclusion from office of particular men, would seek to deprive them of the distinguishing privilege of freemen, the choice of their own rulers. One course would be as justifiable and proper as the other, and the adoption of one would be the signal for the endeavor to establish the other.

MASONRY AS IT IS.

In stating my views on this subject, I shall endeavor to prove, that Masonry is not, nor never has been, a political society, or encouraged political meetings within its lodges, as many of our opponents wish us to believe. My assertion rests upon the following facts. Masons have never yet organized themselves as a political society, and stood in opposition to any act of our government, or of any other. They, as a secret society, have never yet used their influence to prevent our citizens from supporting our constitution or our laws.

Masonry was established long before this our happy government, long before the discovery of our western world, and up to this period has it flourished. Kingdoms and empires have been established, have passed away, and are almost forgotten; yet Masonry still prospers. If during a lapse of near three thousand years, often under despots, suffering the direst persecution that tyranny could invent, they did not rebel but suffered patiently—can it be supposed that Masonry would now endeavor to raze our Temple of Liberty, under whose roof they enjoy all that man can hope for? No; sooner than see it profaned, they would freely yield up their lives, and die on its threshold!

Did not Masons, in common with the patriots of '76, stand in defence of our land, and die to gain the liberty which we, their children, prize dearer than all else? Did they, during our late struggle with Great Britain, refuse to take up arms and defend our mutual homes? No. As Masons, they have never yet perpetrated one act inimical to our government, but as Masons and citizens, have always supported it.

In acts of charity and benevolence, have they ever been surpassed? Is it probable they ever will be? I have never heard of a Mason who could truly say, 'I have applied to my brethren for aid, and have not found relief.' To refuse aid to a brother, is an act unknown to Masons. But we, the world, well know how to refuse aid to our brother man, to our shame be it spoken—often when our conscience says yes, our selfish interest says no, and we obey it.

When was it that Masons used their endeavors to influence public opinion against any society whatever? Can the time be specified, by any ant Mason? Have not Masons held, and do not many still hold offices of trust and honor in our government; and have they not discharged their duties as faithfully as any other citizens would or could have done? Mark me, none of them were elected or appointed to offices because they were Masons; but because they were citizens in whom the people had confidence, and whom they knew to be worthy of it, and believed would faithfully discharge their duties.

Masons judge not as harshly as we do, of the acts of any society; they do not condemn any sect on account of the acts of a few members, and let us imitate them; and when we see a Mason departing from his profession, and committing acts unworthy of himself or his order, let us not condemn the whole society because there has been one renegade; but let us bear in mind this truth, all men are liable to err; there is no one perfect man, and there are good and bad of all persuasions.

Permit me, here, my young friends, to give you a word of advice. Do not let a new society have too great an influence over you, and do not make choice of any without diligent inquiry; for if you take evidence on one side only, you are in danger of being deceived. Never discard a tried friend upon the testimony of a stranger, without hearing his defence. And whenever you see a worthy Mason, consider him as a friend to you and to all mankind. For if you have not been influenced by party feelings, judging impartially, you will generally find him so.

St. Louis, Missouri, 1830. B.

POLITICAL ANTIMASONRY.—The Ontario Messenger, than which, no other paper has had a better chance to become thoroughly acquainted with all the beauties of political ant Masonry, having up to a very recent period been in strict confidence with John C. Spencer, now holds the following language in regard to that party and its principles:

'But the truth is, the leaders of the new faction care as little for the destruction of Masonry, as they do for the destruction of order and decency which they have trampled upon in the present struggle for political supremacy.—The grand combat is not to determine whether the old walls of the secret order shall be thrown down because they rest on the blood of a free citizen, but to determine whether the old occupants of the lucrative offices shall be driven away to make room for the hungry clan of new ones.

The struggle is, not to drag the offenders against the laws of the land to condign punishment, but to drag the men out of power in. The strife is for power, not for principle; for office, not for the punishment of the guilty. The bonfire of ant Masonry has become a mere cloud of smoke in which the knowing ones hide themselves to carry on their own designs, and to gull the people.

How will public morals be elevated under the purifying influences of such masters as Thurlow Weed, Frederick Whittlesey, and Myron Holley? How will the evils of secret societies be remedied, when the free, unrestraining doctrines of Miss Wright become propagated generally and adopted cordially? How will the resources of the state be husbanded when Myron Holley presides at the treasury! and Francis Granger in the Executive Chair!—Consistency thou art a jewel! But it is enough to see things as they are, not as they will be. It is enough to look at this country as it was five years ago, and then behold it, as it is—to judge whether political ant Masonry be a redeeming or a destroying spirit, and whether the rule of such men as are now in power be desirable, or the elevation of the new faction be necessary to establish order and to preserve liberty.'

The truth and correctness of this language will hardly be doubted, even by those who may feel the necessity of enforcing party discipline, to counteract the effect of such sentiments.

FOREIGN IMPORTATIONS.

Behold our City, with her lofty spires,
Temples or domes; her patriotic fires,
Devotion, learning, comfort, wealth or pride;
What trade has done, what enterprise has tried!
No paltry tariff checks her onward way:
Her special imports mark her prosperous day.
Her stock in trade is now a trade in stock:
Your living, creeping things—by drove or flock.
'Tis now a mutton; now, perchance, a swine;
Now 'tis a beef—Sir-knave or good sir-loin!
A right good market this, and right good trade,
Where ad valorem duties n e'er are laid!
For want of value, imports pass per tale;
Free 'tis confessed—for hire—or for sale.
First, Norfolk products grace old Faneuil Hall,
And Thacher, Churchill, Morton, Brinley—all
Stand ranged for show, beside the Worcester Squire,
At market value. What ambition higher!
'Twould be too much to fix their value here:
'Tis a moot point—not eas'ly fix'd 'tis clear.
Next, New-York imports rank in traffic's mart;
Right specious products—packed and marked with art;
A Ward with folly, and a Green with crime,
With tongues in heaven, but with hearts in time.
More distant regions still advance our trade,
In Dexter's mission—or his vain parade.
There's not a dunce that cons their virtues o'er
But straight exclaims, 'I've seen such tricks before.'
The people—ay, the people raise the note,
And 'tricks of Anties' swell each noisy throat.
Oh, for a patron-demon, whose device
May push our products at some decent price!

HOW TO GO TO CONGRESS.—Stand back and look on, till you 'see which way the cat jumps.' Don't attend any ant Masonic meetings, till somebody else has taken all the responsibility, and got the excitement up to a sufficient pitch to carry anything into office who gets a nomination—when, in the elegant language of the father of ant Masonry, 'the meaner the man you elect, the greater the triumph'—then, run about the streets, and poke your head into every gathering of anties, and sing out 'murder—where's Morgan—down with the Masons—I am an honest man, although I am my own trumpeter on this occasion.' Then, just hint that if a little loan of money is wanted, it can be had, with good security. And wind off with a gentle hint that you would like to go to Congress, just to spread the glorious cause of ant Masonry—no other motive at all.

If you make a bargain for two terms, and promise to stand back after that, and let—have his turn, mind and cheat him. Fix out a majority of the towns, before he thinks of starting. It don't take much time or money to secure a majority of the delegates. And eight dollars a day, for eight months in a year, is better than law, these hard times.—[Batavia Times.]

THE BOQUET.

From the Musical Bijou.
THE HEIRESS.

I love thee for thyself alone,
The world reprov'd my choice ;
Yet well thou know'st I claimed thee still,
With no unsteady voice:
They call'd thee fickle;—O ! how blind
Fond Woman's love may be !
I blamed thee not for broken vows,
Rejoicing thou wert free.

My Father told me thou wert poor,
Improvident and wild,
He said that want and penury,
Would kill his gentle child:
I answer'd not—but secretly
I scorn'd the tale he told ;
And then stole forth to offer thee
The Heiress and her gold.

My Mother said—'I do not heed
Thy Lover's want of wealth ;—
But will he fondly cherish thee
In sickness and in health ?
He has the restless eye of one,
Who leads a roving life ;
He loves not as thou should'st be loved,
O do not be his wife !'

My Father's anger moved me not,
Nor yet my Mother's tears ;
Thy fascination wean'd my heart
From love—the growth of years !
With few and fleeting tears I left
The haunts of early youth,
And placing this weak hand in thine
I trusted to thy truth.

My chosen dwelling would have been,
Some undisturb'd retreat ;
But led by thee I trod the halls,
Where pleasure's votaries meet :
And if with joy I heard them praise
The beauty of thy Bride ;
'T was but because I dearly prized,
My husband's glance of pride.

But then a dreary time came on—
I often wept alone ;—
And when we met, thy voice had lost
Its former gentle tone:
I utter'd no complaint—thou knowest
I never did repine ;—
And if my pale cheek chided thee,
It was no fault of mine.

I heard my boasted wealth was spent,
I smiled at such a loss ;
My Husband's love was more to me—
Far more, than hoarded dross ;
And was it only this that caused
The frowns upon his brow ?
'That wealth has been his bane,'—I cried
'We shall be happy now.'

Vain hope !—for thou dost shun the home—
Thy folly rendered poor !
I know not how to win thee back,
My cheek has lost its lure ;
I have no mother now to soothe
My sorrows on her breast ;
And he whose counsel I despised—
My Father, is at rest !

I do not say I love thee not—
No, false one, come what will,
Return and be but kind to me,
And I should love thee still ;

A broken mirror still reflects,
In every shattered part,—
'T is thus love seems but multiplied,
In this poor broken heart.

RECOVERY.

There is something in recovery which is peculiarly calculated to draw forth grateful emotions. After a long season of severe suffering, when our throbbing pulses begin to forget their feverish course, and nature once more pursues the tranquil tenor of her way, then, if ever, we shall exercise that most amiable of christian virtues,—gratitude.

It will have first for its object the Great Reserver of that curiously complicated machine, the human body,—so finely wrought, and having such an infinity of mutual dependencies, that the skilful anatomist, instead of wondering that the machine lasts no longer, is forced to acknowledge that the hand of the same wise Architect must be actively engaged in its preservation, or it would not last so long.

It is an admirable provision that the merciful Creator has made for the good of man's body, by the mutual consent and harmony thereof : Of which let us take St. Paul's description. 'But now hath God set the members, every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased Him. The eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: Nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you.' Such is the wonderful consent of all the parts, or as this sublime Theologian and Anatomist words it, 'God hath so tempered the body together, that the members should have the same care one for another. So that whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it ; or one member be honored, (or affected with any good) all the members rejoice (and sympathise) with it.'

Anatomists of our day tell us that this mutual accord, consent, and sympathy of the members, is made and kept up by the commerce of the nerves, their artificial positions and ramifications throughout the whole body; but to give a description of which, from the origin of the nerves in the brain, the cerebellum and spine, and throughout every part of the body, is certainly no part of my province. And so of the other three systems ; but yet I would be so much of an anatomist as to impress myself with the idea, that it is most wonderful this curious machine should so often be righted when seriously impaired. When I consider that multitude of unaccountable obstructions which disorder and discompose our frames, when I reflect that such is the sympathetic consent of the whole, that one part cannot be diseased and the others retain the healthy action, that a thousand delicate fibres and tubes are all essential to life, I am constrained to admit the interposition of Divine Providence in every case of recovery. But for this I should certainly believe, that nature, in long and violent efforts to extricate herself, would always counteract her own intentions.

What a delightful glow diffuses itself through the soul of man, when its casement is manifestly repaired ! lately the very orb of day frowned darkling, and all nature wore a lurid aspect. Now he sees the same natural sun, or rather, there are, if possible, a thousand charms added to that golden luminary. That music, which lately breathed horrible discord, now greets his ear with more than its wonted symphonious rapture. The vital fluid, which lately seemed as if concentrated about the region of the first organ of life, and hurried through its ventricles with a supernatural velocity, now resumes the even and tranquil tenor of its way, carrying a genial warmth and support to all the minute functions of life. Such are the delightful transitions of a man, worn down by a protracted season of suffering, when he finds himself returning to his wonted health and cheerfulness.

I said that God, the merciful Preserver of our frail bodies, should be the first object of the christian's gratitude. Our dear friends, who have so kindly interested themselves in our behalf, come next. A man who is in health, is, in some sense, independent of friends.—not so with the sick.—They are thrown entirely dependant on the good offices of those who kindly undertake to soothe their sorrows and alleviate their sufferings. We are all children of the same family, consequently exposed to sickness and suffering. Nothing, then, can be more amiable, scarce any better test to character and conduct, than a faithful and unwearied attendance upon the bed of languishment. Such a course of conduct is so noble, so elevated, which brings itself so home to the real condition of the human family, that the man of sense and feeling looks with perfect contempt on an opposite course, which is pursued by the devotees of pride and fashion. They blaze out their whole lives in one continued round of frivolity, and are, at last, dependant, in sickness, for those good offices, which are not strictly their due.

A judicious & skilful physician is most certainly an object of gratitude. Let us consider, for a moment, that patient and laborious research which he must go through in order to qualify himself to heal our bodies—long before he attempts to rectify the machine, he must make himself acquainted with its most secret and complicated movements. To do this by actual experiment, he must forego loathsome and appalling scenes, in order to take a survey of this most wonderful of nature's mechanism. Qualified in his profession, at the beck of disease, no weather, and scarcely his own infirmities must detain him. There is an amount of labour and responsibility attached to this profession, which I believe few of us are in the habit of estimating.

Upon the whole, recovery should remind us that the structure of our bodies is exceedingly attenuated and frail, and that they must eventually fall in ruins. The good man is sustained under the weight of this last calamity, by the consideration that his better part shall, in the end, inherit a body which is to be a medium for every ineffable delight, whose every avenue is to be closed against every sensation of pain, and that this curiously wrought body is destined to those regions of perfect felicity where one unbounded spring shall forever, ever bloom.

FLORIO.

AMBITION.

On looking over some files of papers, I need not say how ancient, nor how many generations of men handed down, I chanced to peruse a letter which contains, among other things, a long paragraph upon ambition. The sentiments and views of the writer, on that subject, are so very unusual and, in my opinion, so very sound and philosophical, that I have thought some interesting, and perhaps useful reflections might be excited, in the minds of your readers, by the publication of an extract ; which is therefore enclosed to your care and disposal.

PETER PENSE.

EXTRACT.

'In your letter of 27th March last, you complain that I did not answer yours of 25th February, wherein you request my opinion and advice upon the subject of your standing candidate for Governor of ———. I did not answer that letter, because I did not wish to influence you in that matter, but to leave you to act entirely as might be most agreeable to your own feelings. You say "My object in being a candidate would be more to please my friends than myself." Now you well know my sentiments upon such affairs of petty political ambition; wherein the most unprincipled, double-tongued and Janus-faced intriguer is usually the most successful; and, of course, success is rather a disgrace, than a matter of honor and congratulation. I assure you that I should think no better of you for being a governor, or even President of these United States; and, so far as my own feelings are concerned, I would not turn the copper to make you or myself either the one or the other. Were our liberties and republican institutions in danger, and I could feel that their safety might be promoted or secured, by my success, or that of my friends, in the career of political promotion; i. e. were the happiness of the people, my countrymen, to be, in my opinion, in any considerable degree, dependant upon the event of any office being filled by myself or my friends, I should be anxious for the event; but not otherwise. Pride I have always despised; and political ambition, age and maturity of intellect have taught me to look down upon, if not with contempt, at least with cold indifference. Governor of ———! President of the U. S. king, despot or tyrant of some place or speck upon this globe!! Of what importance are these temporal and transient and perplexing and often perilous situations to an immortal mind? Look upon your maps! and observe how small a spot is your state, or the United States, compared with the rest of the globe. Look into the Solar System! how small a speck is occupied by this same globe, the earth, this "rotundity on which we tread," compared with the space occupied by the whole system. Look into infinite expanse, and behold systems innumerable "of planets, suns and adamant spheres," inhabited by rational beings and "wheeling unshaken" and harmonious, by the laws of God! In this infinity of being what portion is occupied by our solar system? You have lost it in your gaze, and cannot, without effort, bring yourself back to its contemplation. Again in the opposite direction, look into the minute particles of matter, all living particles, which constitute all visible things! animals, vegetables, minerals! How are they formed? How do they grow? (How great; how wise; how good, must be the contriver, builder and sustainer of all these things?) Then look into yourself, and the intellect and feelings, which govern your actions! What are you? and what are they? and how do they operate? An impenetrable and perplexing mystery! you say. Now let me ask you, where is the foundation for pride and self-glorying? It is swallowed up in philosophy. Again read history, and tell me, who made the pyramids of Egypt? those monuments made by the vanity of man to perpetuate his memory to all generations, and obviously made for no other purpose. Make for me a list of the great men in Babylon and Palmyra and Mexico and Peru! — That I may (if I choose,) learn to repeat their names and actions, and praise and admire them. — Who were their Mayors and Aldermen? their military captains and civil rulers? who were their greatest jurists? and who, of them all, was the most solicitous to perpetuate his memory to the then future generations of men? Who projected and built, that wonder of the ancient world, the great wall of Babylon, said to have been sixty miles in circuit, eighty-seven feet broad and three hundred and fifty feet high, with twenty-five gates of brass on each of its sides: and those most useful, gigantic and patriotic works, the Great Wall of China, which measures fifteen hundred miles in length, thirty feet high, and so thick that six horsemen can easily ride abreast upon it; the imperial Canal of China, nine hundred miles long, often seventy feet deep and, in some places, twenty feet above the surface of the country, and two hundred feet wide, and far surpassing all the mighty canals of our western world? Surely the contrivers and builders of these things, such illustrious and patriotic men, ought not to have been totally forgotten!!

Again, supposing it were possible to furnish such a list of great men, for my, and other's admiration; and supposing several of these great men, and in each of these countries and cities, should happen to have borne, or been designated by the same name, which yourself bear; would not then their names and fame be confounded; and finally, all their memorable actions be concentrated into one character, a second Hercules? and supposing yourself had also been, in your day and generation, distinguished by high offices, and perhaps by some actions worthy to be added to the character of this Hercules; and they should be so added, to enhance his reputation; would this latter circumstance be a matter of self-complacency to you? Would it not be equally agreeable to you, if this Hercules had descended to posterity, bearing your name, and made up only of the exploits of the other persons? After all of you are corporally returned to the dust, what partiality ought you to entertain for the particles of dust, which had the fortune to compose your body, over those particles which compose the bodies of the other persons, so bearing your name, and making up the character, in history, whom I have called Hercules? Certainly you would entertain no such partiality. Actions then performed by persons of your name, so far as history and fame are concerned, become your actions; and there ought, in reason, to be no distinction, in your mind, between the actions of their embodied particles and of your own embodied particles. But further consider that even this Hercules, in succession of years, is rejected, by the judicious and scrupulous, from the pages of authentic history; becomes fabulous and is forgotten; or, as a passing cloud, assumes all the Protean shapes and colors within the scope of the imagination; and is, for a few more years, doomed to abide alone with the poets of fiction; and then finally, if one million of years will not, twenty millions, or at most eternity, will drive this Hercules into the Lethean stream of total oblivion. Where is your pride? How futile and unphilosophical is ambition? Think not that these reflections are tinged by the solemn feelings inspired by the Sabbath, in which I write them; for I assure you they have long been my real sentiments on week days as well as on the Sabbath, in the city and in the country, at home and abroad, while journeying, walking, riding, dreaming and waking. If you choose to be Governor, let it not be from pride or ambition; but to promote the happiness of the people and to benefit your country.'

PALE CHEEK OF LOVE.

Pale cheek of love! thou 'rt dear to me,
Oh! I could gaze my life away,
Drinking the tears that tremblingly
Steal from that eye of placid ray.
I cannot heed the rosy cheek,
That glows with maiden bashfulness;
The hues of thine more richly speak
Of blighted hopes and love's excess.

Pale cheek of love! thou 'rt dear to me,
Wet with the fringed eye-lid's dew,
There can I read sincerity,
And truth, and fruitless passion too.
Once, Laura, once the red rose hung
Upon those angel cheeks of thine,
But Grief a lovelier lily flung—
I kiss'd the flower and called it mine.

Pale cheek of love! thou 'rt dear to me,
Though bleached by Grief's untimely kiss,
Oh! I could press my lips to thee,
And sigh my soul away in bliss!
Turn not away, my Laura dear,
Roses cannot thy charms improve;
Give me the bright, soul-speaking tear,
That damps the sickly cheek of Love.

PETRARCH.

WILLIAM IV.

In a letter received from London is this paragraph of the King of England:

'Our good King William seems to be quite as much of a citizen King as his new Majesty of France, or Farmer Jackson. He tells the sentinels about his palaces—"to be off—he can take care of his own things without the help of soldiers." He rides about Brighton in a fly called off the stand. And his Queen tells the maid servants that they must doff their finery and wear aprons.

It is sometimes amusing to notice the consequence and importance attached to some of the simplest sayings or actions of a man who has happened to be born a prince. There can be no particular objections to such a notice as the above, which goes to shew a common place familiarity in a sovereign—which is there considered a peculiarity.

Any thing which illustrates the private and personal character of a man high in power, is certainly interesting, and even important—for the policy of his public measures partakes largely of his personal character. But to what a ridiculous extreme is this fawning spirit carried! If his Majesty 'crosses his royal legs'—it becomes matter for a newspaper paragraph. If his Majesty uses an Italian snuff-box—the public must know it. If his Majesty takes a ride exactly as every other gentleman does every day—all the daily papers publish it.—And if his Majesty should condescend to stop in the streets, without attendants, and say to any private man—"this is a very pleasant morning,"—it would be contained in the letters of a dozen correspondents for publication in some foreign journals. We remember hearing that Jefferson, soon after his inauguration, arrived in Baltimore, and after dismounting at Barnum's Hotel, actually led the horse himself, by the reins, and tied him to the post. This became a topic of general remark—for nearly every body thought it absolutely wonderful!

A foreign arrival at midnight—sorts out—and a quart of lamp oil in the sleepy compositor's case, is a true exemplification of a fat Case.—

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 4, 1830.

[The following article, from an esteemed correspondent, was written immediately after having read the reputed statement of the Cross-Examination of Witherell, and before its correctness had been denied. He, therefore, speaks of W. as entering his own house and assaulting his own wife. Though this is not positively proved, it is sufficiently evident that if he did not personally chastise his own 'head-board,' he was privy to the 'outrageous act.' The instigator and accessory (as criminal as him) who commits the crime, and should be punished accordingly. Though Witherell did not enter his own house, as alleged, his attempt to conceal the culprit, by removing the principal witness, is evidence of a participation in the crime. He is no less guilty than the principal.]

THOUGHTS ON THE WITHERELL OUTRAGE.

To one that has been conversant with the spirit of Political Antimasonry for the last two years, there is little in this self-created outrage that ought to excite our wonder and surprise. Who, I ask, should wonder that a party, whose sole object has been power and aggrandizement at the expense of the proscription of two hundred thousand free citizens of America, who should wonder that schemes should be resorted to, and plans devised to carry that object into effect, the record of which would blacken the pages of the chronicle of Pandemonium!!

The time has come when it were base, it were criminal not to make use of strong and energetic language, and when we have exhausted the powers and energies of language, we fail of portraying the cruel, the hypocritical, the proscriptive measures that are resorted to by those leaders of Political Antimasonry, who, though they may bear some resemblance of the human family in forms and features, are destitute of every principle of humanity. We would appeal to every honest man, if the time has not fully come, when every principle of sacred honor, and right, and even personal security does not demand, not only the most energetic language, but the most prompt and energetic means to ferret out a monster, that has so long been preying on the very vitals of that sacred honor, right, and even personal security.

Yes, Fathers, the time has fully come. Those unalienable rights for which you fought and bled, are now jeopardized by the basest faction that ever disgraced this once happy land. Those sacred rights and privileges, this most unprincipled faction is now attempting, by the most consummate acts of villany, to take from the fairest portion of your progeny. Will you look calmly on, as though the great object of all your toils and sufferings is now to be consummated, because the spirit of antimasonry fattens and flourishes upon falsehood and oppression, those very materials that composed a mass of grievances for which you took up arms, and fought? Must this fair fabric of liberty and equal rights, which your own hands have reared, be demolished at a blow, only because one part of your progeny have transformed themselves into a band of robbers, for the only and sole purpose of taking from the innocent and unoffending part, that liberty, and those rights, and that, at the expense of every, every sacred principle of honor? No, Fathers, never, never can it be. The same devotedness to the cause of your bleeding, suffering Country which prompted you to ascend the heights of Charlestown, and to furnish in the parched plains of a southern clime, will actuate you to put down a foe to your Country's good, far more deadly in its nature than even British tyranny.

Fathers of the Church. Though we have addressed many of you as fathers of our common country, we would now address you as pillars of a more perfect and durable monument. Shall strangers devour and destroy your beautiful building, and you know it not? Shall the wild bear from the wood, and the beast from the desert trample upon your pleasant vine, and you be regardless? Shall those unclean spirits like frogs creep into your dwellings, and, by artful insinuations, and base falsehoods, divide and distract your household, so that the morning and evening Orisons cannot unitedly be offered up? Shall your churches be divided and rent in pieces, only because some Masons are attached to them, and they charged with those crimes and felonies, which have been proved to be self committed by their cruel and unrelenting foes? Look around you, Fathers and see the dreadful state of your churches, and tell us if an object, supported by the most daring acts of villany which any historian has recorded, is worth all this sacrifice. You know it is not. Nature and reason oblige the flimsy pretext. Why not, then, help those of your brethren who are suffering by antimasonic fraud and despotism. Deny, if you can, that they suffer for crimes which their dastardly foes commit and charge upon them. Come over to our help, and save the church from a more wide spreading desolation than it suffered under the edict of a Nero, or a Caligula.

To our Mothers and Sisters, we would say, how can you regard those bandits, who strive to separate you from the dearest objects of your affection, but with horror and detestation. To gain so respectable and influential a portion of the community as proselytes, all the arts which the ingenuity or falsehood could contrive, have been resorted to. You have been told that your fathers, husbands, and brothers, are connected with an association of midnight assassins. Such tales of horror have been dinned into your ears by these emissaries of disturbance that, may be, you have been almost afraid to enjoy the balmy hours of sleep, lest your indulgent father, your dear husband, or your kind brother should arise and slay you. You now see who is the midnight assassin. It is the cool, calculating antimason, who in the dead hour of night, enters his own dwelling, assaults, or feigns to assault his own wife, and then charges the felony upon your indulgent father, your kind husband, or your dear brother. Mothers and sisters, will you brook all this? No—there is too much virtue in the female heart. We do verily believe that you will as soon associate with the plague now raging at Constantinople, as with these hideous monsters of depravity. We do most confidently believe that the female heart which is always alive to mild and generous emotions, will heed the cry of suffering innocence. Do not mock us by the story of Morgan, for, if murdered, Edward Giddens, the great oracle of antimasonry is, by his own confession, his most probable murderer.

The young men of our country have seen that a powerful party has by some means or other, sprung up. If its main object is political aggrandizement, wicked measures must be resorted to, to carry that object into effect. This you have seen. You have seen the most honored servants of antimasonry willing on the eve of an election, to expose the lives of their fellow citizens for deeds of darkness which their own hands have done!!! Are you safe?—Who can tell but some one of you may become a victim to antimasonic deceit. Your sacred rights as free citizens are not only threatened, but your very lives are in jeopardy.—You have seen that Political Antimasonry stops at no consideration on earth, or in heaven. You have seen that it spares neither character nor life!! What then can you gain by continuing this most unreasonable opposition to an institution, whose very laws and obligations secure to you your lives, liberties, and your sacred honor? B.

The Batavia 'Spirit of the Times and People's Press' in reply to an antimasonic paper, on this subject, has the following remarks, which we recommend to the attention of our readers:

THE WITHERELL AFFAIR, AGAIN.

'Some one in behalf of the little boy, who is nominally the Editor of the 'Slash Tub,' is out upon us in terrible wrath, on the subject of Elder Witherell. The low, black-guard language contained in that paper of Friday last, we shall pass by in silence; knowing full well, that where the character of dabblers in the 'Slush,' for political truth and veracity, is known, nothing in extenuation need be said.

We did receive, as we stated last week, through the Telegraph mail, two handbills detailing the testimony said to have been elicited on the examination of one David Brown, charged with having been concerned in the pretended outrage upon Mrs. Witherell, and not the Elder. We then believed those handbills to be genuine—every thing conspired to render us stronger and stronger in that belief. We knew that antimasons, just before election, had been guilty of such transactions equally infamous as the pretended outrage upon the family of Elder Witherell—with this view of the case we deem it proper and important, that the facts, as we supposed they were, should be laid before the people. Accordingly on Monday morning, being the first day of Election, a handbill was issued from our office, embracing the important facts as contained in the handbill we received. During all this time, the knot of antimasonic dictators in this village, were not idle—they sent forth their lackeys, to proclaim to the intelligent people that it was a 'Masonic hoax'—and as an evidence of which, they asserted that no such Justice as A. T. Bush, resided in Washington County, and trumped up innumerable falsehoods to counteract what they said was a lie. Measures were immediately taken to ascertain the true state of the case. Information has since been received that the handbill which was sent to us, is a FABRICATION. We no sooner became possessed of this fact, than we frankly acknowledged our error—if the conductors of the Advocate would do the same, the public would be mortally obliged to them. Our cause, is the cause of the great republican party of the state and union—and if it cannot be sustained except at the expense of political honor and honesty, we care not how soon it is annihilated. We have never sought to palm upon our readers, that which we did not fully believe ourselves.

The Advocate labors to fix this contemptible artifice of their own degraded partisans, upon 'the Masons.' But this will not do—the fact is otherwise. The story of the attempted outrage upon Elder Witherell was put forth at a time when it was well known that a refutation of the charge, in the remote parts of the State, could not be obtained, before the purposes for which it was intended should be fully attained. In this they succeeded. But the facts in the case have come out—and the deed, in all its damning deformity, stands chargeable to ANTIMASONS THEMSELVES—neither is it the work of a few misguided individuals—but a deep, deliberate and hellish party scheme, to commit CRIME, and then charge it upon the innocent, that the actors might thereby turn it to political effect!! Will the conductors of the Advocate ask the authority for such a conclusion? If so, we refer them to the examination had before Sted D. Brown, Esq. of Washington County, which will be found in our columns to-day. We bespeak for this document a fair, candid and dispassionate perusal—if this is done, we are fully persuaded, that even antimasons themselves, will arrive at the same conclusion on this subject we have—it cannot be otherwise—the proof is irresistible.

When the people in the vicinity of this pretended outrage, became indignant at such base and unprincipled conduct, and resolved to investigate the foul deed, what was the conduct of antimasons? Did they like good citizens and honest men, step forward in aid of justice? No. Instead of this, the aid of antimasonry was called in to screen the guilty from discovery. And here we can see the baneful effects of Antimasonry. So deeply rooted is the principle, that one antimason is bound to protect another, that even professors of religion were found actively obeying the call. When a judicial investigation was decided upon, the Elder's son was sent away on purpose to avoid being called as a witness, and was told by Dr. Corbin and Elder Colver, at Kingsbury, of a certain house he could go to, and stay, for the purpose of keeping out of the way! Now, why was this done, if not for the purpose of screening the actual perpetrators of this pretended outrage from merited public contempt?

Any one who will attentively read this examination, and follow closely the testimony of Elder Witherell, Mrs. Witherell and her son, will discover divers inconsistencies and even contradictions, where they are called upon to swear to the same point. The following are some of them:—

1st. Mrs. Witherell says the large fleshy man in the bed room had the weapon, and George states that the one at the door had it.

2d. She says when the man had said 'You damned perjured scoundrel,' &c. George spoke five or six times, father have you come, and George says he said so only twice he thinks, and said once father have you got home.

3d. Mr. W. says George screamed so loud he could have been heard to Capt. Hyde's (100 rods,) and G. says he only spoke as loud as he would ordinarily from one room to another to his father, and did not scream or halloo loud.

4th. The last part of Elder Witherell's testimony in relation to Mrs Witherell's state of mind and health, shows her inability (however right her intentions were) to give any relation to be relied on, and in no way impeaching her veracity.

5th. If George was not one of the actors or the only one, why does he hesitate to answer so plain and simple question as whether he came out of the chamber, &c. by saying he did not if he recollects right, come down out of the chamber at the time of the affray; and again 'did not frighten his mother that night as he recollects of' was he in doubt on these two points, and if so, why?

6th. Why not call the men within six or eight rods if any thing was wrong, or on the ten or eleven who lived nearer than Smith and Mrs. Chase, and why were not more of them disturbed when a single scream would have brought several to their assistance, as testified by George and Mrs. Witherell?

7th. Why did Mrs. Witherell tell Mr. Hubbard not to tell what had happened, because no one would believe it, if she thought there had been some one there who did not belong to the house?

8th. Why did George go to bed immediately, and say nothing to his mother about the men who had left the house but a moment before; and why did she go to his bed 'to cover him up' and say nothing of the men having been there until after George got up and had been sent for Mrs. Chase, as George testifies?

9th. Mrs. Witherell says she did not scream during the attack, so says George, both of his mother and of himself; and yet murder was intended as they believed.

10th. Messrs. Hubbard and Smith were at the house soon after the men had been there, and saw nothing to cause an alarm, and Hubbard if he had really thought there had been an attempt at murder he certainly should have alarmed the neighbours.

11th. Did George believe his father had come when he said 'father have you come,' after the words 'you damn'd perjured scoundrel,' &c. had been used, or did he think it was his father's voice, and an attack on his mother by the Elder in disguise?

12th. George said the next morning that he knew nothing about the men being there except what his mother told him.

13th. George's testimony is not to be relied on as is shown by all who testify respecting it; even Deacon Brayton and Thomas who were called to support him, fail to do so.

Will some one of the godfathers of the Advocate be so good as to refer to this subject again? It is true so infamous an attempt to deceive and impose on the credulity of the people, may not be exactly palatable to them—and they may well exclaim, 'the desperation and villany of antimasonry knows no bounds.' If we published a forgery, which it appears we did, it was done with a full conviction of its truth—we were imposed upon, and did we know the imposter, we would most willingly expose his hypocrisy—but this knowledge, we have no doubt, lies hid in the breast of antimasons. Men, so lost to every ennobling feeling of our nature, as to descend to the infamy of committing a pretended assault upon one of their own neighbors, for political effect, would not hesitate to commit a forgery of this description, in order to throw a shade of doubt and distrust over the transaction.'

The Buffalo Republican has the following:

'Elder Witherell, of Hartford, Washington county, the headboard of whose bed received a distinct knock on the night of the 27th September last, has really been examined before justice Brown in relation to the alleged attempt to murder him; and though the examination varies essentially from the account of it as published just before the election, enough is substantiated to make out a clear case of antimasonic deception.—We have not room for the details of the evidence, but it appears from the variations in the statements of the father and mother and son, and the reputed bad character of the latter, THAT THE TRICK WAS ONE TO WHICH THE ELDER AND THE SON WERE BOTH PRIVY. The whole is a detestable humbug and a shameless piece of villany, and the cause which can use such helps to support it must be corrupt indeed.'

SHERIFF SUMNER.—Mr. Sumner handed us a note on Wednesday week, relative to our remarks of the 13th ult. in which we stated some of the particulars of the interview we had with him on the 6th. He says, the account given of that interview demands his reprobation. We had thought the kindness with which he was there treated would ensure us his thanks. We merely stated what he stated to us, without exaggeration. He does not pretend that we misunderstood or misrepresented him. We therefore have no controversy with him on that score. If he on that occasion said what is not pleasing to his antimasonic friends, or what he now regrets having said, it is no affair of ours. He says he does not understand to whom we allude when we speak of our unprincipled and reckless persecutors. We may hereafter have occasion to inform him. If we allude, he continues, to the Suffolk Committee, he has no participation in our feelings, for he does not believe that those gentlemen have done us any injury. We shall not dispute Mr. Sumner's right to set himself up as the apologist or champion of the 'Suffolk Antimasonic Committee.' More anon.

STEAM BOILERS.—It is stated in Silliman's Journal, that fifteen hundred persons have been destroyed in this country, by explosions from steam boilers. It is not improbable that 4-5ths of the accidents that have occurred, may be traced to defects in the boilers or to the carelessness and inattention of the engineers. We seldom hear of the occurrence of such accidents in England. Our engines are equal to any in use there. They have no improvements that we have not. Their iron is no better than ours. How is it then that a greater number of accidents of this kind occur here than in that country? Improvements may yet be made on the steam engine—a portion of the present liability of the bursting of boilers may be removed; but after all, our principal security must rest in the toughness of the iron and the skill and faithfulness of the engineer. Give us a boiler, of exact thickness throughout—not one square thin and another thick—that has been well tested, and an engineer that knows his duty, and will perform it, and we care not a fig whether it be on the high or low pressure principle—no accident will occur.

The London Globe of the 14th of Oct. has the following paragraph:—'Mr. Stephenson, the proprietor of the Rocket Engine, on the Manchester and Liverpool Rail-way, had this week decided in his favor a wager of one thousand guineas upon the speed of his Engine, by traversing the distance between the two towns, (thirty-two miles) in thirty three minutes—or, in other words, at more than fifty-eight miles per hour.

GEORGE CROWNINSHIELD.—The trial of this individual, for misprision of felony, came on before the Supreme Court at Salem on Saturday. The indictment contained two counts. 1st. Alleging that R. Crowninshield, jun. and J. J. Knapp, jun. formed a conspiracy to murder Capt. Jos. White, and that the defendant was acquainted with all the facts. The 2d count alleged, that the murder had been perpetrated by Richard Crowninshield jun. and J. F. Knapp, as principals, and J. J. Knapp, jun. as accessory before the fact, and that the defendant was privy to the whole transaction, and did not disclose it. Witnesses on the behalf of the government, and in behalf of the defendant, were introduced and examined. Mr. Shilaber, for the defendant, argued the case to the jury with much ability and eloquence, occupying about three hours in his argument. He was followed by the Solicitor General, for the Government, in a very able argument of an hours duration. His Hon. Judge Putnam then charged the Jury, who retired at about half past 7, P. M., and at 8 o'clock returned a verdict of NOT GUILTY. George Crowninshield was then discharged without day.

The Reading, Pa. Journal of the 12th of Nov. says 'we this day discovered a ripe Cherry on a tree in our yard, known by the name of May-duke.' The York Gazette of the 16th informs us that, in Butts-town there is a mulberry tree, which for two successive years, has borne a double crop of mulberries.—The second crop for the present year is now ripe. The fruit is large and perfect. A Lancaster paper of the 25th says, 'we hear of ripe cherries, green peas and strawberries having been eaten during the present week.' 'Our gardens resemble more their usual appearance in the latter part of April than that of November.' On the tenth we had a common pink in full blossom. On the morning of the 1st we had a slight fall of snow, of which at breakfast time we obtained a sufficient quantity to make a decent sized snow-ball—we should like to exchange gifts with our Pennsylvania friends.

NEW-YORK CELEBRATION.—The procession in honor of the late events in France took place in New York on the 26th ult. The papers speak of it as an imposing spectacle. The length of the procession may be inferred from the fact that it was two hours and a half in passing Broadway, where few and very brief interruptions occurred. The Marshal and his aids made a gallant appearance, in the station assigned to them. Col. Monroe was prevented, by the doubtful and disagreeable appearance of the weather, we presume, from joining in the procession, as he had intended to do. The aged citizens who rode together in a barouche presented an interesting sight.

GRAND ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Notice is hereby given, that a stated Meeting of the M.E. Grand Royal Arch Chapter of this Commonwealth, will be held at Mason's Hall, on TUESDAY, the 7th inst, at 6 o'clock, P. M. The officers, Members, and all concerned, will take notice, and govern themselves accordingly.

HIGHLAND BALLAD.

BY JAMES W. MILLER.

Fair lot befall the minstrel!
Bright sky and shadeless earth,
Read ye what his deep eyes tell—
The wizard poet's birth—
Ye sprites, whose charge of duty
Is over land and sea,
To breathe the tints of beauty,
And rear the strong and free—

Let spring for him the fountains,
And spread for him the bower,
Pile huge the 'battled mountains,
Unfold the simple flower;
Let all be for the minstrel,
For he is born of them,—
To weave for him the song spell,
To stud his diadem.

Trace ye his boundless empire
Upon the midnight air,
With pencils of the red fire—
He walks a monarch there!
Nevis be his high altar,
Its clouds his temple dome,
His brave heart shall not falter—
The minstrel-priest shall come.

And when the day is glowing
Above the windless deep,
The glassy waves are flowing
With slow and idle sweep,
Then launch him in a light boat
Upon the slumbering main,
That he may know what dreams float
O'er ocean's mighty brain.

And fair befall the minstrel
Within the homes of men!
Ye fairy elves that aye dwell
By highland hill and glen,
Lead ye his footsteps ever,
At rosy dawn and eve,
When bright leaves toss and quiver,
And pearly dew-nets weave.

In princely halls of wassail
Fill him the cup of cheer,
While o'er the conqueror's festal
His harp is ringing clear;
And in the humble shealing
Spread fresh his heather bed,
That dreams from perfume stealing
May wreath his sleeping head.

So through life's deserts dreary,
Lone waste and busy town,
His step may ne'er grow weary,
His smooth brow never frown;
And when his quick glance slumbers
From aught of earth or air,
Breathe o'er his rest soft numbers—
So let his lot be fair!

'On some foul slander break thy morning fast,
And dine on falsehood, fouler than the last;
Heap lie on lie, without regard to sense,
No matter what, a lie may bring the pence;
Let no "still voice" thy poisonous pen control,
But make thy dollar though thou damn thy soul.'

'Says a beau to a lady, pray name, if you can,
Of all your acquaintance, the handsomest man.
The lady replied, if you'd have me speak true,
He 's the handsomest man who is most unlike you.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

MOORE & SEVEY,

NO. 22, CORNHILL, (LATE MARKET-STREET.)

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

From the Hampshire Sentinel.

TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

RENOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.

No. 7.

Sir—Your former companions were much surprised, that you should lend the sanction of your authority to the numerous slanders against unoffending brethren. They expected justice at your hands, and presumed you would distinguish the innocent and the guilty, and show your hearers, clearly, the merits and causes of this all-pervading excitement. They hoped, indeed, that your sense of honor and rectitude, and your intimate knowledge of the Morgan conspiracy, would induce you to remove the vile imputations industriously disseminated against the whole fraternity. Imagine their amazement, then, when they found you abandoning truth, and justice, and gratitude, and confirming indiscriminately, the nameless calumnies against them. Although they were well aware of your versatility of character, and proneness to extremes, and instability of purpose, yet, they could not without the fullest evidence, believe you capable of wanton misrepresentation, and cold-blooded slander. Many of them remembered your former zeal, and your unwearied exertions in behalf of the order, and could not believe that it was rank hypocrisy, and vain pretension; they could not believe, though assured by some, who knew you best, that you were capable of anything to accomplish your purposes—that you would unblushingly ‘disaffirm everything whereof you had affirmed,’ and give the lie direct to your own recorded declarations. Although they knew that you were a hungry apostate, a deserter to the enemy, and a traitor to your friends, and had disclaimed all fellowship and communion with the brethren, and renounced all allegiance to the institution, yet, they presumed you would have some little regard to truth, and some decent respect to justice, and, peradventure, some little self-esteem.—They were not before aware, that renouncing Masonry, implied, also, the renunciation of every honorable feeling, of every virtuous affection, and of every grateful recollection. They did, indeed, consider, that he, who would at will, sever the obligation of promises, could persuade himself, that it was his duty to persecute and destroy his former friends, but they rashly presumed that you had not yet arrived at that summit of perfection, and would yet indulge some kind reminiscences of former friendship and its kindnesses. I confess, sir, that I did not think it in human nature, so soon to vacillate to such wide extremes. The last time I had the honor of seeing your reverence, you were full of your praises of the institution, and manifested a zeal, which I then thought unwarrantable—ah, a zeal, as clamorous, as indefatigable, as bold, as obtrusive and as reckless, as your present madness. What assurance can you give, that within a few short months, your reverence will not be found at an opposite point in the circle? All your movements seem to be curvilinear; none of them are straight forward and direct. Whatever further somersets remain for you, I protest against your turning again to Masonry. She is happily rid of you. Her charities can be more worthily employed than in feeding and clothing the ingrate. She courts no fellowship with traitors, nor knowingly holds communion with knaves and dissemblers. The viper, warmed into life in the bosom of his too confiding benefactor, raised his demoniac crest, and stung him to death. I acknowledge myself to have been woefully mistaken as to your character, and ‘to have reckoned without my host.’ I did think there must be some sincerity where there was so much profession, and some honesty of purpose where there was such untiring perseverance. While your mouth was full of its praises, I did not dream that your heart was sick of its corruptions. While your voice ascended for a blessing on it and us, who would dream of your ‘groaning in spirit?’ While the smile of complacency and approbation beamed from your countenance on its labors, who would dream that that same countenance ‘in private,’ was, on this account, bathed in tears? In one particular, sir, you are consistent. Lukewarmness is no part of your character. As a Mason, and as an anti, you disclaim neutrality, and march boldly in the first rank. For this I commend you. Deliver me from a prowling enemy, or a covert warfare. You take a ‘bold stand,’ come what may. In your attack upon your foster mother, Masonry, you were guilty of no relentings, no half-way measures; your hand was firm, and soon drove the dagger to the hilt. You proceeded the whole length of ‘the rope,’ and not only confirmed the misrepresentations and falsehoods of others, but added several choice specimens of your own invention. The wretch, who can deliberately sunder the ties of solemn oaths, voluntarily and understandingly assumed, and shake off their obligations, ought to be presumed capable of any villainy, or any crime; but I confess, I had some charity for our good chaplin, on account of his sobel life, and the sacredness of his office. I had much sympathy for his temporal misfortunes, and was disposed to lament the destiny that drove him from place to place. Knowing him to be a man of ardent temperament, and little mind, and less literature, I did not know but he might have some qualms of conscience on account of his confessed connexion with the Morgan outrage, and took the course he did to silence her reproaches and wash out this guilt. On the principle that ‘misery loves company,’ I was disposed to apologize for the parson, and let him pursue that course of policy which seemed to him most expedient, in his distressed circumstances. And, if to harrangue a motley multitude were any gratification to his ambition, or served to blunt for a while the stings of conscience, why I would not object, let him live while his day lasts, and enjoy his life as well as he can. But I was not prepared to see the anointed minister of reconciliation hold up his hand, in the face of high heaven, and solemnly affirm as true, what he knew to be false. Nor was I any the more prepared to hear him disclaim the mild principles of the gospel, and advocate proscription, intolerance, and persecution. Much less was I prepared to see him abandon the pacific character of the ‘humble disciple,’ whose duty it is, if smitten on the one cheek, to present to the assailant the other also, and assume the attitude, and utter the language of the desperado, and hurl around him ‘firebrands, arrows and death.’ But strange as it may seem, this pious elder instead of presenting himself with full evidence to sustain his cause, reiterated the damning charges of other libellers, and relied on his own testimony for proof. Sir David, which portion of your testimony will you have us believe? One portion proves your present doctrines, and the other disproves them. Please inform us which is true, or account rationally for the disparity. This truth telling elder did assert, in the most unqualified terms, that Masonry is antirepublican and antichristian—that same Masonry, too, that enjoyed for some fifteen years, his reverence’s counsel, and prayers, and constant fellowship, that was the theme of his unceasing eulogy, and it would have enjoyed them still, had he not supposed that the popular tide was setting to a different point. Let him mount the car of fame, and spread wide the sails of glory, the fitful breeze of popular favor will desert him in the valley of contempt, or impel him into the gulf of oblivion. Sir David, do you mean to assert on your own responsibility that Masonry is antirepublican and antichristian, or did you assert it because your fellow laborers, the pioneers of defamation had so asserted? Will you just inform us why this discovery, which now seems so obvious, was not made sooner, or, if made, why it had no influence over your conduct? Will you also have the goodness to furnish us some little evidence of these facts? Pardon us, sir, for doubting your word, for really we do not know which of your stories to believe. You have before told us a perfectly different story, in public and in private, in the house and by the way, and manifested your sincerity in these declarations by a consistent conduct. And we believed you then, because we had the evidence of our senses, that your doctrines were true. Permit me, most worthy knight, to inquire, if you ever assented to the following propositions and assumed their obligations? ‘You agree to be a good man, and true, and strictly to obey the moral law.’ ‘You agree to be a peaceful subject, and cheerfully conform to the laws of the country in which you reside.’—‘You promise not to be concerned in any plots or conspiracies against government, but patiently to submit to the decisions of the supreme legislature.’ ‘You agree to pay a proper respect to the civil magistrate, to live creditably and act honorably by all men.’ ‘You agree to avoid private piques and quarrels, and to guard against intemperance and excess.’ ‘You agree to promote the general good of society, and to cultivate the social virtues, and to propagate the knowledge of the arts.’ This looks much like antirepublicanism, and much like immorality. How wonderful, that even you should have escaped from an institution teaching such vile doctrines as these, unscathed! Yet you, sir, have solemnly incurred the obligation of these dreadful promises, and turn yourself as you will, it still binds your conscience, and will, to the day of your death. Let us read a little further in the book. ‘I promise and swear, that I will help, aid, and assist, with my counsel, my purse, and my sword, all poor and distressed knight templars, their widows and orphans, they making application to me as such, and I finding them worthy, so far as I can do it, without material injury to myself, and so far as truth, honor, and justice may warrant.’—Have you taken the above obligation? How dreadfully irreligious! How monstrously profane! Is it true, that Sir David did indeed, swear, that he would administer to the wants of the destitute, unstained by guilt or crime, so far as truth, honor, and justice should warrant? Well might the ‘master’ you now serve, desert you, while assuming such fearful responsibilities! Will you point me to the obligation, that requires a Mason to assist any other, than a worthy brother, and he himself to be judge of that worthiness? Read on. 'You are now performing a penance as the trial of your humility. Of this our Lord and Savior has left us a bright example. For though he was the eternal Son of God, he humbled himself to be born of a woman, to endure the pains and afflictions incident to human nature, and finally to suffer an ignominious death upon the cross; it is also a trial of that faith, which will conduct you safely over the dark gulf of everlasting death, and land your unfranchised spirit in the peaceful abodes of the blessed.' 'We adore and magnify thy holy name, for the many blessings we have received from thy hands, and acknowledge our unworthiness to appear before thee, but for the sake and in the name of thy atoning Son, we approach thee as lost undone children of wrath, but through the blood of sprinkling and sanctification of the Holy Ghost, we come,' &c. Does this savor of infidelity? Are these sentiments antichristian? They are the legitimate sentiments of Masonry, and once received your high approbation. How pitiable is the man, who for party purposes, can so far forget the little prudence and discretion he may have, as to assert for truth, what is susceptible of so easy refutation! The conscience and heart of such a wretch, are too black to receive any darker shades from my coloring. 'I will justly and impartially regulate all matters of difference between brethren. I will be just and equitable to all the world, as I am constituted by this lodge to render justice.' Your life, methinks, furnishes a lucid commentary on this obligation. How impartial, and equitable, and just is thy late career—how honorable to thee as a man, and how creditable to thee as a christian minister! Everybody will envy thy renown, and emulate thy matchless virtues.

Now, Sir David, notwithstanding the boldness of your assertions, and the vehemence of your declamation, I defy you to produce a single proposition, within the whole compass of accredited Masonry, that lends the least countenance to monarchy or infidelity. I defy you in the name of Him who will finally judge us, to produce a single paragraph that supports your assertions, or affords the least pretence for your denunciations. The whole matter of your charges rests in the man making them, and not in Masonry. They are gratuitous, wanton, malicious. I should, indeed, expect anything, and everything, from an apostate, who had received as many favors, and kindnesses, and charities from Masonry, as thyself. Turn your eye upon the list of seceders. Who do you see on the illustrious roll? Generally, such men as thyself—men, who have been fed, and clothed, and sustained by her charities—men, who have been advanced from degree to degree gratuitously, compensating our time and trouble only by unmeasured eulogy. Now, sir, how stands the matter between us? Have I not conclusively proved your assertions false by Bernard's book, and what intelligent anti will quarrel with that authority? You needed not this book to teach you whether your doctrines were true or false, you were taught in a different school, and knew them false, and discolored, and distorted, when you asserted their truth. I claim no great merit for this victory over Sir David. Truth will always easily vanquish falsehood, and put the hypocrite to shame, while error, and sophistry, and malice, court the 'triple robe of darkness,' and cover their guilt by midnight. 'Truth is mighty and will prevail.'

ROYAL ARCH.

EXTRACT FROM MR. MAYNARD'S REPORT.

'Religion has had many improper connexions. Wickedness has often sought its mantle to veil unholy designs. It is not without example that Freemasonry should seek its alliance. Every subtle machination against human happiness, or civil liberty, and every mighty effort for the oppression of mankind, has covered and characterised its designs with the sanctity of religion. Christianity has been made to aid the advancement of the most unholy purposes, and the gratification of the most pestilent of human passions. Its benign influences have been perverted to promote schemes of stupendous wickedness and of monstrous oppression. It has been used to infuse malice into the heart of bigotry, nerve the arm and kindle the fires of persecution, and prop the throne of tyranny.'

Yes, even antimasonry, that most shameless of all factions, the most unhallowed of all combinations, does not hesitate to mingle its profane orgies with the solemn ordinances of religion. It attempts to sanctify its intolerant outpourings, its base designs upon our chartered rights, and its daring usurpations upon civil freedom, by the solemn tones of prayer. The late gathering of the worthies, at the goodly city of brotherly love, was opened by prayer from the Rev. Seceder Thacher, and their patriotic, and benevolent, and pious deliberations were closed in the same manner by the Rev. Seceder Bernard.
